And lastly, the body of the sun may contract some spots or maculae greater than usual, and by that means be darkened.

Burnet, Theory of the Earth.

2. [In physick.] Any spots upon the skin, whether those in fevers or scorbutick habits.

To MAC'ULATE† v. a. [maculo, Latin.]

To stain; to spot.

They would not maculate the honour of their people with such a reproach.

Sir T. Elyot, Gen. fol. 80. b.

MAC'ULATE.† adj. [from the verb; maculatus, Lat.] Spotted; stained.

Arm. My love is most immaculate white and red.

Moth. Most maculate thoughts, master, are masked under such colours.

Shakespeare, Love. Lab. Lost.

MAC'ULATION.† n. s. [maculation, old French.] Stain; spot; taint.

I will throw my glove to do him himself, That there's no maculation in thy heart.

Shakespeare, Tr. and Cress.

MAC'ULE. n. s. [macula, Latin.] A spot; a stain.

MAC'U' adj. [German, Saxon; macuto, Ital. Dr. Johnson.—“It is merely mac, meb, (d for t), the past tense and past participle of the Sax. meccan, sonniare, to mete, to dream. The verb mete was formerly in common use for dream. ‘I fell effronse a slepe, and sodainly me mete.’ Vis. of P. Pl. ‘As he satte and woke, his spiritte mete that he her saugh.’ Chaucer, Tr. and Cress.—The Ital. matto is the same Sax. participle, with the Italian terminating vowel.

The decided opinion of Menage and Junius, that matto is derived from the Greek ματτα, is overruled in my mind, by the consideration of the time when the word matto was first introduced into the Italian language: for the Greek derivatives, in that language, proceed to it through the Latin. And in the Latin, there is nothing which resembles matto. Mr. H. Tooke, Div. of Purl. ii. 341.—Mr. Tooke has here overlooked the true etymon. Serenus derives our word from the Goth. mod, anger, whence our mood for rage, or heat of mind; moody, passionate, angry; mobian, Saxon, to be angry. Thus also Mr. Haslam, in his Observations on Madness, refers to the Gothic word, without noticing the preceding sophistry of Mr. Tooke; and adds, “It is true that we have now converted the o into a, and write the word mad: but mod was anciently employed:

Chauc. Kn. Tale, fol. 1561. p. 6.

There is so great a resemblance between anger and violent madness, that there is nothing which could more probably have led to the adoption of the term.” Observ. &c. 1809, p. 3. The word modnesse, however, which Mr. Haslam has cited, is not the genuine reading of the old poet. The best manuscripts, and correct editions, of Chaucer, read wodnesse or wodness, which is the ancient term for madness; and modnesse is most undoubtedly an oversight or error.]

1. Disordered in the mind; broken in the understanding; distracted; delirious without a fever.

Alack, sir, he is mad.

—‘Tis the time's plague when madmen lead the blind.

Shakespeare.

This music made me, let it sound no more; For though it have help'd madmen to their wits, In me, it seems, it will make wiseness mad.

Shakespeare.

Cupid, of thee the poets sung, Thy mother from the sea was sprung; But they were mad to make thee young.

Drakam.

We must bind our passions in chains, lest like mad-folks they break their locks and bolts, and do all the mischief they can.

By. Taylor, Worthy Communicant.

A bear, enraged at the stinging of a bee, ran like mad into the bee-garden, and over-turn'd all the hives.

L'Extrange.

Madmen ought not to be mad; But who can help his frenzy?

Iryden, Span. Friar.

But some strange graces and odd flights also had,

Was just not ugly, and was just not mad.

Pope.

2. Expressing disorder of mind.

His gestures fierce

He mark'd, and mad demeanour when alone.

Milton, P. L.

3. Over-run with any violent or unreasonable desire: with on, after, of, perhaps better for, before the object of desire.

It is the land of graven images, and they are mad upon their idols.

The world is running mad after force, the extremity of bad poetry, or rather the judgement that is fallen upon dramatick writing.

Dryden, Pref. to Ciceronius.

The people are not so very mad of acorns, but that they could be content to eat the bread of civil persons.

Rymers.

4. Enraged; furious.

They that are mad upon me are ever-torn against me.

P. ci. 8.

Holy writ represents St. Paul as making barock of the church, and persecuting that way into the death, and being exceedingly mad against them.

Decry of Chr. Piety.

To MAC'U. v. a. [from the adjective.] To make mad; to make furious; to enrage.

O villain! cried out Zelmane, mad with finding an unlook'd-for rival.

Sidney.

This will witness outwardly,

As strongly to the conscience does within,

To the maddening of her lord.

Shakespeare, Cym.

This mad war, that perhaps ignoble hands

Have overlaid him, for they could not conquer.

Dryden.

To MAC'U. v. n.

1. To be mad; to be furious.

Many of them seiden, he hath a deuel, and mad.

Wicliffe, St. John, z.

The madding wheels

Of brazen chariots rag'd: dire was the noise

Of conflicts!

She, mixing with a throng

Of madding matrons, bears the bride along.

Dryden.

2. To be wild.

Here grows melampode every where,

And terrible good for goats; &c.

The one my madding kids to tame,

The next to blemish their throates.

Spenser, Shep. Cal. July.

MAC'U.† n. s. [matha, Goth. maða, Saxon,

MADE.† n. s. [made, Dutch.] An earth-worm. Essex.

MA'DAM.† n. s. [ma dame, French, my dame.] The term of compliment used in address to ladies of every degree. It was anciently spoken as in French, with the accent upon the last syllable. Dr.

Johnson.—It was anciently also used for mistress, or lady, without being the term of compliment. And vulgarly it is now so used: as, she is a proud madam.

She became a glorious madame of the court.

Boile, Les Femmes, (1693), fol. 38. b.

They have always for ladies sake gloriously garish'd their holy mother, the madame of mischief. Bate on the Revel. P. i. sig. A. vi. b.

Certes, madame, you have great cause of plaint.

Madam, once more you look and woe's a queen!

Philips, Distrest Mother.

MA'DERRAIN. } adj. [mad and brain.]

MA'DERAINED. } Disordered in the mind:

hotheaded.

I give my hand oppos'd against my heart,

Unto a madbrin Kinsdey, full of spleen.

Spenser, The Shep. of the Shire.

He let fall his book,

And as he stoop'd again to take it up,

This madbrin'd bedroom took him such a cuff,

That down fell print and book.

Shakespeare, Tim. of the Shrew.

MA'DCAP. n. s. [mad and cap.] either taking the cap for the head, or alluding to the caps put upon distracted persons by way of distinction. A madman; a wild botheaded fellow.

That last is Biron, the merry madcap lord;

Not a word with him but a jest.

Shakespeare.

The nimble-footed madcap prince of Wales,

And his comrades, that dash the world aside,

And bid it pass.

Shakespeare, Hen. IV.

To MA'DDEN. v. n. [from mad.] To become mad; to act as mad.

The dog-star rages, nay his past a doubt,

All Bedlam or Furness is let out;

Fire in each eye, and papers in each hand,

They rave, recite, and *mad*den round the land.

Pope.

Such madd'ning draughts of beauty,

As for a while overwhelm'd his raptur'd thought.

Thomson.

MA'DDER. n. s. [maddepe, Sax.] A plant.

The flower of the madder consists of one single leaf, which is cut into four or five segments, and expanded at the top;

the flower-cup afterwards becomes a fruit, composed of two juicy berries closely joined together, containing seed for the most part, hollowed like a navel;

the leaves are rough, and surround the stalks in whorles. Milner.

Madder is cultivated in vast quantities in Holland: what the Dutch send over for medicinal use is the root, which is only dried; but the greatest quantity is used by the dyers, who have it sent in coarse powder. Hill.

To MA'DDLE.† v. n. To forget; to wander; to be in a kind of confusion. Common in Cumberland, and other parts of the north. See Craven Dial. and Brockett's N. C. Words.

MADÉ, participle preterite of make.

Neither hath this man sinned, nor his parents; but that the works of God should be made manifest. St. John, ix. 5.

MADÉFACT'ION. n. s. [madefacio, Latin.] The act of making wet.

To all madefaction there is required an imbibition. Bacon.

To MADÉFY.† v. a. [madefio, Latin; madefier, Fr. Cotgrave.] To moisten; to make wet. Cockeram.

MADÉIRA Wine.* A rich wine made at the island of Madeira.

A cup of Madeira, and a cold espousal's leg. Shakespeare, Hen. IV. P. I.

MADÉMOISELLE.* n. s. [French; ma damoiselle, an ancient term of compliment to young ladies.] A miss; a young girl.

Courtiers and court ladies with their grooms and mademoiselles. Milton, April for Enchiridion.

I cannot fancy that miss in a boarding-school is more an economist than mademoiselle in a nunnery. Goldsmith, Es. 15.

MADÉHO'WLET.† n. s. [machette, Fr. Cotgrave.] An owl. See HOWLET.

MADHE'ADED.* adj. [mad and head.] Hot-headed; full of fancies.

Out, you madheaded ape!

A weasel hath not such a deal of spleen, As you are tow'd with. Shakespeare, Hen. IV. P. I.

MAD'HOUSE. n. s. [mad and house.] A house where madmen are cured or confined.

A fellow in a madhouse being asked how he came there? Why, says he, the mad folks abroad are too many for us, and so they have mastered all the sober people, and cooped them up here. L'Estrange.

MAD'DLY, adv. [from mad.]

1. Without understanding; furiously. He war'd a torch aloft, and madly vain, Sought godlike worship from a servile train. Dryden.

2. Wildly; in disorder. Her matted tresses madly spread, To every nod which wraps the dead She turns her joyous eyes. Colins, Ode 5.

MAD'MAN. n. s. [mad and man.] A man deprived of his understanding.

They shall be like madmen, spouting none, but still sporting. 9 Eodr. xvi. 71.

He that eagerly pursues any thing, is no better than a madman. L'Estrange.

He who tries a madman's hands, or takes away his sword, loves his person while he disarms his frenzy. South.

MAD'NESS. n. s. [from mad.]

1. Distraction; loss of understanding; perturbation of the faculties.

Why, woman, your husband is in his old lunes again: he so buffets himself on the forehead, that any madness I ever yet beheld seemed but tame and civility to this distemper. Shakespeare, Mer. Wives of Windsor.

There are degrees of madness as of folly, the disorderly jumbling ideas together, in some more, some less. Locke.

2. Fury; wildness of passion; rage. The power of God sets bounds to the raging of the sea, and restrains the madness of the people. King Charles.

He rav'd with all the madness of despair, He roar'd, he beat his breast, and tore his hair. Dryden.

MADON'NA.* } n. s. [Italian; i. e. miss MADON'NA.] } mad donna, my lady.]

1. A name given to pictures of the Virgin Mary.

The Italian painters are noted for drawing the Madonnas by their own wives or mistresses. Rymer, View of Tragedy, p. 157.

2. Term of compliment, like madam. Not in use. Olivia. Go to, you're a dry fool; I'll no more of you; besides, you grow dishonest.

Two faults, madonna, that drink and good counsel will amend. Shakespeare, Tw. Night.

MADRIR'.† n. s. [madrier, Fr.] A plank, or piece of timber, whose grain is full of crooked and speckled streaks. Cotgrave. From materium, Lat. "L'isle Madera a été détre de materia, parcequ'elle est fertile en bois." Menage.

1. Madrier, in war, is a thick plank armed with iron plates, having a cavity sufficient to receive the mouth of the petard when charged, with which it is applied against a gate, or other thing intended to be broken down. Bailey.

2. A long plank of broad wood for supporting the earth in mining, carrying on saps, and the like. Chambers.

MAD'RI'GAL.† n. s. [madrigal, Spanish and French, from mandra, Latin; whence it was written anciently mandriale, Italian. Dr. Johnson.—Others refer the word to the Italian madriali, i. e. alla madre, hymns to the virgin mother. The Italians also use madrigali, which Florio translates, "a kind of short songs or ditties in Italy." A pastoral song; any light airy short song.

A madrigal is a little amorous piece, which contains a certain number of unequal verses, not tied to the scrupulous regularity of a sonnet, or subtility of an epigram: it consists of one single rank of verses, and in that differs from a canonet, which consists of several strophes, which return in the same order and number. Bailey.

Waters, by whose falls Birds sing melodious madrigals. Shakespeare. Thyrsis, whose artful strains have oft delay'd The huddling brook to hear his madrigals. Milton, Comus.

Their tongue is light and trifling in comparison of the English; more proper for sonnets, madrigals, and elegies, than heroic poetry. Dryden.

MAD'WORT. n. s. [mad and wort.] An herb.

MÆRE. adv. It is derived from the Saxon mep, famous, great, noted; so æmere is all famous; æthelmere, famous for nobility. Gibson's Camden.

MAESTO'SO.* [Ital.] A musical term, directing the part to be played with grandeur, and consequently slow, but yet with strength and firmness.

To MATFLE.† v. n. [maffelen, Teut. balutire. Kilian. This word was in use nearly two centuries before the time of Ainsworth, whom alone Dr. Johnson cites as authority for it. See also To FAYFLE.] To stammer. The word is still used in the north of England.

Hulot, and Cockeram. [He] so stammered, or maffled in his talk, that he was not able to bring forth a readable word. Barret, Tr. of Sueton. in F. Stammer, Alc. (1580.)

MAT'FLER. n. s. [from the verb.] A stammerer. Ainsworth.

MAGAZI'NE.† n. s. [magazin, French; magazzino, Italian; from the Arabic machzan, a treasure.]

1. A storehouse; commonly an arsenal or armoury, or repository of provisions.

If it should appear fit to bestow shipping in those harbours, it shall be very needful that there be a magazine of all necessary provisions and ammunition. Roberts, Essay.

Plain heroic magnitude of mind; Their armories and magazines contents

Some o'er the public magazine preside, And some are sent new forges to provide. Dryden, Verg.

Useful arms in magazines we place, All rang'd in order, and dispos'd with grace. Pope.

His head was so well stored a magazine, that nothing could be proposed which he was not master of. Locke.

2. Of late [that is, in the year 1757,] this word, Dr. Johnson says, has signified a miscellaneous pamphlet from a periodical miscellany called The Gentleman's Magazine, and published under the name of Sylvanus Urban, by Edward Cave. This miscellany, which gave rise to the London, the Lady's, and various other Magazines, still continues, as Dr. Johnson said of it in his Life of Cave, to enjoy the favour of the world, and is one of the most successful and lucrative pamphlets which literary history has upon record.

We essayists, who are allowed but one subject at a time, are by no means so fortunate as the writers of magazines, who write upon several. Goldsmith, Es. 9.

MAGAZI'NER.* n. s. [from magazine.] One who writes an article for a magazine. A bad word.

If a magaziner be dull upon the Spanish war, he soon has us up again with the Ghost in Cock Lane: if the reader refers to dose upon that, he is quickly routed by an Eastern tale. Goldsmith, Es. 5.

MAGE'.† n. s. [magus, Latin; mage, Fr.] A magician.

The budy Mage (with love to fend) First entering, the dreadful mage there fow'd Deep buried 'bout works of wondrous end. Spenser, F. Q. ill. fil. 14.

MAG'GOT. n. s. [magrod, Welsh; millepeda, Latin; maða, Sax.]

1. A small grub, which turns into a fly. Out of the sides and back of the common caterpillar we have crept out insect maggets. Ray.

From the sore although the insect flies, It leaves a brood of maggets in disguise. Goth.

2. Whimsy; caprice; odd fancy. A low word.

Tellus phrases, silken terms precise, Three wild hyacinths, spruce artificial flowers, Figures pedantic, those summer flies, Have blown the full of magget ostentation: I do forewarn them. Shakespeare.

Henceforth my wooing mind shall be express
In sunset eyes, and honest merry nose. Shakespeare.

To reconcile our late dissenters,
Our brethren though by other ventures,
Unite them and their different maggot.
As long and short sticks are in faggots. Hudibras.
She picked his maggot, and touched him in the tender point; then he broke out into a violent passion. Arbutnot.

MAGGOTTINESS. n. s. [from maggoty.]

The state of abounding with maggots.

MAGGOTTY. adj. [from maggot.]

1. Full of maggots.

2. Capricious; whimsical. A low word.

To pretend to work out a vast scheme of thought with a maggotty unaided head, is as ridiculous as to think to write strait in a jumbling cock. Norris.

MAGGOOTHEADED. adj. [maggotty and head.] Having a head full of fancies.

He [Aubrey] was a shiftless person, roving and maggotty, and sometimes little better than crazy. Life of A. Wood, p. 309.

MAGI. n. s. pl. [Latin.] Wise men of the East.

Not only the philosophers among the Greeks,
but even the magi in the extremest east.

The inspired magi from the east came to adore the infant Jesus, and to prefer'd my star before their Mithra's flame,
And at my infant feet devoutly fell. Spenser, Christ's Passion, p. 2.

MAGIAN. adj. [from magi.] Denoting
the magi of the East.

A future resurrection was the belief of the magian sect so famous all over the east.

Peters on Job, [3d ed. 1757,] p. 406.
Cyrus was a Persian, had been brought up in the religion of his country, and was probably addicted to the magian superstition of two independent beings. By Water, Apollo, for the Bible, p. 160.

MAGICIAN. adj. [magicus, Latin; magique,
French.]

1. Acting, or performing by secret and invisible powers, either of nature, or the agency of spirits.

I'll humbly signify what, in his name,
That magical word of war, we have effected.

They beheld unweild the magical shield of your Aristo, which dazzled the beholders with too much brightness; they can no longer hold up their arms. Dryden.

By the use of a looking-glass, and certain artist made of cambric, upon her head, she attained to an evil art and magical force in the motion of her eyes. Tatler.

2. Applied to persons using enchantment.
Not common.

Some of the natives are doubtless magical; and this reason I give for it: Another gentleman and myself one evening sitting under a tree to avoid a storm, (for at that time it thundered and rained excessively), a negro stood by us trembling, whom we could see now and then lift up his hands and eyes, muttering in black art, and was afterwards seen hobgoblin; but, when we least suspected, skipped out, and as in a lymphatic rapture unshaken a long spear or knife, which he brandished about his head seven or eight times, and after muttering as many spells put it up again; then kissed the earth three times: which done, he rose; and upon a sudden the sky cleared, and no more noise alighted us. St. Herbert, Trav. p. 27.

MAGICALLY. adv. [from magical.] According to the rites of magic; by enchantment.

In the time of Valens, divers curious men, by the falling of a ring magically prepared, judged that one Theodorus should succeed in the empire.
Comden.

MAGICIAN. n. s. [magicien, Fr. Coatgrave; and so Chaucer writes the word; magicus, Latin.] One skilled in magic;
an enchanter; a necromancer.

What black magic conjures up this fiend
To stop devoted charitable deeds? Shakespeare, Rich. III.

An old magician, that did keep
The Hesperian fruit, and made the dragon sleep;
Her potent charms do troubled souls relieve,
And, where she lists, makes calmer souls to grieve. Waller.

There are millions of truths that a man is not concerned to know; as, whether Roger Bacon was a mathematician or a magician. Locke.

MAGICIAN. n. s. [magia, Latin; magie, French; which language has the adjective magique, as in the old dictionary of Coatgrave.]

1. The art of putting in action the power of spirits: it was supposed that both good and bad spirits were subject to magic; yet magic was in general held unlawful; sorcery; enchantment.

She once being loath,
The noble ruler of her magic, Antony,
Claps on his sea wing. Shakespeare, Ant. and Cleop.
What charm, what magic, can over-rule
the force of all these motives? Reynolds.

2. The secret operations of natural powers.
The writers of natural magic attribute much to the virtues that come from the parts of living creatures, as if they did infuse immaterial virtue into the part severed. Bacon.

MAGICIAN. adj. [magicus, Latin; magique,
French.]

1. Acting or doing by powers superior to the known power of nature; enchanted;
necromantic.

Upon the corner of the moon
There hangs a vaporous drop, profound;
I'll catch it ere it come to ground;
And that distill'd by magic alights
Shall raise such artificial spirits,
As by the strength of their illusion,
Shall draw him on to his confusion. Shakespeare, Macbeth.

Like castles built by magic art in air,
That vanish at approach, such thoughts appear. Grannell.

2. Done or produced by magic.

And the brute earth would lend her nerves, and shake
Till all they magic structures rear'd so high,
Were shatter'd into heaps. Milton, Comus.

MAGISTERIAL. adj. [magisterial, old French; from magister, Latin.]

1. Such as suits a master.

Such a government is paternal, not magisterial.
He bids him attend as if he had the rod over him; and uses a magisterial authority while he instructs him. Dryden.

2. Lofty; arrogant; proud; insolent;
despotic.

We are not magisterial in opinions, nor, dictator-like, obtrude our notions on any man. Dryden, Fals. Err.

Prentices go a great way with men that take fair words and magisterial looks, for current payment. I. Estrange.

Those men are but trepanned who are called to govern, being invested with authority, but bereaved of power; which is nothing else but to mock and betray them into a splendid and magisterial way of being ridiculous. South.

3. Chemically prepared, after the manner of a magistry.

Of corals are chiefly prepared the powder ground upon a marble, and the magisterial salt, to good purpose in some cases; though there is no more than a solution of the magisterial salt.

Greva, Muscum.
MAGISTERIALLY. adv. [from magisterial.]
Arrogantly; with an air of authority.

A downright advice may be mistaken, as if it were spoken magisterially. Bacon, Adv. to Young.
Over their claims and pipes, they claim and express all wholly to themselves, magisterially considering the wisdom of all antiquity, scoffing at all piety, and new modelling the world. South.

MAGISTERIALNESS. n. s. [from magisterial.] Haughtiness; airs of a master.

Pertinaciousness is of two sorts: the one a ma-gisterialness in matters of opinion, and speculation, the other a poldiveness in relating matters of fact:
in the one we impose upon men's understandings,
in the other on their faith.

He chargeth him with too much precipitancy and magisterialness in judging. Go. of the Tongue, p. 188.

Nelson, Life of Sir. Bull, p. 225.

MAGISTERY. n. s. [magisterium, Latin.]

Magistry is a term made use of by chymists to signify sometimes a very fine powder, made by solution and precipitation; as of bismuth, lead, &c. and sometimes resins and resinous substances; as those of jalap, scammony, &c.
but the most genuine acation is to express that preparation of any body wherein the whole, or most part is, by the addition of somewhat, changed into a body of quite another kind; as when iron or copper is turned into crystals of Mars or Venus. Quincy.

Paracelsus extracted the magistry of wine, expressing it unto the extremity of cold; whereby the aqueous parts will freeze, but the spirit be uncongealed in the centre. Brown.

The magistry of vegetables consists but of the more soluble and coloured parts of the plants that afford it. Bogel.

MAGISTRACY. n. s. [magistratus, Latin.]
Office or dignity of a magistrate.

You share the ward, her magistracies, priest-hoods,
Wealth, and felicity, amongst you, friends. St. Jonson.

He had no other intention but to dissuade men from magistracy, or undertaking the public offices of state. Brown.

Some have disputed even against magistracy itself. Atterbury.

Duelling is not only an usurpation of the divine prerogative, but it is an insult upon magistracy and good government. Richardson, Clarissa.

MAGISTRAL. adj. [magistral, French; magistralis, low Latin.]

1. Authoritative; suiting a magistrate or master; magisterial.

The whole race or corporation of sheep here sent four ambassadors to this court: — whereupon a great and goodly magistral rum of Lincolnshire, in an aristocratic blustering voice, uttered these words.
Tread, of Beccolod, (1626, &c. p. 79.)

2. Masterly; artificial; skilful; cunning.
This sense is also given by Coatgrave.

Opiates, juleps, apocemes,
Magistral tympa. St. Jonson, Scurians.

MAGISTRAL. n. s. A sovereign medicine;
an artificial preparation. See the second

MA'IDEN, v. adj. [not a corruption of the old French maign, or mayne, as Mr.
Warton has asserted; but rather perhaps the Saxon, mægen, great, strong; mægen, strength. But Mr. Archbishop Narves, in his Glossary, says, that the word "as applied to a fortress, or fortified town, meant properly one that had never been taken, or was deemed impregnable;
and still holds, in military language."]
Strong; impregnable.

At Cattle Well near Woolber — is an intrenchdown in Somersetshire with the same signification.

Warton, Hist. E. P. li. 13.

MA'IDEN, v. n. To speak or act demurely like a maiden.

The courteous citizen bade me to his feast,
With hollow words, and overty request;
"Come will ye dine with me this holy day?"

I yielded, though he hop'd I would say nay;
For had I maiden'd it, as many use,
Loath for to grant, but loathier to refuse;

"Alack, sir, I were loath; another day, —
" I should but trouble you, — pardon me, if you may say —

No pardon should I need: for, to depart
He gives me leave, and thanks too, in his heart!
By. Hall, Sat. iii. 3.

MA'IDENHAIR, n. s. [maiden and hair;

fon dressed like a man, who played tricks to the populace. Dr. Johnson.

Maid Marian was originally a woman,
the queen of the May; one of the company of our old Morris dancers; but, as Mr. Stevens has observed, after the morris degenerated into a piece of court buffoonery, and Maid Marian was personated by a strumpet or clown, this once elegant queen obtained the name of Malkin, or Maukin. See MAL- KIN.

So the hobblinoes, and so the maid-marian was attired in colours.

Old Meg of Heref. for a Maye-Mar. (1609), B. 4. b.
For womanhood, maid-marian may be the

Great was the number of the preachers, [during Cromwell's usurpation;] for a lying spirit made both some lords, and their cochemen; some mechanicks and their apprentices; yea, some mistresses, with their old-maidens, all gifted in the kind; which were not able to discern and distinguish between faith and faction, reformation and rebellion, conscience and conspiracy, holiness and hypocrisy.

*Dr. Griffith, Illustrations Revised, (1660,) p. 23.*
A set of morrice-dancers danced a maiden with a tabor and pipe.

Troyte.

MAL'IKIN. s. n. [from mal, of Mary, and kin, the diminutive termination. Dr.
Johnson.—Dr. Johnson's etymology is,
I apprehend, erroneous. The kitchen-wench very naturally takes her name from this word, mal, a scullion; another of her titles is in like manner derived from escullion, the French term for the utensil called a malikin. Malone.—It may perhaps be derived from the Sax.
mal, a spot, and the termination kin.
G. Chalmers.] A kind of mop made of clouts for sweeping ovens; thence a frightful figure of clouts dressed up; thence a dirty wench. See MAID MA-RIAN.

The kitchen malikin pios
Her richest lockram 'bout her reechy neck, Clambering the walls to eye him. Shakespeare, Coriol.

Arm your hook with the line, and cut so much of a brown mallard's feather as will make the wings. Walton, Angler.

MALLEABILITY. n. s. [from malleable.] Quality of enduring the hammer; quality of spreading under the hammer.

Supposing the nominal essence of gold to be a body of such a peculiar colour and weight, with the malleability and fusibility, the real essence is that constitution on which these qualities and their union depend.

M'ALLEABLE. adj. [malleable, French; from malleus, Lat. a hammer.] Capable of being spread by beating; this is a quality possessed in a most eminent degree by gold, it being more ductile than any other metal; and is opposite to friability or brittleness. Quincy.

Make it more strong for falls, though it come not to the degree to be malleable. Bacon.

The beaten soldier proves most manful,
That like his sword endures the anvil;
And justly's held more formidable,
The more his valour's malleable. Hudibras.

If the body is compact, and bends or yields forward to pressure, without any sliding in its parts, it is hard and elastic, returning to its figure, with a force rising from the mutual attraction of its parts; if the parts slide upon one another, the body is malleable or soft. Newton.

MALLEABleness. n. s. [from malleable.] Quality of enduring the hammer; malleability; ductility.

The bodies of most use that are sought for out of the earth are the metals, which are distinguished from other bodies by their weight, fusibility, and malleableness. Locke.

To M'ALLEATE. v. a. [from malleus, Lat.] To hammer; to forge or shape by the hammer.

Look upon every circumstance in the story of Pharaoh, and we cannot find one which was not as a hammer to malleate and soften his stony heart. Farrington. Sermon. 1647. p. 218.

He first found out the art of melting and malleating metals, and making them useful for tools. Diderot.

MALLEATION. n. s. [malleation, French; Cotgrave; from malleate.] Act of beating.

And the another full of fine Vernage. Chaucer, Shipman. Tale.

MALT. n. s. [meale, Sax.; mout, Dutch. Dr. Johnson. — It is nothing, says Mr. H. Tooke, "but the French word

mouillé, the past participle of the verb mouiller, to wet or moisten; mouillé, anglicised, becoming mouilled, mouill'd, mould: then moult, mault, malt; wetting; or moistening of the grain is the first and necessary part of the process in making what we therefore term malt." Diversions of Purley, ii. 70. — There is much ingenuity in this deduction, which is applied also to mould, evidently with greater force; for that word was written moultle, and moule; thus marking precisely, as it were, its origin. See MOULD, and To MOULD. But the Sax. meal, or malt, as well as the Teut. malt, seem to point out the origin of the present word; and these may have been easily formed from the Greek μαλάνθη, to soften, to make soft.) Grain steeped in water and fermented, then dried on a kiln.

Beer hath malt first infused in the liquor, and is afterwards boiled with the hop. *Bacon, Hist. Nat. MALT-DUST. n. s. [malt and dust.]*

MAM. n. s. [mamma, Latin; this MAMMA'.] word is said to be found for the compellation of mother in all languages; and is therefore supposed to be the first syllable that a child pronounces.) The fond word for mother.

Poor Cudd solacing scarce could speak;
Indeed, mamma, I did not know ye;
Alas! how easy my mistake? Prior.

I took you for your likecase Chloe.
Little masters and misters are great impediments to servants; the remedy is to bribe them, that they may not tell tales to papa and mamma.

MAMALUKE. n. s. [mamalik, Fr. mamlucco, Ital. from the Arab. manlic, subject, under the command of another.] One of those, who were originally slaves or mercenary soldiers, and usurped the sovereignty of Egypt in the thirteenth century, and maintained their usurpation till the beginning of the sixteenth; they are said to have been originally Circassian or Mingrelian slaves; and in hard, modern times, were called the military force of Egypt. They have both fought against that enemy of the world's happiness, Napoleon Buonaparte; and they have also joined the French.

He [Saladine] sent to the Circassians by the lake of Meotis, near Taurica Cheroneus, and thence brought many slaves of able and active bodies. — These slaves he trained up in military discipline, most of them being Christians, once baptized; but afterwards, unsought Christ, they learned Mahomet; and so became the worse foes to religion for once being his friends. These proved excellent soldiers and special horsemen, and are called mamluks. Fulter, Holy War, p. 97.

'Tis sung, there is a valiant mamluke.
In foreign land. Hudibras, i. 1.

A paste made only of crumbs of bread, which should be of pure fine manchet. Watson, Angler.

MANCHINE'EL tree. n. s. [manzanilla, Latin.]

The manchineel tree is a native of the West Indies, and grows to the size of an oak: its wood is of a beautiful grain, will polish well and last long, and is therefore much esteemed: in cutting down those trees, the juice of the bark must be burnt out before the work is begun: it will then raise blisters on the skin, and burn holes in linen; and if it should fly into the eyes of the labourers, they are in danger of losing their sight: the fruit is of the colour and size of the golden pippin; many Europeans have suffered, and others lost their lives by eating it: the leaves abound with juice of the same nature; cattle never shelter themselves, and scarcely any vegetable grow under their shade; yet goats eat this fruit without injury. Miller.

To MANCIPATE.† v. a. [mancipio, Lat.; manciper, old French.] To enslave; to bind; to tie.

They voluntary mancipate and sell themselves. Burton, Ann. of Mel. p. 160.

Although the regular part of nature is seldom varied, yet the meteors, which are in themselves more unstable, and less mancipated to stated motions, are often times mancipated to various ends. Hale, Orig. of Mankind.

MANCIP'ATION.† n. s. [from mancipate.] Slavery; involuntary obligation.

They [the Romans] fortified themselves against all incursions,—and prevailed against all mankind to their mancipation under them. Waterhouse, Comm. on Fortenac, p. 187.

MANCIPLE.† n. s. [maniceps, Latin, which signified particularly the superintendent of a public bakehouse, and from thence a baker in general. Tyrrwhitt. And see Du Cange in V. MANCIPES.] The steward of a community; the purveyor; it is particularly used of the purveyor of a college.

A gentile manciple was tier of a temple, Of which scabrous mighten take example For to be wise in buying of vitale. Chaucer, C. T. Proel.

They came furnished with no more experience than they learnt between the coal and the manciple. Milton, Of Ref. Eng. B. 3.

Their manciple fell dangerously ill, Bread must be had, their great will to the mill: Chaucer, C. T. Proel.

This Simkin moderately stole before, Their steward sick, he robb'd them ten times more. Betterton, Miller of Trempington.

MANDA'MUS.† n. s. [Latin.] A writ granted by the court of king's bench in the name of the king; so called from the initial word.

I thought it my duty to returne our most humble thanks to your grace, for your late reasonable and effectual assistance in reverting the mandamus sent to Oriel-college.

Letter in Warton's Life of Bathurst, p. 100.

MANDARIN.† n. s. [mandarin, or mandador, a commander, Portuguese; by persons of which country this name was given to Chinese people of distinction; mandar, to command, from the Latin mandare.] A Chinese nobleman or magistrate.

Out of these are chosen all their chief officers, and mandarines both civil and military. Temple.

MANDATARY. n. s. [mandataire, Fr. from mando, Latin.] He to whom the pope has, by his prerogative, and proper right, given a mandate for his benefice. Ayliffe.

MANDATE.† n. s. [mandat, French; mandatum, Latin.]

1. Command. Her force is not any where so apparent as in express mandates or prohibitions, especially upon advised consultation going before. Hooker.

The necessity of the times cast the power of the three estates upon himself, that his mandates should pass for laws, whereby he laid what taxes he pleased. Howell, Voc. For.

2. Precept, charge; commission, sent or transmitted.

Who knows, If the scarce bearded Cæsar have not sent His powerful mandate to you. Shakespeare, Ant. and Cleop.

Thy Moors, Your special mandate, for the state affairs, Hath hither brought. Shakespeare, Othello.

He thought the mandate forg'd, your death conceal'd. Dryden.

This dream all powerful Juno sends, I bear Her mighty mandates, and her words you bear. Dryden.

MANDATOR. n. s. [Latin.] Director.

A person is said to be a client to his advocate, but a master and mandator to his proctor. Ayliffe, Persecution.

MANDATORY.† adj. [mandare, Lat.] Preceptive; directory.

It doth not appear that he usurped more than a mandatory nomination of the bishop to be consecrated. Alp. Usher on Ordination, p. 221.

MANDATORY.* n. s. One to whom a commandment or charge is given; as, to an apparitor, or other messenger, to execute a citation. Bullock.

Sending their mandatory with a musketeer to doctor Hammond's lodging, they commanded him to appear before them. Fell, Life of Hammond, § 1.

To MA'NDER.* See To MAUNDER.

MA'NDIBLE.† n. s. [mandibula, Lat.; mandibule, old Fr.] The jaw; the instrument of mastication.

There are two jaw bones, which are called the upper and mandible.

He seith, who the crocodile moveth the upper jaw, as if the upper mandible did make an articulation with the cranium. Greuv. Museum.

MA'NDIBULAR.† adj. [from mandibula, Lat.] Belonging to the jaw.

They consider and compute the many parts, joints, sinews; — parts similar, dissimilar, guttural, dental, mandibular.

Gayton on D. Quic. (1654.) p. 103. MA'NDIL.* n. s. [mandille, old French. From the Persian. See MANTLE.] A sort of mantle.

MANDRA'GORA.† n. s. [mandragoras, MA'NDRAKE. Latin; mandragore, French. mantragora, Saxon.] A plant.

The flower of the mandrake consists of one leaf in the shape of a bell, and is divided at the top into several parts: the root is said to bear a resemblance to the human form. The reports of tying a dog to this plant, in order to root it up, and prevent the certain death of the person who dares to attempt such a deed, and of the groans emitted by it when the violence is offered, are equally fabulous. Miller.

Among other virtues, mandrake has been falsely celebrated for rendering barren women fruitful: it has a soporific quality, and the ancients used it when they wanted a narcotic of the most powerful kind. Hill, Mat. Med. Would curses kill, as doth the mandrake's groan, I would invent an bitter searching toon, As curst, as harsh, and horrible to hear. Shakespeare.

Not poppy, nor mandragora, Nor all the drowsy syrups of the world, Shall ever med'cine thee to that sweet sleep. Shakespeare.

Come, violent death, Serve for mandragora to make me sleep. Webster, Duichin of Maffy, (1623.)

And shrieks like mandragoras, torn out of the ears, That living mortals, hearing them, run mad. Shakespeare.

Go, and catch a falling star, Get with child a mandrake root. Donne.

MA'NDREL.* n. s. [mandrin, French.] An instrument to hold in the lathe the substance to be turned.

Mandrils are made with a long wooden shank, to fit stiff into a round hole that is made in the work, that is to be turned; this mandrel is a shank, or pin mandrel. Mason.

MA'NDUCABLE.* adj. [from manduco, Lat.] That may be eaten; fit to be eaten.

Not forbearing to eat any manducabile creature. Sir T. Herbert, Trav. p. 53.

To MA'NDUCATE.† v. a. [manducare, Lat.] To chew; to eat.

It is gravel in the teeth, and a man must drink the blood of his own gums, when he manglest such unwholesome, such unpleasant fruit.

By Taylor, Sermon (1658), p. 252.
MANUECTIO, n. s. [manuclatio, Lat.] Eating; chewing.

Manuclatio is the action of the lower jaw in chewing the food, and preparing it in the mouth before it is received into the stomach.

Quincy.
As good poetry sarà zuppa, as ever puppo conceived of transmutation or oral manuection.

Montaigne, Ap. to Cæs. (1625.), p. 361.

The more solid food needs greater manuclatio.

Smith on Old Age, p. 62.

As he who is not a holy person does not feed upon Christ, it is apparent that our manuection must be spiritual, and therefore so must the food, and consequently it cannot be a natural flesh.

By Taylor, Worthy Communicant.

MANE, n. s. [maene, Dutch.] The hair which hangs down on the neck of horses or other animals.

Dianetus was tamed from the saddle to the mane of the horse, and thence to the ground.

L'Estrange.

MAN'GINESS, n. s. [from mangy.] Scabbiness; infection with the mange.

Sherrwood.

To MAN'GLE, v. a. [mangelen, Dutch, to wanting; mancu, Lat. Dr. Johnson.] — Mangeli, Germ. and Su. defectus, ab antiq. Celt. man, defectus. Serenius, Mr. Malone believes it to be a corruption of manquel; "Whom [Edw. son of Hen. VI.] they that stood about sodainly murdered, and piteously manquelled." Hall's Chronicle, 1550.

To lacerate; to cut or tear piece-meal; to butcher.

Cassio, may you suspect
Who they should be, that thus have mangled you?

Shakespeare.
Your dishonour
Mangles true judgment, and bereaves the state
Of that integrity which should become it.

Shakespeare.
Afterward they brought the fifth also, and mangled him.

2 Marc. vii. 15.
Thoughts my tormentors, arm'd with deadly stings,
Mangle my apprehensive tenderest parts,

But mangle and disjoint this brittle frame?

More fatal Henry's words; they murder Emma's fame.

Prior.
It is hard, that not one gentleman's daughter should read her own tongue; as any one may find, who can hear them when they are disposed to mangle a play or a novel, where the least word out of the common road discovers them.

Swift.
They have joined the most obscure consonants without one intervening vowel, only to shorten a syllable; so that most of the books we see now-a-days, are full of those manglings and abbreviations.

Swift.
Inextricable difficulties occur by mangling the sense, and curtailing authors. Baker on Learning.

To MAN'GLE, v. a. [mangeln, Germ. mangelen, Teut. "Mangelen hat lip-waet, levigare, complanare, polire lintea." Kilian.] To smooth linen; to calender.

MAN'GLE, n. s. A rolling-press for smoothing linen; a calender. The instrument used in Italy is manglier, mangy, and mangeli in Italy mangano, which Florio renders "a kind of press to press buckram, fustian, or luted linen-cloth, to make it have a lustre or gloss."

World of Words, 1598.

MAN'GLER, n. s. [from mangle.] A hacker; one that destroys bunglingly.

Your freethinkers at that rate are the greatest manglers of authors. Bentley, Phil. Lips. § 58.

Since after they may use an impious line,
Coarse manglers of the human face divine;
Paint on, till fate dissolve thy mortal part,

MANICHE'AN.* } sian, educated among the maji; of whom he was one, before he embraced Christianity.] One of the followers of Manes, who taught that there were two principles of all things, coeternal and coequal, the one good,

the other evil; that two equipollent deities ruled the world; and other gross and impious errors.

The Manichees held man in all things dragged by a necessity of destiny. Ap. Hist. Rem. p. 57.
Could the wild Manichees own that guide,
The good would triumph, and the ill subside!
Haye.

MANICHE'AN.* adj. Relating to the Manicheans.

What has been said is methinks sufficient to rule the Manichean career, and exclude the independent principle of evil.

Walton, Religion of Nature.

MA'NICHISM.* n. s. [from Manichee.] The impious doctrine of the Manichees.

adversaries, even of Home, as the pith of Manichism. Fuller, Moderat. of the Ch. of Eng. p. 143.
Bayle — has artfully employed all that force and acuteness of argument, which he certainly possessed, in promoting the gloomy and uncomfortable scheme of scepticism or Manichism.

Dr. Warton, Ess. on Pope.

MA'NICHORD.* n. s. [manicordium, Fr. "an old-fashioned clarichord." Cotgrave.]
A musical instrument, like a spinet. It has been confounded with the mono- chord, as if it were an instrument of one string only. See MONOCHORD. It has taken the name, most probably, from the Lat. manus, the hand, and chord.
Its strings, like those of the clarichord, were covered with little pieces of cloth, to deaden or soften the sound: whence it is called the dumb spinet; and was much used in nurseries, by reason that the nuns, who were learning to play upon it, might not disturb the silence of other cells. See Grassineau's Mus.
Diet.

MA'NICON.* n. s. [manicon, Lat.] A kind of night-shade; an herb so called from its making people mad.

fest myself to him. St. John, xiv. 21.

He was pleased himself to assume, and manifest his will in our flesh, and so not only as God from heaven, but God visible on earth, to preach reformation among us. Hemmond.

Must manifest thee worthiest to be heir
Of all things. Milton, P. L.

We're not by law withouted,
He'd manifest his own inhuman blood. Dryden, Jew.

It may be part of our employment in eternity, to contemplate the works of God, and give him
the glory of his wisdom manifested in the creation.
Ray on Creation.

MANIFESTABLE.* See MANIFESTIBLE.
MANIFESTA'TION.* n. s. [manifestation, Fr.;
from manifest.] Discovery; publication; clear evidence.

Though there be a kind of natural right in the noble, wise and virtuous, to govern them which are of servile disposition; nevertheless, for manifestation of this their right, the assent of them who are to be governed seemeth necessary. Hooker.

As the nature of God is excellent, so likewise it is to know him in those glorious manifestations of himself in the works of creation and providence.
Tillotson.

The secret manner in which acts of mercy ought to be performed, requires this public manifestation of them at the great day. Atterbury.

MA'NNA. n. s. [Hebrew.]

Manna is properly a gum, and is honey-like juice concreted into a solid form, seldom so dry but it adheres to the fingers: its colour is whitish, or brownish, and it has sweetness, and with it a sharpness that renders it agreeable; manna is the product of two different trees, both varieties of the ash: when the heats are free from rain, these trees exude a white honey juice, which concretes into what we call manna. It is but lately that the world were convinced of the mistake of manna being an aerial produce, by an experiment being

Thus to make them the principal, not the secondary theatre of their manœuvres for securing a determined majority in parliament.

Burke, Speech on the Duration of Parliaments.
TO MANŒUVRE.* v. n. [from the noun; manœuvrer, Norm. Fr. 'to hold.' To manage military or naval tactics skillfully; to carry on any operation adroitly.

MA'NOR. n. s. [manoir, old French; manerium, low Latin; maner, Armorick.]

Manor signifies, in common law, a rule or government which a man hath over such as hold land within his fee. Touching the original of these manors, it seems, that, in the beginning, there was a certain compass of ground granted by the king to some man of worth, for him and his heirs to dwell upon, for to exercise some jurisdiction, more or less, within that compass, as he thought good to grant; performing him such services, and paying such yearly rent for the same, as he by his grant required; and that afterwards this great man parcelled his land to other meaner men, injoining them again such services and rents as he thought good: and by that means, as he became tenant to the king, so the inferior became tenants to him: but those great men, or their posterity, have alienated these manors and lands so given them by their prince, and many for capital offences have forfeited them to the king; and thereby they still remain in the crown, or are bestowed again upon others. But whosoever possesses these manors, the liberty belonging to them is real and predial, and therefore remains, though the owners be changed. In these days, a manor rather signifies a jurisdiction and royalty incorporeal, than the land or site: for a man may have a manor in gross, as the law terms it, that is, the right and interest of a court-baron, with the perquisites thereof belonging.

Cowley.
 My parks, my walks, my manors that I had,
 E'en now forsake me; and of all my lands
 Is nothing left me?

Shakespeare, Hen. VI.
 Kinsmen of mine,
 By this to sicken'd their consciences, that never They shall abound as formerly. O many Have broke their backs with laying manors on them

For this great journey. Shakespeare, Rich. II.

MA'NSUETE.† adj. [mansuetus, Latin.
 The word is very old in our language, and not applied merely to animals in the sense of tame, and the like, as the solitary instance given from Ray by Dr. Johnson might induce the reader to suppose.] Mild; gentle; goodnatured;
 tame; not ferocious; not wild.

She said eke, she was fain with him to meete,
 And made forth still, mild, moist, and mansuete,
Chaucer, Tr. and Cris. s. 124.

This holds not only in domestic and manse birds; for then it might be thought the effect of education or institution, but also in the wild.

Ray on the Creation.

MA'NSUETUDE.† n. s. [mansuetudo, Fr.;
mansuetudo, Lat.] Mildness; gentleness; tameness. Dr. Johnson has unjustly confined this word also to animals.

 2. [In fortification.] A kind of movable penthouse, made of pieces of timber sawed into planks, which being about three inches thick, are nailed one over another so the height of almost six feet;

they are generally cast with tin, and set upon little wheels; so that in a siege they may be driven before the pioneers, and serve as blinds to shelter them from the enemy's small shot; there are other mantellets covered on the top, whereof the miners make use to approach the walls of a town or castle.

Harrie.
MA'NTIER.† n. s. [not from man and tiger, as Dr. Johnson pronounces it; but a misapprehension of the Lat. man-

tichora, Fr. manticore, which means a furious beast of a very different kind. "That word (man-tiger), replied Martin, is a corruption of the manticora of the ancients, the most noxious animal that ever infested the earth," &c. Arbutnot and K-pe, Mart. Scrib. Manticor is sometimes written mantegor. A large monkey or baboon.

Near these was placed—the black prince of Monnotapes; by whose side were seen the glaring cat-a-mountain, and the man-mimicking mantiger. Arbutnot and Pope.

The whole creature—doth groan, and as it were travail in pain, until it be delivered from the bondage of corruption, and manumitted or set free to partake of the glorious liberty of the sons of God.

Spencer on Prodigies, p. 67.

Manumit and release him from those drudgeries to vice, under which those remain who live without God.

Gen. of the Tongue.

Thou wilt beneath the burthen bow,
And glad receive the manumitting blow
On thy shav'd slavish head.

Dryden, Juv.

But I shall observe in general, that inclosures may be traced backward to causes operating in very distant periods: to the rebellious barons in the twelfth century, who manumitted their vassals and gave them free land, in order to conciliate their interest against the king.

Watson, Hist. of Kiddington, p. 26.

A pack of manumitted slaves
Burke, Speech for the Relief of Protestant Dissenters.

MANU'FABLE. adj. [from manure.] Capable of cultivation.

This book gives an account of the manurable lands in every manor. Ilele, Orig. of Manikind.

MANU'RAZE. n. s. [from manure.] Cultivation.

This isle had Brutus unto name;
And, with his Trojans, Brutus began manuring of the same.

Warner, Athlon's England.

MANU'RANCE. n. s. [from manure.] Agriculture; cultivation. An obsolete word, worthy of revival, Dr. Johnson says, citing only the example from Spencer; which might lead one to suppose, that no other authority could be found for it. But it is a word well authorized.

Corn and cattle for the only manurance, tillage, and pasturage of such farms.

Acts of Parl. 21 Hen. VIII. c. xiii. § 8.

Although there should none of them fall by the sword, yet they being kept from manurance, and their cattle from running abroad, by this hard restraint they would quickly devour one another.

Spenser on Ireland.

The more sweetest he will find in putting forward manurance and husbanding of the grounds.
Bacon on the Plantation in Ireland, (1606.)

To MANU'RE. v. a. [manuovure, Fr.] 1. To cultivate by manual labour.

They mock our scant manuring, and require More hands than ours to lop their wanton growth.

Milton, P. L.

2. To dung: to fatten with compost. Manure the fields of shells, reduced by the agitation of the sea to powder, are used for the manuring of land.

Woodward.

3. To fatten as a compost. Revenge her slaughter'd citizens,
Or share their fate: the corps of half her senate Manure the fields of Thersy, while we Sit here, deliberating in cold debates.

Addison, Cato.

MANU'RE. n. s. [from the verb.] Soil to be laid on lands; dung or compost to fatten land.

When the Nile from Tharian fields is fled,
The fat manure with heav'nly fire is warm'd.

Dryden.

Mad makes an extraordinary manure for land that is sandy.

Mortimer, Husbandry.

MANU'REMENT. n. s. [from manure.] Cultivation; improvement.

The manurement of wits is like that of soils, where before the pains of tilling or sowing, men consider what the mould will bear.

Watson on Education.

MANU'ER. n. s. [from the verb.] He who manures land; a husbandman.

MANUSCRIPT. n. s. [manuscrip, French; manuscriptum, Latin.] A book written, not printed.

A collection of rare manuscripts, exquisitely written in Arabic, and sought in the most remote parts by the diligence of Erpeolus, the most excellent linguist, were upon sale to the jewells.

Watson.

Her majesty has perused the manuscript of this opera, and given it her approbation.

Dryden.

MANUTENENCY. n. s. [manutentia, Lat.] Support; maintenance.

Nearly first, that God spared us, and preserved us so long. For without his divine manutency, our strongest fabrics had fallen immediately upon their very builders.

Atty. Sincerity, Sermon, p. 83.

MAN'Y. adj. comp. more, superl. most. [many, Saxon.]

1. Consisting of a great number; numerous; more than few.

Our enemy, and the destroyers of our country, slew many of us.

When many storms descend in the air, the same cause which makes them be many, makes them be light in proportion to their multitude.

Digby on the Soul.

Sufficient that thy prayers are heard, and death, Thus dwy by sentence, when thou didst transgress, Defused of his seizure many days
Giv'n thee of grace, wherein, thou may'st repent,
And not lead act with many deeds well done May'st cover.

The apostles never give the least direction to Christians to appeal to the bishop of Rome for a determination of the many differences which, in those times, happened among men.

Tillotson.

2. Marking number indefinite, or comparative.

Both men and women, as many as were willing, heard, wrought bracelets. Ezod. xxxv. 23.

This yet I apprehend not, why to those Among whom God will deign to dwell on earth, So many and so various laws are given;

So many laws argue so many sins. Milton, P. L.

3. Powerful: with too, in low language.

They come to vie power and caprice: with those that are too high and too many for them.

L'Estrange, Fob.

MAN'Y. n. s. [This word is remarkable in the Saxon for its frequent use, being written with twenty variations: mannege, manego, maniege, manigo, manung, menio, mieniu, menyge, maniege, manzu, manize, manigo, meniege, menego, menegu, meniege, menzo, menizu, menio, menu. Lye.—“Many is supposed by Lye to be derived from man; ‘ac propriè de hominum multitudo usurpatum;’ and thence, according to him, transferred to other things. But many is merely the past participle the Sax. manian, miscere, to mix, to mingle: it means mixed or associated (for that is the effect of mixing) understand company, or any uncertainty and unspecified number of any things.” Mr. H. Tooke, Div. of Parl. ii. 386.—Many is the Gothic manag, whence also the Germ. manige, as well as the Saxon and English words.]

1. A multitude; a company; a great number; people.

After him the racial man ran,

Heaped together in rude rabblement.

Shakspeare, Henry, F. 2.

O thou fond monkey! with what loud applause Didst thou best bear'st with blessing Bolingbroke.

Shakspeare.

I had a purpose now To lead our money into the holy land; Least rest and lying still might make them look Too near into my state.

Shakspeare, Hen. IV.

A care-cra'd mother of a many children.

Shakspeare.

The vulgar and the many are fit only to be led or driven, but by no means fit to guide themselves.

South.

There parting from the king, the chiefs divide, And wheeling east and west, before their many ride.

Dryden.

He is liable to a great many inconveniences every moment of his life.

Tillotson.

Seeing a great many in rich gowns, he was amazed to find that persons of quality were up so early.

Addison, Fables.

2. Retinue of servants; household; family. [old French, manie, manie, manie, manie, a family: in this sense the Saxon is not found.] It is more properly written meiny. See MEINY.

His maïor, which then helen this affray, Came leaping in. Chaucer, Somp. Tale.
The kings before their many rode. Dryden.

5. Many, when it is used before a singular noun, seems to be a substantive. In conversation, for many a man they say a many men. In the north of England a many, and a many people, is common. Thou art a collop of my flesh,
And for thy sake have I shed many a tear.

He is beset with enemies, the meanest of which is not without many and many a way to the wreck-log of a malice. L'Estrange, Fab.
I read were their collars too, and every one
Was set about with many a close steel. Dryden.
Many a child can have the distinct clear ideas of two and three long before he has any idea of infinity. Locke.

6. Many is used much in composition. MA'NYCOLOURED. adj. [many and colour.]
Having various colours.
Hail manycoloured messenger, that he'rt Do't disobey the voice of Jupiter, Shakespeare, Temp.

He hears not me, but on the other side
A manycoloured peacock having spied, Leaves him and me. Dennie.
The hoary majesty of spades appears;
Puts forth one manly leg, and close reveals;
The rest his manycoloured robe conceals. Pope.

MA'NYCORNERED. adj. [many and corner.]
Polygonal; having corners more than twelve: the geometers have particular names for angular figures up to those of twelve corners.

Search those manycornered minds,
Where woman's crooked fancy turns and winds. Dryden.

MA'NYHEADED. adj. [many and head.]
Having many heads.
Is indeed the manyheaded tyranny, prevailed with the rest to make Mankind their chief. Sidney.

The proud Duesse came High mounted on her manyheaded beast. Spenser, F. Q.
The manyheaded beast hath broke,
Or shaken from his head, the royal yoke. Dennie.

These were the preludes of his fate,
That farm'd his manhood to subdue
The hydra of the manyheaded hissing crew. Dryden.

MA'NYLANGUED. adj. [many and language.] Having many languages.
Sack Athlons on the Spartan shore;
He, wandering lonely, a wader circle made,
And manylingued of nations has survey'd. Pope, Odyssey.

MA'NYPEOPLED. adj. [many and people.]
Numerously populous.
He from the manypeopled city flies;
Contains their labours, and the drivers' cries. Sandys.

MA'NYTIMES. an adverbial phrase. Often; frequently.
They are Roman catholics in the device and legend, which are both manysimes taken out of the Scriptures. Addison.

MAP. n. s. [mappa, low Latin.] A geographical picture on which lands and seas are delineated according to the longitude and latitude.
Zellane earnestly entreated Dorus, that he would bestow a map of his little world upon her, that she might see whether it were troubled with such unsuitable climes of cold despairs, and hot rages, as hers was. Sidney.

I will take the map of Ireland, and lay it before me, and make mine eyes my schoolmasters, to give my understanding to judge of your plot. Spenser on Ireland.

Old coins are like so many maps for explaining the ancient geography. Addison on Ant. Coins.
O'er the map my finger taught to stray,
Cross many a region marks the winding way;
From sea to sea, from realm to realm I rove,
And grow a mere geographer by love. Tiddels.

TO MAP. v. a. [from the noun.] To delineate; to set down.
I am near to the place where they should meet, if I'nto his have map'd it right. Shakespeare, Cymbeline.

He thinks it not needful to map out before the traveller every town and village of all the shires, through which he should pass; but only sets down those that lie in his road. Boyle, Hum. p. 387.

MA'PLE tree. n. s. [acer.]
The maple tree hath jagged or angular leaves; the seeds grow two together in hard-winged vessels: there are several species; the greater maple is falsely called the sycamore tree: the common maple is frequent in hedge-rows. Miller.
The platane round,
The enver holme, the maple seldom inward sound. Spenser, F. Q.

Of the roughest maple wood burst to sides they make a strong lyc. Mortimer, Husbandry.

MA'PPERY. n. s. [from map.] The art of planning and designing. Hanmer.
The still and mental parts,
That do contrive how many hands shall strike
When fitness calls them on;
They call this bedwork, mappery, closet war. Shakespeare.

TO MAP. v. a. [amapnan, Saxon, from map, damage, loss.] To injure; to spoil; to hurt; to mischief; to damage.
Loss is no shame, nor to be less than foe,
But to be lesser than himself, doth mar
Both loser's lot, and victor's praise also. Spenser, F. Q.

The master may have only stumble, and perchance fall in teaching, to the marring and maining of the scholar in learning. Addison, Schoolmaster.

When priests are more in words than men,
When brewers mar their malt with water, Shakespeare.
I pray you mar no more trees with writing songs in their barks.
— I pray you mar no more of my verses with reading them ill-favourably. Shakespeare, As you like it.

Beware thine honour, be not then disgrac'd, Take care thou mar not when thou think't to Amuse. Swifto.
Aumarto became the man that all did mar,
Whether through indiscretion, chance, or war. Dennie.

The ambition to prevail in great things is less harmful than that other, to appear in every thing; for that breeds confusion, and *mar*s beauty, when great in dependencies. Bacon, Essays.
O! could we see how cause from cause doth spring!
How mutually they link'd and folded are;
And how oft one disingering string
The harmony doth rather make than mar! Dennie.
Ire, envy, and despair,
Mar'd all his borrow'd vinge, and betray'd Him counterfeit. Milton, P. L.

Had she been there, untimely joy through all Men's hearts diffus'd, had mar'd the funeral. Waller.

Mother!
'Tis much worse my sire to disobey;
Not only you provoke him to your cost,
But mar his; and the good cheer is lost. Dryden.

Pope—has not only misrepresented the story but savoured the character of the poem. Warren, Hist. E. P. I. 950.

MAR. n. s.
1. A blot; an injury. [from the verb.]
My will to write shall match the *mar*s I make in it, [the letter.] Acham, Lett. (1651.)
2. [Mir, Goth. mare; myra, Ss. palus. Sercuius.] A mere or small lake. North. Grose.

MARANATHA. n. s. [Syriack.] It signifies, the Lord comes, or, the Lord is come: it was a form of the denouncing or anathematizing among the Jews. St. Paul pronounces, If any love not the Lord Jesus Christ, let him be anathema maranatha, which is as much as to say, May't thou be devoted to the greatest of evils, and to the utmost severity of God's judgements; may the Lord come quickly to take vengeance of thy crimes. Calmet.

MARA'SMUS. n. s. [marasmus, from maras, a consumption, in which persons waste much of their substance. Quincy.
Pining strictly,

A marasmus imports a consumption following a fever; a consumption or withering of the body by reason of a natural extinction of the native heat, and an extenuation of the body, caused through an immoderate heat. Harvey.

MARA'UDER. n. s. [marauder, French, from the old word maraud, a scoundrel, a rogue, a vagabond a beggar. Cotgrave.] It has been pretended that the word has its name from a Count de Merodé, a brutal and licentious officer, in the time of Gustavus Adolphus, and that it should be written merodeurs. Harte's Life of Gustavus Adolphus, vol. ii. p. 70. But the word was common long before that time, as the dictionary of Cotgrave shews. Roussetot cites the still more ancient French word marander, i. e. "marauder, chercher à voler, à escroquer, chercher des aventures, chercher de quoi vivre; les soldats dise encore, aller en marande, ou sarander, pour piller, escroquer." Marauder is therefore the orthography. Coles has marrow for a knave or beggarly rascal. Dict. 1685. A plunderer; a pillager.

We ought to write marauders, [from the pretended etymology of Merodé], not marauders. Harte, Hist. of Gust. Adolphus.

MARA'UDING. n. s. [marauder, French.] Roving about in quest of plunder; robbing; destroying.

MARAVE'D. n. s. [Arab.] A small Spanish copper coin, of less value than our farthing.

MAR'BLE. n. s. [marbre, French; marmor, Latin.]

1. Stone used in statues and elegant buildings, capable of a bright polish, and in a strong heat calcining into lime.
He plies her hard, and much rain wears the marble. Shakespeare.
The marble bre'st, ere long to part with breath,
And houses rear'd, unsanctified of thy death. Sandys.

Some dry their corn infected with the brine,
Then grind with marbles, and prepare to dice.

Dryden.

The two flat sides of two pieces of marble will more easily approach, each other, between which there is nothing but water or air, than if there be a diamond between them; not that the parts of the diamond are more solid, but because the parts of water being more easily separable, give way to the approach of the two pieces of marble. Locke.

2. Little balls supposed to be of marble, with which children play.

Marbles taught them perception, and the laws of motion; nut-crackers the use of the lever.

Arbutnot and Pope.

3. A stone remarkable for the sculpture or inscription; as, the Oxford marbles.

MARBLE, adj.

Pygmalion's fate reverse'd is mine,
His marble love took flesh and blood,
All that I worship'd as divine,
That beauty, now 'tis understood,
Appears to have no more of life,
Than that whereof he fram'd his wife. Waller.

2. Variegated, or stained like marble.

Shall I see far-fetched inventions? shall I labour to lay marble colours over my ruinous thoughts?
or rather, though the pureness of my virgin-mind be stained, let me keep the true simplicity of my words.

Shelley.

The appendix shall be printed by itself, stitched, and with a marble cover.

Swift.

To MARBLE, v. a. [marbrer, Fr. from the noun.] To variegate, or vein like marble.

Very well sleeked marbled paper did not cast any of its distinct colours upon the wall with an equal diffusion.

Dryden.

Marbled with sage the hardening cheese she press'd,
And yellow butter Marian's skill profus'd.

Gay, Pastoral.

MARBLEHEARTED, adj. [marble and heart.]
Cruel; insensible; hard-hearted.

Ingratulate! thou marblehearted fiend,
More hideous, when thou show'st a face in a child,
Than the sea monster. Shakespeare, A. Lear.

MARCASITE, n. s.

The term marcasite has been very improperly used by some for bismuth, and by others for zink; the more accurate writers however always express a substance different from either of these by it, sulphureous and metallic. The marcasite is a solid hard fossil, naturally found among the veins of ores, or in the fissures of stone; the variety of forms this mineral puts on is almost endless. There are however only three distinct species of it; one of a bright gold colour, another of a bright silver, and a third of a dead white: the silvery one seems to be peculiarly meant by the writers on the Materia Medica. Marcasite is very frequent in the mines of Cornwall, where the workmen call it mundick, but more in Germany, where they extract vitriol and sulphur from it. Hill.

The writers of minerals give the name pyrites and marcasites indifferently to the same sort of body: I restrain the name of pyrites wholly to the nodules, or those that are found lodged in strata that are separate: the marcasite is part of the matter that either constitutes the stratum, or is lodged in the perpendicular fissures. Woodward, Met. Fossils.

The acid salt dissolved in water is the same with oil of sulphur per campanum, and abounding much in the bowels of the earth, and particularly in marcasites, united itself to the other ingredients of the marcasites, which are bismuth, iron, copper, and earth, and with them compounds alum, vitriol, and sulphur; with the earth alone it compounds alum; with the metal alone, and metal and earth together, it compounds vitriol; and with the bismuth and earth it compounds sulphur; whence it comes to pass, that marcasites abound with those three minerals. Newton, Opticks.

Here marcasites in various figures wait,
To ripen to a true metallic state. Garth, Dispens.

MARCH, n. s. [from Mars.] The third month of the year.

March is drawn in tawny, with a fierce aspect, a helmet upon his head, to show this month was dedicated to Mars. Poetom on Drawing.

To MARCH, v. n. [marcher, French, for varicare, Venage; from Mars, Junius.]

1. To move in military form.

Well march we on,
To give obedience where 'tis truly ow'd. Shakspeare.
He march'd in battle array with his power against Artapharn. Jud. i. 13.

Macabeus march'd forth, and slew five-and-twenty thousand persons. 2 Mac. xii. 26.

My father, when some days before his death
He order'd me to march for Utica, Addison, Cato.
Wept o'er me.

2. To walk in a grave, deliberate, or stately manner.

Petrarch finding that if nothing else, famine would at last bring him to destruction, thought better by humbleness to creep where by pride he could not march. Silvius.

Doth York intend no harm to us,
That thus he marcheth with three arm in Shakspeare.

Our bodies, every footstep that they make,
March towards death, until at last they die. Drayton.
Like thee, great son of Joy, like thee,
Men clad in rising majesty,
Thou marchest down o'er Delos' hills. Prior.

The power of wisdom March'd before,
Pope, Ode.

To MARCH, v. a.

1. To put in military movement.

Cyrus marching his army for divers days over meads of snow, the dazzling splendour of its whiteness prejudiced the sight of very many of his soldiers. Boyle on Colours.

2. To bring in regular procession.

March them again in fair array,
And bid them form the happy day;
The happy day they'd go to wait.
On William's fate, and Europe's fate. Prior.

To MARCH, v. n. To border; to join.
See the fifth sense of MARCH.

That was in a stranger land,
Which March'd upon Chimære. Bacon, Conf. Am. B. 4.

MARCH, n. s. [marcher, French.]

1. Military movement; journey of soldiers.

These troops came to the army harassed with a long and wearisome march, and cast away their arms and garments, and fought in their shirts. Spenser, Faerie Queene.

Who should command, by his Almighty aid,
Three chosen troops, unconscious of the road,
And unacquainted with the appointed end,
Their marches to begin, and thither tend. Hickmore.

2. Grave and solemn walk.

Waller was smooth, but Dryden taught to join
The varying verse, the full rounding line,
The long majestic march, and energy divine. Pope.

3. Deliberate or laborious walk.

We came to the roots of the mountain, and had a very troublesome march to gain the top of it.

Addison on Italy.

4. Signal to move.

The drum presently striking up a march, they make no longer stay, but forward they go directly.

Knox.

5. Marches, without singular. [marks, Gothic; meap, Saxon; marche, Fr. Barbazan and Roquefort assert that this word undoubtedly comes from the Latin margin, the ablative case of margo, a margin; but it is from the Gothic word in the sense of a mark defining a boundary; and thus we use landmark.] Borders; limits; confines.

They of those marshes — Shall be a wall sufficient to defend
Our island from the pilfering borders. Shakspeare.

The English colonies were enforced to keep constant guards upon the borders and marshes round them.

It is not fit that a king of an island should have any marshes or borders but the four seas.

Davies on Ireland.

MARCHEUR, n. s. [from marcheure, French.] President of the marshes or borders.

Many of our English lords made war upon the Welshmen at their own charge; the lands which they gained they held to their own use; they were called lords-marchers, and had royal liberties.

Davies on Ireland.

MARCHING, n. s. [from march.] Military movement; of soldiers.

All that heard the noise of their multitude, and the marching of the company, and the rattling of the banners, were moved; for the army was very great and mighty. 1 Macc. vi. 41.

MARCHIONESS, n. s. [feminine, formed by adding ion to the English female termination to the Latin marchio. Dr. Johnson.

— The old Fr. marcioness is used for marquis. Our marcioness was formerly marquis, as in the genuine edition of Bacon's Apophthegms; in which Dr. Johnson has given the word, from a modernized one, marcioness.
And in Chaucer, markeissar. See MARQUIS.
The wife of a marquis; a lady raised to the rank of marquis.

The king's majesty
Does purpose honour to you, no less flowing Than marcioness of Pembroke. Shakspeare, Hen. VIII.

No marcioness, but now a queen.
Milton, Epit. M. of Winchester.

The lady marcioness, his wife, solicited very diligently the timely preservation of her husband.
Clovenland.

MARCHPANE, n. s. [massepaine, French;
in which language the Latin masa para;
supposed to be from the Latin masa para.]
A kind of sweet bread or biscuit, such as we now call a macaroon; a sort of confection.

Along whose ridge such bones are met,
Like confection round in marcpane set. Silvius.

Good thou, save me a piece of marcpane.
Shakspeare, Rom. and Jul.

This marcpane is very good to procure sweat,
and it refresheth and nourisheth the body withal.
Steward on Long Melancholy, (1603), p. 362.

MARCID, adj. [marcidus, Latin.] Lean; pining; withered.

A burning colliculative fever, the softer parts being melted away, the heat continuing its adu-tion upon the drier and fleshy parts, changes into a marcid fever.

 He on his own fish pours the noxious oil;
 Tis to your marcid dying herbs assign'd;
 By the rank smell and taste betrays his kind.

Dryden.

MA'RCOUR. n. s. [marcor, Latin.] Leanness; the state of withering; waste of flesh.

Considering the exaltation and languor ensuing the action of venery in some, the extension and marcor in others, it much abridgeth our days.

Bacon, Vulg. Err.

A marcor is either imperfect, tending to a lesser withering, which is curable; or perfect, that is, an entire wasting of the body, excluding all means of cure.

Harvey.

MARD. • See MERD.

MARE. n. s. [mape, Saxon.]

1. The female of a horse.

A pair of couriers born of heavenly breed,
 Whom Ceres stole from her celestial sieve,
 By substituting mares, produc'd on earth,
 Whose wombs conceiv'd a more than mortal birth.

Dryden.

2. [From marra, the name of a spirit imputed to torment sleepers.] A kind of torpor or stagnation, which seems to press the stomach with a weight; the night hag.

Mad, his merry queen by night,
 Boastries young folks that lie upright,
 In elder times the mare that high,
 Which plagues them out of measure.

Dryden, Nymphid.

Mushrooms cause the incubus, or the mare in the stomach.

Bacon, Not. Hist.

MARE. • Used for more in the north of England. [mape, Sax.]

MA'RESCHAL† n. s. [mareschal, French, derived by most etymologists from mare, Teut. equus, equa, a horse or mare, and scalc, a servant, and so came to denominate the distinguished officer called master of the horse, and thence a commander in chief. See MARSHALL.] A chief commander of an army.

O William, may thy arms advance,
 That he may lose himself next year,
 And so be mareschal of France.

Prior.

MA'RGARITE† n. s. [margarita, Latin; marguerite, French.] A pearl.

Like to a marchant that seeketh gode margaritis.

The one, the margarite or pearl; the other, the cabinet or ark to keep this jewel.
By. King. Vire. Putative, (1614.) p. 6.

MARKE. n. s. [marc, Welsh; weapac, Saxon; mercke, Dutch; marque, French.]

1. A token by which any thing is known.

Once was proclaimed throughout all Ireland, that all men should mark their cattle with an open oval mark upon their flanks or buttocks, so as if they happen to be stolen, they might appear whose they were.

Spenser on Ireland.

In the present form of the earth there are certain marks and indications of its first state; with which, if we compare those things that are recorded in sacred history, we may discover what the earth was in its first original.

Burck.

The urine is a lixivium of the salts in a human body, and the proper mark of the state and quantity of such salts; and therefore very certain indications for the choice of diet may be taken from the state of urine.

Arbutnot on Aliments.

2. A stamp; an impression.

But cruel fate, and my more cruel wife,
To Grecian swords betray'd my sleeping life:
These are the monuments of Helen's love.

He would strike them — with some markable punishment.

Sir E. Sand's State of Religion, F. 2. 1.

MAR'KET. n. s. [marquer, French, from mark.]

1. One that puts a mark on any thing.

2. One that notes, or takes notice.

Mathematicians are the same thing to mechanicks, as markers at tennis-courts are to gamesters.

MAR'KET. † n. s. [anciently written mercat, of mercatus, Latin. Dr. Johnson.]

The word is the Sax. markje, which escaped the notice of Serenius, who gives the Germ. markt, forum; Cambr. and Swed. marknad; Goth. markad, nundine; vox antiqua; a mark, marca, quia unice pecuniam numerabant vet.†

1. A public time, and appointed place, of buying and selling.

We were glad that the privilege of a market were given to censure them for their delinquency; for there is nothing done sooner cause rivalry than in many market towns, by reason the people enjoy long after they will learn civil manners.

Spenser.

Minors, know yourself, down on your knees, And thank Heaven, fasting, for a good man's love:

For I must tell you friendly in your ear,
Sell when you can, you are not for all markets.

Shakespeare.

They counted our life a pasture, and our time here a market for gain.

Wid. xv. 12.

If one bushel of wheat and two of barley will, in the market, be taken one for another, they are of equal worth.

Locke.

2. Purchase and sale.

With another year's continuance of the war, there will hardly be money left in this kingdom to turn the common markets, or pay rents.

Temple.

The precious weight
Of pepper and salt, and incense take,
And with post-haste they running market make,
Be sure to turn the penny.

Dryden, Pers.

3. Rate; price. [marché, French.]

'Twas then old soldiers, cover'd o'er with scars, Thought all past services rewarded well,
To, to their share, at least two acres fell,
Their country's frugal loyalty; so of old
Was blood and life at a low market sold.

Dryden, Jan.

TO MARK'ET. v. n. To deal at a market; to buy or sell; to make bargains.

MAR'KET-BELL. n. s. [market and bell.] The bell to give notice that trade may begin in the market.

Enter, go in, the market-bell is rung.

Shakespeare, Hen. VI.

MAR'KET-CROSS. n. s. [market and cross.] A cross set up where the market is held.

These things you have articulated,
Proclaim'd at market-crosses, read in churches,
To face the garment of rebellion
With some fine colour.

Shakespeare, Hen. VI.

MAR'KET-DAY. n. s. [market and day.] The day on which things are publicly bought and sold.

Pool that I was, I thought imperial Rome,
Like Mantua, where on market-days we come,
And thither drive our lambs. Dryden, Virg.
He ordered all the Lacquies to be seized that were found on a market-day in one of his frontier towns. Addison on Italy.

MAR'KET-FOLKS. n. s. [market and folks.]
People that come to the market.
Poor market-folks, that come to sell their corn. Shakspeare.

MAR'KET-MAID. n. s. [market and maid.]
A woman that goes to buy or sell.
You are come.
A market-maid to Rome, and have prevented
The ostentation of our love. Shakspeare, Ant. and Cleop.

MAR'KET-MAN. n. s. [market and man.]
One who goes to the market to sell or buy.
Be wary how you place your words,
Talk like the vulgar sort of market-men,
That come to gather money for their corn. Shakspeare.

The market-man should act as if his master's whole estate never had to be applied to that servant's business. Suff.

MAR'KET-PLACE. n. s. [market and place.]
Place where the market is held.
The king, thinking he had put up his sword, because of the noise, never took leisure to hear his answering, but made him prisoner, meaning the next morning to put him to death in the market-place. Sidney.

The gates be order'd all to be unbar'd;
And from the market-place to draw the guard. Dryden.

Behold the market-place with poor o'er-crowd,
The man of Ross divides the weekly bread. Pope.

MAR'KET-PRICE. n. s. [market and price.]
MAR'KET-RATE. or rate. The price at which any thing is currently sold.
Money governs the world, and the market-price is the measure of the worth of men as well as of fishes. L'Ettranger.

He that wants a vessel, rather than lose his market will not stick to have it at the market-rate. Lodge.

MAR'KET-TOWN. n. s. A town that has the privilege of a stated market; not a village.
Nothing doth sooner cause civility in any country than market-days, by reason that people repairing often thither will learn civil manners of the better sort. Syracuse.

No, no, the pope's mire my master Sir Roger stated, when they would have burnt him at our market-town. Gey.

MAR'KETABLE. adj. [from market.]
1. Such as may be sold; such for which a buyer may be found.
A plain fish, and no doubt marketable. Shakspeare.

2. Current in the market.
The pretorian soldiers arrived to that impudence, that after the death of Perinax they made open sale of the empire, as if it had been of common marketable wares. Decay of Chr. Jewry.

The marketable value of any quantities of two commodities are equal, when they will exchange
one for another. Lodge.

MAR'KMAN. n. s. [mark and man.]
1. A man skilful to hit a mark.
In sadnew, cousin, I do lose a woman.
— I aim'd so near when I suppos'd you lov'd,
— A right good marksmen. Shakspeare, Rom. and Jul.

When nothing can procure,
When the wide world runs bias from his will,
To write his limbs, and share, not mend the ill;
This is the marksmen, safe and sure,
Who still is right, and prays to be so still. Herbert.

An ordinary marksmen may know certainly when he shoots less wide at what he aims. Dryden.

2. One who cannot write his name, but makes his mark or sign for it.
In the original solemn League and Covenant, which hath been lately discovered, and is now in the British Museum, there are abundance of marksmen, all of whom, from their abhorrence of popery at that time, leave the cross unfinished, and sign in the shape of the letter T. Newton and Burn, Hist. of Church. (1777) p. 324.

MARL. n. s. [marl. Welsh; mergel, Dutch; margu, Latin; marle, marne, Fr. in Saxon, merg is marrow, with an allusive signification, marl being the fatness of the earth.]
Marl is a kind of clay, which is become fatter, and of a more enriching quality, by a better fermentation, and by its having lain so deep in the earth as not to have spent or weakened its fertilizing quality by any product.
Marl is supposed to be much of the nature of chalk, and is believed to be fertile from its salt and oily quality. Quincy.

We understand by the term marle simple native earths, less heavy than the loess, or clays, not soft and adhesive to the touch, nor ductile white moist, dry and crumbling between the fingers, and readily diffusible in water. Hill.

Marl is the best compost, as having most nutrition, and not heating the ground too much. Bacon, Nat. Hist.

Uneasy steps
Over the burning marl, not like those steps
On heaven's azure. Milton, P. L.

To MARL. v. a. [from the noun.] To manure with marl.
Improvements by marling, liming, and draining, have been since money was at five and six per cent.

the sails with marline. Ainsworth.

MAR'LEON. n. See MERLIN.

MAR'LINE. n. s. [meanp. Skinner.] Long wreaths of untwisted hemp dipped in pitch, with which the ends of cables are guarded against friction.

Some the gall'd ropes with dawby marline bind,
Or wearloath masts with strong tarpawling coats. Dryden.

MAR'LINEPIER. n. s. A small piece of iron for fastening ropes together, or to open the bolt rope when the sail is to be sewed in. Bailey.

MAR'PIT. n. s. [marl and pit.] Pit out of which marl is dug.
Several others, of different figures, were found;
part of them in a rivulet, the rest in a marl-pit in a field. Wardlaw.

MAR'PLY. adj. [from marl.] Abounding with marl.
The fat and marly mold. Dryden, Polyd. S. 3.

The oak thrives best on the richest clay, and will procreate strangely to come at a marly bottom. Morimer.

MAR'MALADE. n. s. [marmelade, Fr. mar-MA'RMALLET. n. s. [melo, Portuguese, a quince.]

upon its own fat. Roy on Creation.

MAR'QUETRY. n. s. [marqueterie, French.]
Chequered work; work inlaid with variation.

MAR'QUEST. n. s. [marquis, French; Marquis. n. s. [marquis, Latin; margrave, German.]

The spelling of this word was formerly markis, as in Chaucer; and marquiese, for marquiesse; then marquess, which method of writing it is now also used by some.]

1. In England one of the second order of nobility, next in rank to a duke.
None may wear ermine but princes, and there is a certain number of ranks allowed to dukes, marquises, and earls, which they must not exceed.

Marquise as a Drum-major Marc or merc signifying a bound or limit, hence is supposed the original of that honorary title of marquess, which is as much as a lord of the frontiers.
Selden on Drington's Polyd. S. 7.

2. Formerly a marquiesse also. [marquise, French.]
You shall have
Two noble partners with you: the old dutches
Of Norfolk, and the lady marquess Dorset. Shakspeare.

From a private gentleman he made me a marquise, and from a marquise a queen; and now he intends to crown my innocence with the glory of martyrdom. Bacon, Apophthegms, (ed.) 1625.

The first and last woman that was created a marquess, was the lady Ann Boleyn. Spelman.

MAR'QUISATE. n. s. [marquisat, French.]
The seigniorship of a marquis.
The duke of Savoy pretended colourably enough to the forehead marquess. Wotton, Itcm. p. 416.

MAR'RAER. n. s. [from marl.] One who spoils or hurts any thing.

You be indeed makers, or marrows, of all men's manners within the realm. Archam, Schoolmaster.
MARRIABLE.* adj. [marriable, F. Cotgrave.] Marriageable. Not in use.

Hulot, and Sherwood.
MARRIAGE-† n. s. [marriage, French; maritium, low Latin, from maritus.] The act of uniting a man and woman for life; state of perpetual union.

The marriage with his brother's wife
 Has crept too near his conscience.

Shakespeare, Hen. VIII.
 If that thy heart of love be honourable,
 Thy purpose marriage, send me word to-morrow.

Shakespeare.
 The French king would have the disposing of the marriage of Bretagne, with an exception, that he should not marry her himself.

Bacon.
 Some married persons, even in their marriage, do better please God than some virgins in their state of virginity; they, by giving great example of conjugal affection, by preserving their faith unbroken, and by educating children in the fear of God, please God in a higher degree than those virgins whose piety is not answerable to their opportunities.

Taylor.
 I propose that Palamon shall be,
 In marriage join'd with beautiful Emily.

Dryd.
MARRIAGE is often used in composition.
 In a late draught of marriage-articles, a lady stipulated with her husband, that she shall be at liberty to patch on which side she pleases.

Addison, Spect.
 I by the honour of my marriage-bed,
 After Arthur claim this land for mine.

Shakespeare.
 To those whom death again did wed,
 This grave's the second marriage-bed:
 For though the hand of fate could force
 'Twixt soul and body a divorce,
 It could not sever man and wife,
 Because they both liv'd but one life.

Crashaw.
 There on his arms and once lo! portall lay,
 Thither our fatal marriage-bed convey. Drum.
 Thou shalt come into the marriage-chamber.

Tob. vi. 16.
 Neither her worthiness, which in truth was great, nor his own suffering for her, which is wont to endear affection, could fether his sickness; but before the marriage-day appointed, he had taken to wife Hecuba, of whom she complained, Sidney.
 Virgin, awake! the marriage-hour is nigh.

Pope.
 Give me, to live and die,
 A spotless maid, without the marriage-sie.

Dryd.
MARRIAGEABLE† adj. [from marriage.]
 1. Fit for wedlock; of age to be married.

Says not yet marriageable.
Expos. of Solomon's Song, (1585), p. 265.
 Every wedding, one with another, produces four children, and that is the proportion of children which any marriageable man or woman may be presumed shall have.

Ground.
 I am the father of a young heiress, whom I begin to look upon as marriageable. Spectator.
 When the girls are twelve years old, which is the marriageable age, their parents take them home.

Saunders.
 2. Capable of union.

They led the vine
 To weed her elm; she, spouse, about him twines
 Her marriageable arms, and with her bringings
 Her dowers, the adopted clusters to adorn
 His barren leaves. Milton, P. L.

Milton, P. L.
MARRIED. adj. [from marry.] Conjugal;
 connubial.

Thus have you shunn'd the married state.
Dryden.

MARROW. n. s. [mepr, Saxon; smerr, Erse; smerrgh, Scottish.]

All the bones of the body which have any considerable thickness have either a large cavity, or they are spongy, and full of little cells; in both the one and the other there is an oleaginous substance, called marrow, contained in proper vesicles or membranes, like the fat:
 in the larger bones this fine oil, by the gentle heat of the body, is exhaled through the pores of its small bladders, and enters some narrow passages, which lead to some fine canals excavated in the substance of the bone, that the marrow may supply the fibres of the bones, and render them less apt to break. Quincy.

Would he were wasted, marrow, bones, and all,
 That from his loins no hopeful branch may spring.

Shakespeare.
 The skull hath brains as a kind of marrow within it: the back-bone hath no kind of marrow, and other bones of the body hath another: the jaw-bones have no marrow stirred, but a little pulp of marrow diffused.

Bacon.
 Pamper'd and edified their zeal
 With marrow puddings many a meal. Hudibras.
 He bit the dart, and wrench'd the wood away,
 The point still buried in the marrow lay.

Addison, Or.
MARROW-† In the Scottish dialect, to this day, a fellow, companion, or associate, as also an equal match; he met with his marrow; from mar, husband, French. Dr. Johnson.—It is also a word of the north of England. "These gloves or shoes are not marrows, i. e. are not fellows." Coles, Ray, and Grose.

Though buying and selling doth wonderful well,
 Yet chopping and changing I cannot commend
 With thee or his marrow for fear of it end.

Tassie.
 To MARROW* v. a. To fill as it were with marrow and fatness; to glut.

What mean these strict reformers thus to spend their hour-glances, and bowl against our harmless cups? to call our meetings riots, and brand our civil mirth with styles of loose intemperance?
 whilst they can sit at a sister's feast, devour and gourmandise beyond excess, and wipe the gull from off their marrowed mouths, and clothe their surfeits in the long fustian robes of a tedious grace!
Quarles, Judg. and Mercy, The Drunkard.

MARROWBONE-† n. s. [bone and marrow.]
 1. Bone boiled for the marrow.

A cook they hadden with them for the bones,
 To boile the chickens and the marrowbones.

Shakespeare, T. C. Prod.
 2. In burlesque language, the knees. Dr.
 Johnson.—I'll bring him down upon his marrow-bones, that is, I'll make him bend his knees as he does to the Virgin Mary.
 See also MARRY. Brandt, Popular Antiquities.

What men could have held laughing to have seen an Egyptian on his marrowbones adoring a dog, or praying to an ox?

Lightfoot, Maecell. (1629), p. 189.
 Upon this he fell down upon his marrowbones, and begged of Jupiter to give him a pair of horns.

L'Entrance.
 Down on your marrowbones, upon your allegiance; and make an acknowledgement of your offences; for I will have ample satisfaction.

Dryden, Spem. Piv.
MARROWFAT. n. s. A kind of pea.

MARROWISH.* adj. [from marrow.] Of the nature of marrow.

The brain is a soft, marrowish, and white substance. Durton, Anat. of Mel. p. 19.

MARROWLESS. adj. [from marrow.] Void of marrow.

Avast!
 Thy bones are marrowless, thy blood is cold;
 Thou hast no speculation in those eyes,
 Which thou dost glare with! Shakespeare, Macb.

MARROW.* adj. [from marrow.]
 1. Pithy; full of strength or sap.

Cotgrave, and Sherwood.
 2. Medullary; of the nature of marrow.
 Those marrowy filaments lying parallel to one another cannot, of themselves, be supposed in any degree elastic.

Annoir's Essay on the Nerves, (1739), p. 30.

MARRY.* interj. A term of asseveration in common use; which was originally, in popish times, a mode of swearing by the Virgin Mary, q. d. by Mary. Brand.
Mary, I defy that false mad John.

Chaucer, Shipm. Tale.
Col. With thou be pleas'd!

To haucken once again the suit I made thee?
Be. Marry will I; kneel and repeat it; I will stand, and so shall Trinculin. Shakespeare, Tempest.
Marry, once before he won it of me with false dice.

Shakespeare, Much Ado.
 The adrook of his life is like that of the sun,
marry, not half so glorious. Overbury, Prisoner.
 How do you like me now?
 —Like you I marry — I don't know.

Southey, Oronoko.

To MARRY. v. a. [marier, French; ma-
rior, Lat.]

1. To join a man and woman; as performing the rite.
 What! shall the curate control me? Tell him, that he shall marry the couple himself.

Gay, What d'ye call it.

2. To dispose of in marriage.
 When Augustus consulted with Mecenas about the marriage of his daughter Julia, Mecenas took the liberty to tell him, that he must either marry his daughter to Agrippa, or take away his life;
 there was no third way, he had made him so great.

Bacon, Ess.
 3. To take for husband or wife.

You'd think it strange if I should marry her.

Shakespeare.
 As a mother shall she meet him, and receive him as a wife married of a virgin. Ecclesi. xv. 2.

To MARRY. v. n. To enter into the conjugal state.

He hath my good will,
 And none but he, to marry with Nan Page.

Shakespeare.
 Let them marry to whom they think best.

Nam. xxvii. 6.
 Virgil concludes with the death of Trojans; for after that difficulty was removed, Aeneas might marry, and establish the Trojans.

Dryden, DuRoi.
MARRS.* n. s. [Latin.]

1. One of the plants.
Mars his true moving, even as in the heavens,
 So in the earth to this day is not known.

Shakespeare, Hen. VI. P. I.

2. Among chymists, the term for iron.
MARRS, are derived from the Saxon
MARRS, { mepr, a fen, or fenny place.
MAS, { Gibson's Camden.

MARRS. n. s. [mepr, Sax. See MARRISH.]
 A fen; a bog; a swamp; a watery tract of land.

In their courses make that round,
 In meadows and in marshes found,

Of them so call'd the ferry ground,
Of which they have the keeping.

Drayton, Nymphid.
Warms for colour and shade, after even as the ground out of which they are got; as the marsh warm and the stag warm. Warton, Angler.

We may see in more contentious climates great variety in the people thereof; the up-lands in England yield strong, sinewy, hardy men; the marsh-lands, men of large and high stature.

Hale, Orig. of Manhood.
Your low meadows and marsh-lands you need not lay up till April, except the spring be very wet, and your marshes very poesy.

Mortimer, Husbandry.
MARSH-MALLOW. n. s. [althera, Latin.] It is in all respects like the mallow, but its leaves are more soft and woolly. Miller.

MARSH-MARIGOLD. n. s. [populego, Latin.]
This flower consists of several leaves, which are placed circularly, and expand in form of a rose, in the middle of which rises the pointal, which becomes a membranaceous fruit, in which there are several cells, for the most part bent downwards, collected into little heads and full of seeds. Miller.

And set soft hyacinths with lron-blue,
To shade marsh-marigolds of shining hue. Dryden.

MARSHAL. n. s. [mareschal, Fr. See MARESCHAL. Serenius calls it "Antiq.
Franc. vox, à Goth. mar, equus, and skall vel skale, servus, administrator."
So Selden: "The name of marshal or mareschal is agreed to descend from two Teutonic words, (which was the same with the old French,) mare, which signified as much as our general name of horse, and schalk, that in the old German and Gothic tongues signified a servant." Duclun, ch. 9. "Marshal was at first the name of a smith, farrier, or one that dressed horses; but it climbed by degrees to that height, that the chiefest commanders of the gendarmery and militia of France are come to be called marshals; which about a hundred years since were but two in all, whereas now they are twelve." Howell,
Lett. iv. 19.]

1. The chief officer of arms.
The duke of Suffolk claims
To be high steward; next the duke of Norfolk
To be earl marshal. Shakspeare.

2. An officer who regulates combats in the lists.
Dares their pride pursue against my laws,
As in a listed fight to fight their cause?
Unask'd the royal grant, no marshal by;
As kingly rites require, nor judge to try. Dryden.

3. Any one who regulates rank or order at a feast, or any other assembly.
Through the hall there walked to and fro
A jolly yeoman, marshal of the same,
Whose name was Appetite; he did bestow
Both guests and meats, whenever they came,
And knew them how to order without blame. Symonds, P. Q.

4. An harbinging; a pursuivant, one who goes before a prince to declare his coming, and provide entertainment.
Her face, when it was fairest, had been but as a marshal to lodge, the love of her in his mind, which more was so well placed as it needed no help of outward harbinging. Sidney.

VOL. II.

5. A commander in chief of military forces.
Marshal Harcourt and the duke of Berwick were preparing to join at Alace and Dauphiné, but their troops were in want of all manner of necessaries. Trotter, No. 5.

To MARSHAL. v. a. [from the noun.]

1. To arrange; to rank in order.
Multitude of jealousies, and lack of some predominant desire, that should marshal and put in order all the rest, maketh any man's heart hard to find or sound. Bacon.

It is as inconceivable how it should be the directrix of such intricate motions, as that a blind man should marshal an army. Glanville, Scrips.

Anchises look'd not with so pleas'd a face,
To nursing o'er his future Roman race,
And marshalling the heroes of his name,
As in their order, next to light they came. Dryden.

2. To lead as an harbinging.
Thou marshal'st me the way that I was going.

Shakspeare.
MARSHALLER. n. s. [from marshal.] One that arranges; one that ranks in order.
Dryden was the great refiner of English poetry, and the best marshal of words.

Prepp. Pref. to the Alaric.
MARSHALSEA. n. s. [from marshal.] The prison in Southwark belonging to the marshal of the king's household.

MARSHALSHIP. n. s. [from marshal.] The office of a marshal.

MARSH-LODE. n. s. A gelder-rose, of which it is a species.

MARSH-ROCKET. n. s. A species of water-cresses.

MARSHY. adj. [from marsh.]
1. Boggy; wet; fenny; swampy.
Though there the marshy grounds approach your fields,
And there the soil a stony harvest yields.

Dryden, Virg.
It is a distemper of such as inhabit marshy, fat,
low, moist, soils, near stagnating water.

Arbuthnot on Diet.
2. Produced in marshes.

Feed
With delicates of leaves and marshy weed. Dryd.

MART. n. s. [contracted from market.]

1. A place of publick traffick.
Christ could not suffer that the temple should serve for a place of mart, nor the apostle of Christ that the church should be made an inn. Hooker.

If any born at Ephesus
Be seen at Syracusan marts and fairs,
He dies. Shakspeare.

Excelsed, in the description of Tyre, and the exceeding trade that it had with all the East, as the only mart town, reciteth both the people with whom they converse, and also what commodities every country yielded. Religh.

Many come to a great mart of the best horses.

Temple.
The French, since the accession of the Spanish monarchy, supply with cloth the best mart we had in Europe. Addison.

2. Bargain; purchase and sale.

I play a merchant's part,
And venture snidly on a desperate mart. Shakspeare.

3. Letters of Mart. Licence of reprisals.
A corruption of mark. See the eighth sense of MARK. And Coigrave, "Droit de marque, power to seize the body and goods of another."

To pick out letters of mart, and to have commission to kill mart, &c. Sp. Cowden, Hiccup, (1653.) p. 20.

To MART. v. a. [from the noun.] To traffick; to buy or sell.

Sooth when I was young I wou'd have ransack'd

The pedlar's silken treasury, you've let him go,
And nothing marted with him. Shakspeare, Wind. Tale.

Cassius, you yourself,
Do sell and mart your office for gold
To underweavers. Shakspeare, Jul. Cæs.

Poor brats were slaves, of bondsmen that were born,
And marted, sold. Shakspeare, Measure for Measure.

Marton, Scourge of Vill. (1598.) l. 2.
Your christening of bells, marting of pardons, towing of beads. Bp. Hall, Epist. D. i. Ep. 1.

To MART. v. n. To trade dishonourably.

If he shall think it fit,
A saucy stranger, in his court, to mart
As in a stew. Shakspeare, Cymb.

MARTAGON. n. s. A kind of lily.

The roscid and honey drops observable in the flowers of martagon. Sir T. Brown, Muscul. p. 20.

To MARTEL. v. n. [martellere, Italian;
martelo, low Lat. marteler, Fr. from martellus, Lat. a hammer.] To strike;
to make a blow.

Her dreadful weapon she to him address'd,
Which on his helmet martel'd so hard,
That made him low incline his lofty crest,
And bow'd his better'd visage to his breast.

Symonds, P. Q. lib. vii. 42.

MARTEIN. n. s. marie, martie, Fr. mar-
MARTEIN. n. s. [tes, Lat.]

1. A large kind of weasel, whose fur is much valued.

2. [Martelet, Fr.] A kind of swallow that builds in houses; a martlet.

A churchwarden, to express St. Martin's in the Fields, caused to be engraven, on the company cup, a martin, a bird like a swallow, sitting upon a mole hill between two trees.

Pemphon on Blowing.

MARTIAL. adj. [martialis, French; mar-
tialis, Lat.]

1. Warlike; fighting; given to war; brave.
I into my feeble breast
Come greatly, but not with that mighty rage
Wherewith the martial troops thou dost infect,
And hearts of great heroes dost enrage.

Symonds, P. Q.

The queen of martialis,
And Mars himself conducted them. Chapman, Hind.

It hath seldom been seen, that the far southern people have invaded the northern, but contrariwise; whereby it is manifest, that the northern trade of the world is the more martial region.

Bacon, Ess.

His subjects call'd aloud for war;
But peaceful kings o'er martial people set,
Each other's peace and countenance are. Dryd.

2. Having a warlike show; suiting war.

See
His thousands, in what martial equipage They issue forth! Steel bows and shafts their arms,
Of equal dread in flight or in pursuit.

Milton, P. R.

When our country's cause provokes to arms,
How martial music every bosom warms. Pope.

3. Belonging to war; but civil; not according to the rules or practice of peaceable government.

Let his neck answer for it, if there is any mar- tial law in the world. Shakspeare, Hen. V.

They proceeded in a kind of martial justice with crimes offering them their law before they drew their sword. Bacon, Holy War.

4. Borrowing qualities from the planet
Mars.

The natures of the fixed stars are astrologically diffused by the planets, and esteemed marital or jovial according to the colours whereby they answer these planets.

5. Having parts or properties of iron, which is called Mars by the chymists.

MARTIALISM. * n. s. [from martial.] Bravery; chivalry; warlike exercises.

Such a young Alexander for affecting martialism and chivalry; such a young Josiah for religion and piety.

Prencr, Creation of the P. of Wales, (1610.) D. 2.

MARTIALIST. * n. s. [from martial.] A warrior; a fighter.

While those bold martialists, that for their fame, in skill of warre affairs no way to renown'd, Did by their swords immortalize her name.

Mir. for Mag. p. 855.

He was a swain, whom all the Graces kiss, A brave, heroic, worthy martialist.

He was indeed one of the queen's martialists, and did very good service to Ireland.

Nixon, Fragm. Regalia, of J. d. Sussex. Many brave adventurous spirits fell for love of her; amongst others the high-hearted martialist, who first lost his hands, then one of his chiefest limbs, and lastly his life.

MARTINET. † n. s. [marinet, French.]

MARTLET. † n. s. [martlet, French.]

1. A kind of swallow. Barret notices martinet in this sense, Alv. 1580.

This guest of summer, The temple-haunting martlet does approve

By his lord's mansion, that heaven's breath Smells woefully here. No jutting frizze, No buttress, nor croupe of vantage, but this bird Hath made his pendant bed, and procreant cradle. Where they most breed and haunt, I have observed The air is delicate.

As in a drought the thirsty creatures cry, And gaze upon the gather'd clouds for rain; Then first the martlet meets it in the sky, And with wet wings joys all the feather'd train.

2. In military language, a martinet is a precise or strict disciplinarian; so called from an officer of that name, whom Voltaire describes as the regulator of the French infantry under Louis the Fourteenth. It is modern in English, and has the accent on the last syllable.

MARTINGAL. * n. [martingale, French.] It is a broad strap made fast to the girths under the belly of a horse, and runs between the two legs to fasten the other end, under the noseband of the bridle.

MARTINMAS. † n. s. [Marthinus-mass, Sax. Martin and mass.] The feast of St. Martin; the eleventh of November; commonly corrupted to martilmas or marilmas.

Martilmas beefs doth bear good lucke, When country folks do dainties lacke.

The Turks their butchers, and themselves the martinmas beech.

MARTNETS. * n. s. They are small lines fastened to the leech of the sail, to bind that part of the leech which is next to the yard-arm close up to the yard, when the sail is to be furled.

MARTY. † n. s. [martyr, Saxon, μάρτυρ, Greek.] One who by his death bears witness to the truth.

Prayers and tears may serve a good man's turn; if not to conquer as a soldier, yet to suffer as a martyr.

Thus could not the mouths of worthy martyrs be silenced.

Nearer heav'n his virtues shone more bright, Like rising flames expanding to their height. The martyrs' glory crown'd the soldiers' fight.

To be a martyr signifies only to witness the truth of Christ; but the witnessing of the truth was then so generally attended with persecution, that martyrdom now signifies not only to witness, but to witness by death.

The first martyr for Christianity was encouraged, in his last moments, by a vision of that divine person for whom he suffered.

Addition on the Christian Religion. Socrates.

Truth's early champion, martyr for his God.

Thomson.

To MARTYR. † v. a. [from the noun.]

1. To put to death for virtue or true profession.

The primitive Christians — before the face of their enemies would acknowledge no other title but that, though lashed, reviled, tormented, martyred for it.

2. To torment; to murder; to destroy.

Me, and wretched Palamon, That Theseus martyr'd in prison.

Chaucer, Kn. Tale.

Amored, whose gentle heart Thou martyr'st with sorrow and with smart.

By his lord's mansion, that heaven's breath Smells woefully here. No jutting frizze, No buttress, nor croupe of vantage, but this bird Hath made his pendant bed, and procreant cradle.

Where they most breed and haunt, I have observed The air is delicate.

If to every common funeral, By your eyes martyr'd, such a place were allow'd, Your face would wear not patches, but a cloud.

Martyr'd with the gout.

MARTYRDOM. * n. s. [from martyr.] The death of a martyr; the honour of a martyr; testimony born to truth by voluntary submission to death.

If an infidel should pursue to death an heretic professing Christianity only for Christian profession sake, could we deny unto him the honour of martyrdom?

Hand, O! what darts not jealous greatness? tore A thousand sweet babes from their mother's breast, The blooms of martyrdom.

Wars, hitherto the only argument Herick deem'd; chief mastery to dissent With long and tedious barock, fabled knights

In thence feign'd; the better fortitude Of patience and heroic martyrdom.

Ussing.

What mist of providence are these? So saints, by supernatural power set free, Are left at last in martyrdom to die.

To MARTYRIZE. * v. a. [martyriser, Fr.] To offer as a sacrifice.

To bear any heart I nightly martyrize.

MARTYRLOGE. * n. s. [martyrlog, Fr. μάρτυρ, a martyr, and λόγος, discourse, narration.] A catalogue or register of martyrs.

Add that old record from an ancient martyrlog of the church of Canterbury.

Ep. Hall, Hon. of the Marr. Clergy, p. 335.

MARTYRLOGICAL. * adj. [from martyrlog.] Registering as in a martyrlog; containing a list.

If once you render yourself a pupil to whiling love, he will read you such current politics, as shall persuade you to make a league with misery, and embrace beggary for a friend: and after this you are capable of no higher honour, than to be registered in one of his martyrlogical ballads, and sung by dairymaids to a pious tune.

Osborne, Advice to a Son, (1638.) p. 70.

MARTYRLOGIST. * n. s. [martyrlogiste, French.] A writer of martyrlog.

It is recorded by Fox, the martyrlogist, as a memorable example. Warren, Hist. E. p. ii. 436.

MARTYRLOGY. * n. s. [martyrlogie, Fr. martyrologium, Lat.] A register of martyrs.

In the Roman martyrlog we find at one time many thousand martyrs destroyed by Dioclesian, being met together in the church, rather than escape by offering a single incense at their coming out.

Silvest. flet.

MARTYR. * adj. [from martyr.] Like a martyr.

They would blemish the piety of the first martyr-composers of the Liturgy.

Dr. Gaudin, on the Lit. of the Ch. of Eng. (1661.) p. 3.

MARVEL. † n. s. [merveille, French.] A wonder; anything astonishing. Little in use.

A marvel it were, if a man could spy, in the whole Scripture, nothing which might breed a probable opinion, that divine authority was the same way invariable.

Hobbes.

I am scarce in breath, my lord.

No marvel, you together so bestir'd your valour; you cowardly race!

Shakespeare, K. Lear.

My lord protector's hawks do towre so well.

Warren.

The praises of knightly heroism, the marvels of romantic fiction, and the complaints of love.

MARVEL OF PERU. † A flower. Ainworth.

The marvel of the world comes next in view. At home, but still the Marvel of Peru.

Tate's Comedy.

To MARVEL v. n. [merveiller, French.] To wonder; to be astonished. Disused.

You make me marvel.

Shakespeare.

Harry, I do not only marvel where thou spendest thy time, but also how thou art accompanied.

Shakespeare.

— The army marvelled at it. Shakspeare, Coriol.

The countries marvelled at three for thy songs, proverbs, and parables. Ecclesi. xlvii. 17.

MARVELLOUS. † adj. [merveilleux, French.] 1. Wonderful; strange; astonishing.

She has a marvellous white hand, I must confess.

Shakespeare.

This is the Lord's doing; it is marvellous in our eyes.

Psalm.

2. Surpassing credit.

The marvellous fact includes whatever is supernatural, and especially the machines of the gods.

Pope's, Preface to the Iliad.

3. The marvellous is used, in works of criticism, to express any thing exceeding natural power, opposed to the probable.

4. Formerly used adverbially for exceedingly wonderfully.

He hath shew'd me marvellous great kindness in a strong city.

Sic finds, although I cannot, Myself to be a marvellous proper man.

Shakespeare, Rich. III.

MA'RVELLOUSLY. adv. [from marvellous.]
Wonderfully; strangely.
You look not well, seleniger Antonio;
You have too much respect upon the world;
They lose it do but buy it with much care.
Believe me, you are marvellously chang'd. Shakspeare.
The encouragement of his too late successes,
with which he was marvellously elated. Clarendon.

MA'RVELLOUSNESS. n. s. [from marvellous.]
Wonderfulness; strangeness; astonishingness.

MA'RV-BUD. * n. s. The marigold.
And winking mary-buds begin
To open their golden eyes. Shakspeare, Cymb.
MA'SCLE. * n. s. An heraldic figure; a lozenge as it were perforated.

To MA'SCULATE. * v. a. [from masculus, Latin. This is an old and proper word, in opposition to our emasculate, to effeminate.] To make strong. Cockeram.
MA'SCULINE. † adj. [masculin, French;
masculinus, Latin.]

1. Male; not female.
Pray God, she prove not masculine ere long!
Shakspeare.

His long beard noteth the air and fire, the two masculine elements, exercising their operation upon nature being the feminine. Fletcher on Drawing.

O! why did God,
Creator wise! that peopled lively heaven
With spirits masculine, create at last
This naively on earth, this first defect
Of nature? Milton, P. L.

2. Resembling man; virile; powerful; not soft; not effeminate.
Queen Anne, your mother, a lady of a great and masculine mind.

Wotton, Viceroy, on K. Ch. I. Rem. p. 144.
This has altogether as masculine an influence upon the manners and practices of men.

South, Sermon, ix. 76.
You find something bold and masculine in the air and posture of the first figure, which is that of Virtue.

Notwithstanding his eloquent and masculine demeanour, he [the earl of Surrey] was condemned.
Wotton, Hist. E. P. iii. 9.

3. [In grammar.] It denotes the gender appropriated to the male kind in any word, though not always expressing sex.

The English language, with singular propriety, following nature alone, applies the distinction of masculine and feminine only to the names of animals; all the rest are neuter. Loath.

MA'SCULINELY. adv. [from masculine.]
Like a man.

Aurelia tells me, you have done most mascu-linely.

And play the orator. Dr. Johnson, Caroline.
MA'SCULINENESS. n. s. [from masculine.]
Mannishness; male figure or behaviour.

MASH. † n. s. [masche, Dutch.]

1. The space between the threads of a net, commonly written mesh.
To defend against the stings of bees, have a net knit with so small mashes, that a bee cannot get through. Mortimer.

2. Any thing mingled or beaten together into an undistinguished, or confused body. [from mischen, Dutch, to mix, or mascher, French.]

I have made a fair mask on't!
Dr. Johnson, Every Man in his Humour.
Carcasses were scattered on her surface; others, blown from the tops of high mountains; some,
bruised to mask; all ruined and destroyed.
Lord's Hist. of the Bonians, (1630), p. 88.

3. A mixture for a horse.
Put half a peck of ground malt into a pail, then put it to as much scalding water as will wet it well; stir it about for half an hour till the water is very sweet, and give it the horse lukewarm; this mask is to be given to a horse after he has taken a purge, to make it work the better; or in the time of great sickness, or after hard labour.

Farrier's Dict.
When mares foal, they feed them with mashes,
and other moist food. Mortimer, Husbandry.

To MASH. v. a. [mascher, French.]

1. To beat into a confused mass.
The pressure would be intolerable, and they would even mask themselves and all things else apieces. Mare.

To break the claw of a lobster, clap it between the sides of the dining-room door: thus you can do it without masking the meat. Staff, Dir. to the Freeman.

2. To mix malt and water together in brewing.

What was put in the first masking-tub draw off, as also that liquor in the second masking-tub.
Mortimer, Husbandry.

MA'SHY. * adj. [from mask.] Produced by crushing, or pressure.

Then comes the crushing swain; the country elements.

And fumes unbounded with the masky flood,
That by degrees fermented, and refin'd,
Round the rais'd nations pour the cry of joy.
Thomson, Autumn.

MASK. * n. s. [masque, French.]

1. A cover to disguise the face; a visor.
Now Love pulled off his mask, and shewed his face unto her, and told her plainly that she was his prisoner. Sidney.

Since she did neglect her looking-glass,
And throw her sun-spelling mask away;
The air hath star'd 't the roses in her cheeks,
And pitch'd the lily tincture of her face. Shakspeare.

Could we suppose that a mask represented never so naturally the general humour of a character, it can never suit with the variety of passions that are incident to every single person in the whole course of a play. Addison on Italy.

2. Any pretence or subterfuge.
Too plain thy nakedness of soul esp'd,
Why dost thou strive the conscious shame to hide,
By masks of eloquence, and veils of pride? Prior.

3. A festive entertainment, in which the company is masked.
Will you prepare for this masque to-night?

Shakspeare.

4. A revel; a piece of mummery; a wild bustle.

They in the end agreed,
That at a masque and common revelling,
Which was ordain'd 't, they should perform the deed.
Daniel.

This thought might lead me through the world's vain mask,
Content, though blind, had I no other guide.
Milton, Sonnet.

5. A dramatick performance, written in a tragic style without attention to rules or probability.

Thus I have broken the ice to invention, for the lively representation of floods and rivers necessary for our painters and poets in their pictures, poems, comedies, and masks. Fenham.

To MASK. v. a. [masquer, French.]

1. To disguise with a mask or visor.

What will grow of such errors as go masked under the cloak of divine authority, impossible it is that the wit of man should imagine, till time have brought forth the fruits of them. Hobbes.

'Tis not my blood
Wherein thou see'st me masked. Shakspeare, Coriol.

Him he knew well, and guess'd that it was she;
But being masked he was not sure. Shakspeare.

The old Vatican Terence has, at the head of every scene, the figures of all the persons, with their particular disguises; and, I saw an antique statue masked, which was perhaps designed for Gnaetho in the Eunuch, for it agrees exactly with the figure he makes in the manuscript. Addison.

2. To cover; to hide.

I to your assistance do make love,
Masking the business from the common eye,
For sundry weighty reasons. Shakspeare, Macbeth.

As when a piece of wanton lawn,
A thin aerial veil is drawn
O'er beauty's face, seeming to hide,
More sweetly than she should be hid;
A soul whose intellectual beams
No mists do cloud, no lary steams. Craheau.

To MASK. † v. n.

1. To revel; to play the mummer.

Thy gown? Why, ay; come, taylor, let us see't!
What masking stuff's here! Shakspeare.

These ladies *mask*ed take each of them one of the Frenchmen to dance, and to mask.
Cauterish, Life of Walsley.

Masking habits, and a borrow'd name,
Contrive to hide my plenitude of shame. Prior.

2. To be disguised any way.

The masking woods, in which the birds to build their nests were seen.
Whose waving blades in air shot up were crown'd
with youthful greave,
Now clad in coats of mottle blue did mask in poore array.

Rough Boreas with his blustering blasts had blown their leaves away. Mir. for Mag. p. 555.

MA'SKER. n. s. [from mask.] One who revels in a mask; a mummer.

Tell false Edward,
That Lewis of France is sending over maskers,
To revel it with him and his new bride. Shakspeare.

Let the scenes abound with light, and let the maskers that are to come down from the scene have some motions upon the scene before their coming down. Bacon.

The maskers come late, and I think will stay;
Like fairies, till the cock crow them away. Daniel.

MA'SKERED. * adj. Decayed. See MOSK-ERED.

MA'SKERY. * n. s. [from masker.] The dress or disguise of a masker.

Metaphors I hear stark Martius cry,
Souping along in war's feign'd maskerie;
By Laus' starrie front he'll forthwith die!
Morison, Scourge of Fals. (1599), iii. 8.

MA'SKHOUSE. * n. s. [mask and house.]
Place where masks are performed.

Masks were so much the fashion in the times of the first James and Charles, that maskhouse was then probably as common as playhouse.

If it were but some maskhouse, wherein a glorious (though momentary) show were to be presented, neither white staves nor halberds could keep you out. By. Hall, Contempt. B. 4.

MA'SLIN. † adj. [corrupted from miscel-lane. Dr. Johnson.—It is more probably from the Sax. myrlin, various;
myrlus, Latin, mixed; Teut. mustelun, sarrago. See MASTLIN.] Composed of various kinds; as, maslin bread, made of wheat and rye.

MA'SON. † n. s. [maçon, French; machio, low Latin. Latin etymologists refer the word to machina, a scaffold for building. Sutherland, our countryman, in his Origines Britannicæ, as Serenius has also observed, would carry it to the Scyth. masyn, ades, a house; and M. Huet has also offered mas, an old word for a house; but Du Cange considers maeria, an enclosure of stone, as the origin of the word.]

1. A builder with stone.

Many find a reason very wittily before the thing be true; that the materials being left rough, are more manageable in the mas's hand than if they had been smooth. Platon.

A *mas*on that makes a wall meets with a stone that wants no cutting, and places it in his work.

More.

2. One of a society bearing the epithet of free and accepted; of which the origin is pretended to be as early as the building of Solomon's temple; and the insignia are principally a builder's tools.

The lawyers, like the freemasons, may be supposed to take an oath not to tell the secret.

Lat. Hailfar.

I reckon, next week we shall hear you are a free-mason. Gray to Walpole.

MASON'ICK. * adj. [from mason.] Relating to the society of free-masons.

MASONRY. * n. s. [maçonnerie, French.] The craft or performance of a mason.

Wasteful ear shall station over, And broils root out the work of masonry.

Shakespeare, Sonnet 55.

MA'SORAH. * n. s. [masorah, Lat. from the Hebrew; which is "from masar, he delivered; spoken of things which men commit to the charge of another, yet reserving a power to have it recovered again." Mather, Vindice, of the Holy Bible, 1723, p. 256.] In the Jewish theology, a work on the Bible by several learned rabbins.

These sections of the law are quoted, by the masorah, instead of chapters.

Mather, Vind. of the H. Bible, p. 60.

The masorah is a critical learning of the wise men among the ancient Jews, relating to the Hebrew text of the Old Testament; by which the verses, words, and letters of the text are numbered; and every variety is taken notice of in the proper place, in order to preserve its genuine reading. Ibid. p. 256.

MASORETICAL. * adj. [from masorah.] Belonging to the masorah; denoting the labour of those who composed that work.

They observed, that these scribes had noticed five words, where it was redundant. This masoretic note is mentioned in the Talmud.

Mather, Vind. of the H. Bible, p. 258.

MASORITE. * n. s. [maseretha, Lat. from masorah.] One of those who composed the masnah.

The Masorites extended their care to the vowels, that none might irregularly put the divine books; they did the same as to the accents.

Mather, Vind. of the H. Bible, p. 257.

The Masorites seem to have been a succession of critics, professing a traditional science of reading the Scripture, as the Cabalists did of interpreting it. Gray on the Old Test. Introduction.

MASQUERADE. * n. s. [not from masque, French, as Dr. Johnson states it, but from mascard; or rather from the Italian mascherata, mascherata, that is from the Arab. mascar, buffoonery. Hence our old word was masquerada, and meant a ridiculous exhibition. Dr. Johnson cites, under the first sense, only the example from Pope.]

1. A diversion in which the company is masked; a piece of mummery.

The name only being left to serve for a part of the masquerade of an high mass.

Horace, Transl. of Iteus, (1587.) p. 154.

All this stately masquerade, Ibid. p. 155.

What guards the purity of melting minds, In courtly balls and midnight masquerades, Safe from the treacherous friend, and daring spark, The glance by day, the whisper in the dark.

Pope.

2. A kind of Spanish diversion on horse-back.

The masquerade is an exercise they learned from the Moors; performed by squadrons of horse, seeming to charge each other with great fierceness, with bucklers in their left hands, and a kind of case in their right. Id. Clarendon, 1596, l. 323.

3. Disguise.

I was upon the frolic this evening, and came to visit thee in masquerade.

Dryden, Span. Friar.

Truth, of all things, the plainest and sincerest, is forced to gain admittance in disguise, and court us in masquerade. Fulton on the Classics.

TO MASQUERADE. * v. n. [from the noun.]

1. To go in disguise.

A freak took an ass in the head, and he goes into the woods, masquerading up and down in a lion's skin. I. Extrange.

2. To assemble in masks.

I find that our art hath not gained much by the happy revival of masquerading among us. Swift.

TO MASQUEADE. * v. a. To put into disguise.

His next shift therefore is to change its (sin's) complexion, to masquerade vice, and to make it wear the habit and shape of that virtue it most resembles. Adlington, Sermon, p. 229.

MASQUERADE. * n. s. [from masquerade.] A person in a mask; a buffoon.

The most dangerous sort of cheats are but masqueraders under the vizard of friends. I. Extrange.

The late masquerader in the Haymarket did not, could not, more effectually expose them both.

By. Nicolson, in By. Monthly Collect. of Pope, p. 4.

The dreadful masquerader, thus equip'd, Out sallied on adventures. Young, Night Th. 5.

MASS. * n. s. [masse, French; masa, Lat.]

1. A body; a lump; a continuous quantity.

If it were not for these principles, the bodies of the earth, planets, comets, sun, and all things in them, would grow cold and freeze, and become inactive masses. Newton, Opticks.

Some passing into their pores, others settling in lumps or masses to their outside, so as wholly to cover and involve it in the mass they together constituted. Woodward, Nat. Hist.

2. A large quantity.

By sumptuous buildings, and thy wife's attire, Have cost a mass of public treasury. Shakespeare, Hen. VI.

He discovered to me the richest mines which the Spaniards have, and from whence all the mass of gold that comes into Spain is drawn. Rafles, Ess.

He had spent a huge mass of treasure in transporting his army. Darwin on Ireland.

3. Bulk; vast body.

The Creator of the world would not have framed so huge a mass of earth but for some reasonable creatures to have their habitation.

This army of such mass and charge, Led by a delicate and tender prince. Shakespeare, Hamlet.

4. Congeries; assemblage indistinct.

The whole knowledge of groups, of the lights and shadows, and of those masses which Titian calls a bunch of grapes, is, in the prints of Rubens, exposed clearly to the sight. Dryden.

At distance, through the aerial glass,

To the mind's eye things well appear;

They lose their forms, and make a mass

Confus'd and black, if brought too near. Prior.

"Where flowers grow, the ground at a distance seems covered with them, and we must walk into it before we can distinguish the several weeds that spring up in such a beautiful mass of colours.

Addison, Freewholder.

5. Gross body; the general; the bulk.

Comets have power over the gross and mass of things; but they are rather gazed upon than wisely observed in their effects. Bacon, Ess.

Where'er thou art, be he; 'th' eternal mind

Acts through all places; is to none confin'd:

Fills ocean, earth, and air, and all above,

And through the universal mass does move. Dryden.

The mass of the people have opened their eyes, and will not be governed by Clodius and Curius.

Swift.

If there is not sufficient quantity of blood and strength of circulation, it may infect the whole mass of the fluids. Dehaene.

6. [Missa, Lat. missæ, Saxon: as mæsse- bond, mæsse boht; the mass-book, mass- bread. "Missa idem ac missa, sicut

remissum pro remissione dicebant antiqui.

— Ex alaiis scitis constat missam à missione dici, et populi diminutionem significare.

Frustra nititur Genebrardus hanc missæ etymologiam convellere quasi nimis frigidam, et modice reverentiam erga tantum mysterium." V. Cardinal.

Bona de Rebus Liturg. p. 6.] The service of the Romish church at the celebration of the eucharist: at first used for the dismissal or sending away the people, either before or after the communion.

Burished gold is that manner of gilding which we see in old parchment and mass books, done by monks and priests; who were very expert here-in. Trachtenberg on Drawing.

He infers, that then Luther must have been unadvisedly wicked in using masses for fifteen years. Atterbury.

This is to prevent the military masses, which had been introduced by the church of Rome, where the priest says massa, and receives the sacrament himself, though there be none to communicate with him. Whetstone on the Comm. Prayer, ch. 6. § 30.

7. A festival. [mæsse, Saxon.] See LAMMAS. Retained also in Candlemas, Michaelmas, and Martinius.

TO MASS. * v. n. [from the noun.] To celebrate mass.

He was accused of his cardinals, that he massed without consecration.

Bald. Acts of Eng. Vol. P. i. (1560.) fol. 89. b.

Abolishing or putting down the massing sacrifices for the dead.

Hunting of Puritans, (1561.) fol. 5.

He cannot love the Lord Jesus with his heart, which lengthen one ear to his apostles, and another to false apostles; which can brook a mingling of religion and superstition, ministers and massing priests, light and darkness, truth and error, traditions and Scriptures.

Hooker, Sermon, 1. On St. Jude.

Their massing furniture they took from the Jews, lest having an altar and a priest, they should want victims.

Hooker.

To MASS, v. n. [from the noun.] It seems once to have signified to thicken; to strengthen.

They feared the French might, with filling or massing the house, or else by fortifying, make such a piece as might annoy the haven. Hayward.

MA'SSACRE, n. s. [massacre, French; from mazzare, Italian.]

1. Carnage; slaughter; butchery; indiscriminate destruction.

Of whom such massacres Make they, but of their brethren, men of men. Milton, P. L.

Slaughter grows murder, when it goes too far, And makes a massacre what was a war. Dryden, Ind. Emp.

2. Murder. The tyrannous and bloody act is done; The most arch deed of bloody massacre, That ever yet this land was guilty of. Shakespeare, Rich. III.

To MA'SSACRE, v. a. [massacre, French, from the noun.] To butcher; to slaughter indiscriminately.

I'll find a day to massacre them all, And raze their faction and their family. Shakespeare, Christian religion, now crumbled into factions, may, like dust, be irreversibly dissipated, if God do not condescend to us, or we recover so much society as to forbear to massacre what we pretend to love. Decay of Chr. Piety.

After the miserable slaughter of the Jews, at the destruction of Jerusalem, they were scattered into all corners, oppressed and desolated, and sometimes massacred and extirpated. Atterbury.

MA'SSACRER, n. s. [massacrer, Fr.] One who commits butchery, or indiscriminate destruction.

Jurors and presidents of revolutionary tribunals, regicides, assassins, massacres.

Buckle in a Regicide Piece.

MA'SSER, n. s. [from masser, Fr.] A priest who celebrates mass. Obsolete.

A good masser, and so forth; but no true gospel preacher. Bald, Yet a Course, (1543), fol. 38.

MA'SSETER, n. s. [masseter, Fr.] Cotgrave: from the Gr. μασσηται, to eat.] A muscle of the lower jaw.

One wonderful pair of muscles, called the masseters,—inserted into this lower mandible, and so are able to move it upward; to the right, to the left, forward, backward, and consequently round about; and so performing that action which we call mastication or chewing. Smith on Old Age, p. 77.

The strength of the crural and masseter-muscles in lions and tigers. Arbuthnot and Pope, Mort. Scind.

MA'SSICOT, n. s. [French.]

Massicot is ceruss calcined by a moderate degree of fire; of this there are three sorts, arising from the different degrees of fire applied in the operation.

White massicot is of a yellowish white, and is that which has received the least calcination; yellow massicot has received more, and gold-coloured massicot still more. Trevoux.

MA'SSIVNESS, f. n. s. [from massy, massiveness, iv; Fr.] French; massivité, which Cotgrave renders massiveness; but the English word is also in the older dictionary of Huloet.] Weight; bulk; ponderousness.

It was more notorious for the distinctness of the provision served in it, than for the massiveness of the dish. Holwell.

The block of stone in which the body of immolation is excavated, is of unusual massiveness.

Worton, Hist. of Kildington, p. 15.

MA'SSIVE, } adj. [massif, Fr.] Heavy; MASSY, } weighty; ponderous; bulky; continuous.

If you would hurt, Your sword is o'er too massy for your strength, And will not be uplifted. Shakespeare, Temp.

Perhaps these few stones and slings, used with invocation of the Lord of Hosts, may counter-vail the massive armour of the uncircumcised Philistines. Gov. of the Tongue.

No sideboards then with gilded plate were pressed, No sweating slaves with massive dishes drest. Johnson, Jun.

The more gross and massive parts of the terrestrial globe, the strata of stone, owe their order to the deluge. Woodward, Nat. Hist.

If these liquors or glazes were so thick and massy that no light could get through them, I question not but that they would, like all other opaque bodies, appear of one and the same colour in all positions. Newton, Opt.

The intrepid Thorban bears the burning sky, And views astonished from the hills afar, The floods descending, and the wat'ry war. Pope, Statius.

MAST, f. n. s. [mast, mât, French; mæst, Saxon; mast, Su. Goth.]

1. The beam or post raised above the vessel, to which the sail is fixed.

Ten masts attach'd make not the altitude That thou hast perpendicularly fallen. Shakespeare, L. Lear.

He dropp'd his anchors and his oars he ply'd; For'd every sail, and drawing down the mast, His vessel under'd. Dryden, Hom.

2. The fruit of the oak and beech. It has in this sense no plural termination. [Saxon, mæste, nut, berries, acorns, by metathesis from mata, Gothic, food. Lye, edit. Manning.]

The oak's bear mast, and the briars scarlet jays; The bounteous housewife, nature, on each bush Lays her full mast before you. Shakespeare, Timon.

Trees that bear mast, and nuts, are more lasting than those that bear fruits; m oaks and beeches last longer than apples and pears. Bacon, Nat. Hist.

When sheep fed like men upon acorns, a shepherd drove his flock into a little oak wood, and up he went to shake them down some mast. L'Estrange, Feh.

The breaking down of an old frame of government, and erecting a new, seems like the cutting down an old oak and planting a young one: it is true, the grandson may enjoy the shade and the mast, but the planter, besides the pleasure of imagination, has no other benefit. Tracy, Macbeth.

Wondering dolphins o'er the palace glide, On leaves and mast of mighty oaks they browse, And their broad fins entangle in the boughs. Dryden.

MA'STEN, adj. [from mast.] Furnished with masts.

MA'STER, f. n. s. [merster, Dutch; maitre, French; magister, Latin. Dr. Johnson.—Saxon, mæster, used as early as in the reign of Alfred, Dr. Jamieson says; and may be from mæst, most, greatest, as the Latin magister is evidently from magis, more; thus separating our word from etymological dependence on the Latin.]

1. One who has servants: opposed to man or servant.

But now I was the lord Of this fair mansion, master of my servants, Queen o'er my family; and even now, but now, This house, these servants, and this name myself Are yours, my lord. Shakespeare, Merch. of Ven.

Take up thy master. Shakespeare, L. Lear.

My lord Bassanio gave his ring away Unto the judge that begg'd it;

The boy, his clerk, begg'd mine; And neither man nor master would take sight But the two rings. Shakespeare, Merch. of Ven.

2. A director; a governor. If thou be made the master of a feast, be among them as one of the rest. Eccles. xxiii. 1.

O thou my friend, my genius, come along, Thou master of the poet, and the song. Pope.

3. Owner; proprietor; with the idea of governing. An orator, who had undertaken to make a panegyric on Alexander the Great, and who had employed the strongest figures of his rhetoric in the praise of Bucephalus, would do quite the contrary to that which was expected from him; because it would be believed, that he rather took the horse for his subject than the master. Dryden, Duffenay.

4. A lord; a ruler. Wisdom and virtue are the proper qualifications in the master of a house. Guardian.

These Cæsar, grac'd with both Minerva, sons, Cæsar, the world's great master, and his own. Pope.

Excuse The pride of royal blood, that checks my soul: You know, alas! I was not born to kneel, To use for jilly and to own a master. Philby.

5. Chief; head. Chief master-gunner am I of this town, Something I must do to procure me grace. Shakespeare.

As a wise master-builder I have laid the foundation, and another buildeth thereon. 1 Cor. iii. 10.

The best sets are the heads got from the very tops of the root; the next are the runners, which spread from the master-roots. Morimer, Husb.

6. Possessor. When I have thus made myself master of a hundred thousand drachms, I shall naturally set myself on the foot of a prince, and will demand the grand vizier's daughter in marriage. Addison, Spect.

The duke of Savoy may make himself master of the French dominions on the other side of the Rhone. Addison.

7. Commander of a trading ship. An unhappy master is he that is made cunning by many shipwrecks; a miserable merchant, that is neither rich nor wise, but has some bank-rupts. Adams, Schoolmaster.

A sailor's wife had chevrons in her lap; Her husband's to Aleppo gone, master o' the 'Tiger. Shakespeare.

8. One uncontrolled. Let every man be master of his time Till seven at night. Shakespeare, Macbeth.

Great and increasing; but by sea He is an absolute master. Shakespeare, Ant. and Cleop.

9. A compellation of respect, formerly; but now generally applied to an inferior. Master doctor, you have brought those drags. Shakespeare.

Stand by, my masters, bring him near the king. Shakespeare.

Masters play here, I will content your pains, Something that's brief; and tid, good morrow. Shakespeare.

10. A young gentleman. If gaming does an aged eye entice, Then my young master swiftly learns the vice. Dryden.

Master lay with his bedchamber towards the south sun; also lodged in a garret, exposed to the north wind.

Where there are little masters and misses in a house, they are impediments to the diversions of the servants; the remedy is to bribe them that they may not tell tales.

11. One who teaches; a teacher; correspondent to scholar or learner.

Very few men are wise by their own counsel, or learned by their own teaching; for he that was only taught by himself had a fool to his master.

To the Jews join the Egyptians, the first masters of learning.

Masters and teachers should not raise difficulties to their scholars; but smooth their way, and help them forwards.

12. A man eminently skilful in practice or science.

The great mocking master mock'd not then, When he said, Truth was buried here below.

Spenser and Fairfax, great masters of our language, saw much farther into the beauties of our numbers than those who followed.

A man must not only be able to judge of words and style, but he must be a master of them too; he must perfectly understand his author's tongue, and absolutely command his own.

He that does not pretend to painting, is not touched at the commendation of a master in that profession.

No care is taken to improve young men in their own language, that they may thoroughly understand, and be masters of it.

13. A title of dignity in the universities; as, master of arts.

14. An official title in the law: as, master of the rolls; a master in chancery.

2. To conquer; to overpower; to subdue.

Thrice blessed they that master so their blood, To undergo such maiden pilgrimage.

The princes of Germany did not think him sent to command the empire, who was not able to rule his rebellious subjects in England, nor master his rebellious people of Ireland.

Then comes some third party, that masters both plaintiff and defendant, and carries away the booty.

Honour burns in me, not so fiercely bright, But pale as fires when master'd by the light.

Obstinacy and wilful neglects must be mastered, even though it cost blood.

A man can no more judiciously make use of another's necessity, than he that has more strength can seize upon a weaker, master him by his obedience, and with a dagger at his throat, offer him death or slavery.

The reformation of an habitual sinner is a work of time and patience; evil customs must be mastered and subdued by degrees.

3. To execute with skill.

I do not take myself to be so perfect in the transactions and privileges of Bohemia, as to be fit to handle that part: and I will not offer at it I cannot master.

To MASTER, v. n. To excel in any thing; to be skilful in practice or science.

They talk of fencing, and the use of arms, The art of arguing and avoiding harms.

The noble science, and the mastering skill Of making just approaches how to kill.

B. Jonson, Underwoods.

Musick resembles poetry, in each Are nameless graces which no methods teach, And which a master-hand alone can reach.

MASTER-JEST, n. s. Principal jest.

Who shall break the master-jest,

And what, and how, upon the rest.

MASTER-KEY, n. s. The key which opens many locks, of which the subordinate keys open each only one.

This master-key Frees every lock, and lends us to his person.

MASTER-SINEW, n. s.

The master-sinew is a large sinew that surrounds the hough, and divides it from the bone by a hollow place, where the wind-galls are usually seated, which is the largest and most visible sinew in a horse's body; this oftentimes is relaxed or restrained.

MASTER-STRING, n. s. Principal string.

He touch'd me, Even on the tenderest point; the master-string That makes most harmony is discord to me.

I own the glorious subject fires my breast.

MASTER-STROKE, n. s. Capital performance.

Ye skilful masters of Machaon's race, Who nature's many intricacies trace; Tell how your search has here eluded been, How oft amaz'd and ravi'd you have seen, The conduct, prudence, and stupendous art, And master-strokes in each mechanic part.

MASTER-TEETH, n. s. [master and teeth.]

The principal teeth.

Some living creatures have their master-teeth invented one within another like saws; as lions and dogs.

MASTER-TOUCH, n. s. Capital or principal performance.

I have here only mentioned some master-touches of this admirable piece.

MASTER-WORK, n. s. Principal performance.

Here, by degrees, his master-work arose, Whatever arts and industry can frame.

Thomson, Cant. of Indulgence, li. 19.

You shall put This night's great business into my dispatch, Which shall to all our nights and days to come Give solely sovereign way and masterdom.

MASTERFUL, adj. [master and full.]

1. Imperious; with the authority and power of a tyrant, lord, or master; employing violence.

Either they [husbands] be full of jealousy, Or masterful, or insinivous.

Cheever, Tr. and Cret. li. 756.

The masterful rebels were disinclined.

Knox, Hist. of the Turks.

For the hero's blood is not to be contrail'd.

It's in a child, it's in a man, it's in a masterful.

2. Having the skill of a master; artful.

Variety (as both musick and rhetoric teacheth) erects and rouses an audience, like the masterful running over many chords and divisions.

Milton, Animato. Rom. Defence.

MASTERLESS, adj. [from master.]

1. Wanting a master or owner.

The wofull dwarf, which saw his master's fall, —

When all was past, took up his forlorned weed; His mightie armour, missing most at need; His silver shield, now idle, masterlesse.

Spenser, F. Q. i. vii. 19.

The foul opinion

You had of her pure loovour, gains, or losses, Your sword or mine; or masterlesse leave both.

Where the commodity found hath no owner, it justly falls to the right of the first finder; for both the place and the things are masterlesse.

1. Suitable to a master; artful; skilful.

As for the warmth of fancy, the masterly figures, and the copiousness of imagination, he excelled all others.

Thou clearer strokes of masterly design, Of wise contrivance, and of judgement shine In all the parts of nature we invent, Than in the brightest works of human art.

A man either discovers new beauties, or receives stronger impressions from the masterly strokes of a great author every time he peruses him.

Imperious; with the sway of a master.

MASTERPIECE, n. s. [master and piece.]

1. Capital performance; any thing done or made with extraordinary skill.

This is the masterpiece, and most excellent part, of the work of reformation, and is worthy of his impenity.

'Tis done; and 'twas my masterpiece, to work My safety, 'twixt two dangerous extremes;

Scylla and Charybdis.

Let those consider who look upon it as a piece of art, and the masterpiece of conversation, to deceive, and make a prey of a credulous and well-meaning honesty.

This wonderful masterpiece I fain would see; This fatal Helen, who can wars inspire.

The fifteenth is the masterpiece of the whole metamorphoses.

In the first ages, when the great sons, and masterpiece of human nature, were produced, men shined by a noble simplicity of behaviour.

Beating up of quarters was his masterpiece.

Disimulation was his masterpiece; in which he so much excelled, that men were not ashamed with him being deceived but twice by him.

1. Dominion; rule; power.

Not unwillingly to accept collegiate *mate*ship in the university, rich lectures in the city.

Milton, Hist. of Eng. B. 3.

Some of the former bishops of Winchester had preferred to it their nephews and kinsmen, not rightly as to the *mate*ship of an hospital, but as to an ecclesiastical benefice.

Lowth, Life of Wykeham, § 3.

MA'STERWORT. n. s. [master, and pyper, Saxon.] A plant.

Masterwort is raised of seeds, or runners from the roots. Mortimer, Herb.

MA'STERY. n. s. [maistrice, French; from master.]

1. Dominion; rule.

If divided by mountains, they will fight for the mastry of the passages of the tops, and for the towns that stand upon the roots. Raleigh, Est.

2. Superiority; pre-eminence.

If a man strive for mastry, yet is he not crowned except he strive lawfully. 2 Tim. ii. 5.
This is the case of those that will try mastry with their superiors, and bite that which is too hard.

L'Estrange.

Good men I suppose to live in a state of im-mortalisation, under a perpetual conflict with their bodily appetites, and struggling to get the mastry over them. Atterbury.

3. Skill; dexterity.

Chief mastry to disiect,
With long and tedious hawkey, fabled knights,
In battles feign'd. Milton, P. L.
He could attain to a mastry in all sciences,
and sound the depths of all arts and sciences.

Tillotson.

To give sufficient sweetness, a mastry in the language is required: the poet must have a magistracy of words, and have the art to manage his few vowels to the best advantage. Dryden.

4. Attainment of skill or power.

The learning and mastry of a tongue being unpleasant in itself, should not be cumbered with other difficulties. Locke.

MA'STIFUL. adj. [from mast.] Abounding in mast, or fruit of oak, beech, or chestnut.

Some from needs inclin'd on earth arise,
For thus the mastry clusht mast the skies.

Dryden.

MASTICATION. n. s. [masticatio, Lat.]

The act of chewing.

In birds there is no mastication, or comminution of the meat in the mouth; but in such as are not carnivorous it is immediately swallowed into the crop or craw, and thence transferred into the gizzard. Ray on the Creation.

Mastication is a necessary preparation of solid aliments, without which there can be no good digestion. Arbuthnot.

MA'STICATORY. n. s. [masticatoire, Fr.]

A medicine to be chewed only, not swallowed.

Remember masticatories for the mouth. Incom.
Salivation and masticatories evacuate considerably; salivation many pints of phlegm in a day, and very much by chewing tobacco. Floyer on Humours.

MA'STICH.† n. s. [mastic, French.]

1. The lentisk tree; an evergreen of the Greek isles, Italy, and some parts of France. Unnoticed by Dr. Johnson; who confines also the second meaning to the gum of the trees in Scio.

Under what tree went thou them companying together? who answered, under a mastic tree.

Hist. of Saxeony, ver. 54.

The sight of a few date and mastic trees exceedingly refreshing us.

Sir T. Herbert, Trav. p. 126.

Knotty pines, fragrant mastics, kindly oaks—
Hist. p. 130.

2. A kind of gum gathered from trees of the same name.

Coriat's report, that mastic is found no where but in Scio, was here refuted.

Sir T. Herbert, Trav. p. 126.

This island [Scio] produces the most excellent mastic in the world: it proceeds from the fraxi- nus, which in other parts of the world produces the like gum.

Hicant, State of the Greek Church, p. 358.

We may apply intercalations upon the temples,
of mastic; frontals may also be applied.

Wiceman, Surgery.

3. A kind of mortar or cement.

As for the small particles of brick and stone, the least moistness would join them together, and turn them into a kind of mastic, which those insects could not divide. Atterbury.

MA'STICOT. n. s. [maram, Latin.] See MASSICOTT.

Grind your masticot with saffron in gum water.

Fleming.

Mastic is very light, because it is a very clear yellow, and very near to white.

Dryden, Dismembering.

MA'STIFF.† n. s. masticet, plural. [maslin, French; masino, Italian. Dr. Johnson.

—Dr. Jamieson pleasantly notices the etymology, in Manwood's Forest Laws, of this word, viz. mase or maze, and thief, i. e. to scare away robbers. He might have added the same quaint deduction from Lily's Euphues. But still the real etymon is wanting. Minshew, (adverting to the French maslin), considers it as abbreviated from maison tenant, i. e. keeping the house; at the same time noticing another derivation from the Latin miscendo, mixtus, mixed, the mas being descended from a wolf and a dog. Florio, translating the Italian masino, calls it a "masie dog." A dog of the largest size; a bandog; dog kept to watch the house.

As savage bull, whom two fierce mastics bait,
When rancour doth with rage him once engage,
Forgets with wary ward them to await,
But with his dreadful horns them drives afar.

Spranger.

When rank Thierites open his mas† jaw
We shall hear mutick, wit, and oracle. Shakspeare.

When we knock at a farmer's door, the first answer shall be his vigilant mas†.

More, Anis, against Atchison.

Soon as Ulysses near th' enclosure drew
With open mouths the furious mastics flew.

Pope, Odys.

Let the mas† amuse themselves about a sheep's skin stuffed with hay, provided it will keep them from worrying the flock. Swift.

MA'STICK.† adj. [from mas.]

1. Having no mast.

Shall I, like a mas† ship, at sea,
Go every way, and not the way I like?
Soliman and Peranda, (1599.)

2. Bearing no mast.

Her shining hair, uncomb'd, was loosely spread,
A crown of mastics oak adorn'd her head.

Dryden.

MA'STIN.† n. s. [from mader, French, to mingle; or rather corrupted from mis- cellane. Dr. Johnson.—More probably from the Saxon mytlic, various; mas†, Latin, mixed; mas†, Teut. farrago. See also mas†, mas†, and mis†.]

1. Mixed corn; as, wheat and rye.

The mother for one loaf hath twain.

Of molten, of rio, and of wheat. Tasso, Hush.

2. Mixed metal.

What's best to contain the quicksilver? —

It must not be iron, — nor brass, nor copper, nor mas†, nor mis†, nor mis†.

Brewer, Com. of Lingua, (1657.) E. 8. h.

MA'STRESS. n. s. [maistréss, French.
So our old word was written; maistréss, maistréss, maistréss.] A mistress; a governess.

This maid, of which I tell my tale expresso,
She kept herself, her need no maistréss.

Chaucer, Doct. Tale.

Historians are, as testifyth Cicero, the mas- trésses of life and caperations of times.

Bale, Prof. in Island's tin. (1549.)

MA'STY.† adj. [from mas.] Full of mast;
well stored with acorns. Not in use.
Sherwood, and Cotgrave in V. GLAN-DEUX.

MAT. n. s. [meette, Saxon; matte, German; matia, Latin.] A texture of sedge, flags, or rushes.

The women and children in the west of Cornwall make mats of a small and fine kind of bents there growing, which serve to cover floors and walls.

In the worst linen's worst rooms, with mat half hung,
The floors of plaster, and the walls of dung.

Pope.

TO MAT. v. a. [from the noun.]

1. To cover with mats; to furnish with Keep the doors and windows of your conservatories well matted, and guarded from the piercing air. Evelyn, Kalendar.

2. To twist together; to join like a mat.

I on a fountain light,
Whose brim with pinks was platted;
The banks with daffodils dight,
With grass like sieve was matted. Dryden, Qu. of Cymbelia.
Sometimes beneath an ancient oak,
Or on the matted grass he lies;
No dog of sleep he did invoke.
The stream that o'er the pebbles flies,
With gentle slumber crowns his eyes. Dryden.
He look'd a lion with a gloomy stare,
And o'er his eye-brows hung his matted hair.

Dryden.

The spleen consisteth of muscular fibres, all matted, as in the skin, but in more open work.

Grew, Cornet.

MA'TACHIN.† n. s. [French.] An old dance; a kind of Pyrrhick or military dance, in the 16th century, according to Roquefort; both the dance, and the dancer, Cotgrave. "It was well known in France and Italy by the name of the danc of fools, or matichins; who were habited in short jackets with gilt-paper helmet, long streamers tied to their shoulders, and bells to their legs. They carried in their hands a sword and buckler, with which they made a clashing noise, and performed various quick and sprightly evolutions." Douce, Il-lustr. of Shakespeare, vol. ii. p. 435.

Whoever saw a matadon dance to imitate fighting: this was a fight that did imitate the matadon; for they bring but three that fought, every one had two adversaries striking into who struck the third.

MATADORE. m. s. [matador, a murderer, Spanish.] One of the three principal cards in the games of ombre and quadrille, which are always the two black aces, and the deuce in spades and clubs, and the seventh in hearts and diamonds.

Now move to war her sable matadores,
In show like leaders of the swartly moors. Pope.

MATCH. m. s. [meche, French; miccia, Italian; probably from match to shine, Latin; surely not, as Skinner conjectures, from the Saxon maca, a companion, because a match is a companion to a gun. Dr. Johnson. — It may seem strange that, after this plain statement, Dr. Johnson should have been so misunderstood in some modern publications of note, as in one to have his authority cited for the absurd etymon in this instance of maca, and in another to be abused for confounding it with that word; but so it is. Dr. Johnson had merely placed it as the first meaning of the substantive match, but with a sufficient discrimination of etymology from the rest; and is free from the mistake imputed to him. He might have added the Icelandic mak, unctura, from the Greek μακτα, unctus; which seems to be the etymon rather than the Latin maca, to shine.] Any thing that catches fire; generally a card, rope, or small chip of wood dipped in melted sulphur.

Try them in several bottles matches, and see which of them last longest without stinks. Bacon.
He made use of trees as matches to set Drina a fire. Howell.

Being willing to try something that would not cherish much fire at once, and would keep fire much longer than a coal, we took a piece of match, such as soldiers use. Boyle.

MATCH. m. s. [maca, Saxon. See MAKE.]

1. One equal to another; one able to contest with another.

Government mitigates the inequality of power, and makes an innocent man, though of the lowest rank, a match for the mightiest of his fellow-subjects.

The old man has met with his match. Spectator.

The natural shame that attends vice, makes them cautious to encourage themselves by numbers, and form a party against religion: it is with pride they survey their increasing strength, and begin to think themselves a match for virtue. Rogers.

2. One that suits or tallies with another.

3. A marriage.

The match
Were rich and honourable; besides, the gentleman
Is full of virtue, bounty, worth, and qualities, Beseeching such a wife as your fair daughter. Shakespeare.

Love does seldom suffer itself to be confined by other matches than those of its own making. Boyle.

With him she strove to join Lavinia's hand,
But dire portents the purpose'd match withstand. Dryden.

4. One to be married.

She inherited a fair fortune of her own, and was very rich in a personal estate, and was looked upon as the richest match of the West. Clarendon.

5. [From μαχη, a fight; or from maca, Saxon, one equal to another.] A contest; a game; any thing in which there is contest or opposition.

And make some pretty match with shedding tears? Shakespeare.

The goat was mine, by singing fairly
A solemn match was made; he lost the prize. Dryden.

To MATCH. v. a. [from the noun.]

1. To be equal to.

No settled series of the world can match
The pleasure of that madness. Shakespeare, First Trile.

O thou good Kent, how shall I live and work
To match thy goodness? life will be too short,
And every measure fall in. Shakespeare, A. Lear.

2. To shew an equal.

No history or antiquity can match his policies
And his conduct. South.

3. To oppose as equal.

Eternal might
To match with their inventions they presume'd
So easy, and of his thunder made a crown. Milton, P. L.

What though his heart be great, his actions gallant,
He wants a crown to poise against a crown,
Birth to match birth, and power to balance power. Dryden.

The Shepherd's Caledon of Spenser is out to be matched in any modern language. Dryden.

4. To suit; to proportion.

Let poets match their subject to their strength,
And often try what weight they can support. Roscommon.

Mine have been still
Match'd with my birth; a younger brother's honours. Rowe.

Employ their wit and humour in chusing and matching of pateros and colours. Swift.

5. To marry; to give in marriage.

Great king,
I would not from your love make such a stray,
To match you where I love. Shakespeare, A. Lear.

Thou dost protest thy love, and would'st it show
By matching her, as she would match her too. Donne.

Then willingly they would have still retain'd,
And match'd unto the prince. Daniel, Civ. War.

When a man thinks himself matched to one who should be a comfort to him, instead thereof he finds in his bow a beast. South, Sermon.

A senator of Rome, while Rome surr'd
Would not have match'd his daughter with a king. Addison.

To MATCH. v. n.

1. To be married.

A thing that may luckily fall out to him that had the blessing to match with some heretofore minded lady. Sidney.

I held it a sin to match in my kindred. Match
Let tigers match with lions, and wolves with sheep,
And every creature couple with his foe. Dryden, Spain. F. Fair.

All creatures else are much unworship'd thee;
They match'd, and thou alone art left far me. Dryden.

2. To suit; to be proportionate; to tally.

MATCHABLE. adj. [from match.]

1. Suitable; equal; fit to be joined.

Yes, whose high worths, surpassing paragon,
Could not on earth have found one fit for mate,
Be but in heaven matchable to none,
Why did ye stoop unto so lowly fate? Spenser, Sonnet 66.

You shall not find one any way matchable with my beloved.
Elyot, of Solomon's Songs, (1585,) p. 136.

Sir Walter Raleigh, so far as he hath gone in the History of the World, is matchable with the best of the ancients. Hakewill on Providence, p. 551.

2. Correspondent.

Those at land that are not matchable with any upon our shores, are of those very kinds, which are found on where but in the deepest parts of the sea.

Woodward, Nat. Hist.

MATCHER. m. s. [from match.] One who matches or joins.

A very unequal matcher of innocent souls with brutish bodies.
Annot. on Ghazelle, &c. (1682,) p. 7.

MATCHLESS. adj. [from match.]

1. Having no equal.

This happy day two lights are seen,
A glorious sun, a matchless queen. Waller.

Much less, in arms, oppose thy matchless force,
When thy sharp spurs shall urge thy foaming horse. Dryden.

2. Unequal; not matched; not alike. Not in use.

As as the double spake, so heard she double,
With matchless ears deform'd and distort; —
And as her voice, so eke her fire were odd,
And much unlike. Spenser, F. Q. iv. l. 28.

MATCHLESSLY. adv. In a manner not to be equalled.

MATCHLESSNESS. n. s. [from matchless.]
State of being without an equal.

MATCHLOCK. m. s. [match and lock.]
The lock of the musket in former times, holding the match or piece of twisted rope, prepared to retain fire.

MATCHMAKER. n. s. [match and make.]

1. One who contrives marriages.

You came to him to know
If you could marry me, or
And would have his'd him and his limbs,
To be your matchmakers and pimps. Hudibras.

2. One who makes matches to burn.

MATE. † n. s. [maca, Saxon, a match, an equal; maet, Dutch; mate, Icel. a friend:
from the Su. Goth. make, an equal, Wachter: from meta, to meet, to come together; and thus the Icel. modamant, a guest. Lye, and Serenius.]

1. A husband or wife.

I that am frail flesh and earthly sight,
Unworthy match for such immortal mate,
Myself will wote, and mine unequal fate. Spenser, F. Q.

2. A companion, male or female.

Go, base intruder! over-weening share!
Bestow thy fawning smiles on equal mates. Shakspeare.

My companion
In top of all degrees, my mate in empire,
Friend and companion in the front of war. Shakspeare.

You knew me once no mate
For you: there sitting where you durst not soar. Milton, P. L.

Demon, behold you breaking purple cloud;
Hear'st thou not hymns and songs divinely loud?
There mounts Amyntas, the young cherub play
About their godlike mate, and sing him on his way. Dryden.

Leave thy bride alone;
Go, leave her with her maiden mates to play
At sports more harmless, till the break of day. Dryden.

3. The male or female of animals.

Part single, or with mate;
Graze the sea-weed their pasture, and through groves
Of coral stray. Milton, P. L.

Pliny tells us, that elephants know no copulation with any other than their own proper mate.
Ayliffe, Parergon.

4. One that sails in the same ship.

What vengeance on the passing fleet the pour'd,
The master freighted, and the mates devour'd.

Baconom.

5. One that eats at the same table.

6. The second in subordination in a ship: as, the master's mate's the chirurgeron's mate.

[Mate, French. See CHECKMATE.] At the game of chess, the term used when the king is reduced to such a pass that there is no way for him to escape, and so the game is ended.

In badfulness, the spirits do a little go and come; but with bad men, upon like occasion, they stand at stay; like a state at chess where it is no mate, but yet the game cannot stir.

Bacon, Es. Of Boldness.

To MATE, v. a. [from the noun.]

1. To match; to marry.

Example make of him your hapless joy,
And of myself now must as you see,
Whose prouder want, that proud avenging boy,
Did soon pluck down, and curb'd my liberty.

Shakespeare, F. Q.

The blind that would be met by the lion,
Must die for love. Shakespeare, All's Well.

2. To be equal to.

Some from needs inclos'd on earth arise,
For thus the fearful chemist makes the skies.

Dryden.

Pernassus is its name; whose forky rise
Mounts through the clouds, and makes the lofty skies:

High on the summit of this dubious cliff,
Deceiv'd winking moon'd his little skill.

Dryden.

3. To oppose; to equal.

I, 'tis a way of loyalty and truth,
Dare mate a souldier man than Surrey can be,
And all that love his follies.

Shakespeare, Hen. VIII.

4. [Mater, French; mater, Spanish.] To subdue; to confound; to crush. Not in use.

That is good deceit

Which mates him first, that first intends deceit.

Shakespeare.

My sense she has muted, and arms 'd 't right;
Shakespeare.

Why this is strange; go call the abbess hither;
I think you are all mated, or stark mad. Shakespeare.
The great effects that may come of industry and perseverance, who knoweth not? For audacity doth almost blind and mutes the weaker sort of minds.

Bacon, Nat. Hist.

MAT'LESS, *adj. [mate and less.] Without a companion; wanting a mate.

Heve Philomel doth her shrill throatle sing;
The thrush a tenor; off a little space,
Some matless doves doth mournour out the base.

Prothero, Moore, Briton. (1612.)

MATE'RIAL, adj. [materiel, French, materielis, Latin.]

1. Consisting of matter; corporeal; not spiritual.

When we judge, our minds we mirrors make,
And as those glasses which material be,
Forms of material things do only take,
For thoughts or minds in them we cannot see.

Davies.

That trees of life and knowledge were material trees, though figures of the law and the gospel, it is not doubted by the most religious and learned writers.

Religion.

2. Important; momentous; essential: with to before the thing to which relation is noted.

We must propose unto all men certain petitions, incident and very material in causes of this nature.

Hooker.

Hold them for catholics or heretics, it is not a thing either new or another, in this question, material.

Hooker.

What part of the world soever we fall into, the ordinary use of this very prayer hath, with equal continuance, accompanied the same, as one of the principal and most material duties of honour due to Christ.

Hooker.

It may discover some secret meaning and intent therein, very material to the state of that government.

Smyth.

The question is not, whether you allow or disallow that book, neither is it material.

Watts.

He would not stay at your petitions made; His business more material.

Shakespeare, Wind. Tale.

Neither is this a question of words, but infinitely material in nature.

Bacon, Nat. Hist.

I pass the rest, whose every race and name, And kinds, are less material to my theme.

Dryden, Virg.

As for the more material faults of history, though I see many of them, I want leisure to amend them.

Locke.

I shall, in the account of simple ideas, not down only such as are most material to our present purpose.

Locke.

In this material point, the constitution of the English government far exceeds all others.

Swift.

3. Not formal: as, though the material action was the same, it was formerly different.

MATERIALS, n. s. [this word is scarcely used in the singular; materiae, French.] The substance of which any thing is made.

The West Indians, and many nations of the Africans, finding means and materials, have been taught, by their own necessities, to pass rivers in a boat of our tree.

Raleigh.

Interceding an accurate enumeration of medical materials, the omission hereof affords some probability it was not used by the ancients.

Brown, Vulg. Err.

David, who made such rich provision of materials for the building of the temple, because he had dip't his hands in blood, was not permitted to lay a stone in that sacred pile.

South.

That lump in one of the heathen temples the art of man might make of some such material as the stone substance, which being once exhal'd, will burn without being consumed.

Withers.

The materials of that building very fortunately ranged themselves into that delicate order, that it must be a very great chance that parts them.

Madison.

Simple ideas, the materials of all our knowledge, are suggested to the mind only by sensation and reflection.

Locke.

Such a fool was never found, Who pull'd a palace to the ground, Only to have the ruins made Materials for an house decay'd.

Swift.

MATE'RIALISM, n. s. [from material.] The opinions of a materialist.

I am sorry as you seem to be, that our acquaintance harp'd so much on the subject of materialism.

Gray, Letter to Southwark.

MATE'RIALIST, n. s. [from material.] One who denies spiritual substances.

He was bent upon making Memmius a materialist.

Dryden.

The materialists, among modern philosophers, have maintained that the soul is, like the body, mortal; that when the body ceases to live, the whole man ceases to exist; but the general belief of mankind has, in all ages and countries, been, that the soul existed after death.

By. Watson, Charge, (1798.) p. 36.

MATE'RIALITY, n. s. [materiality, Fr. from material.] Corporeity; material existence; not spirituality.

Considering that corporeity could not agree with this universal subsistent nature, abstracting from all materiality in his ideas, and giving them an actual subsistence in nature, he made them like angels, whose essences were to be the essence, and to give existence to corporeal individuals; and so each idea was embodied in every individual of its species.

Digby.

To MATE'RIALIZE, *v. a. [from material.] To form into matter or substance.

Having with wonderful art and beauty materialized, if I may so call it, a scheme of abstracted notions, and clothed the most nice refined conceptions of philosophy in sensible images.

Taylor, No. 154.

By this means we materialize our ideas.

Guardian, No. 172.

MATE'RIALLY, adv. [from material.]

1. In the state of matter.

I do not mean that any thing is separable from a body by fire that was not materially pre-existent in it.

Boyle.

2. Not formally.

Though an ill intention is certainly sufficient to spoil and corrupt an act in itself materially good, yet no good intention whatsoever can rectify or infuse a moral goodness into an act otherwise evil.

South, Sermon.

3. Importantly; essentially.

All this concerneth the customs of the Irish very materially; as well to reform those which are evil, as to confirm and continue those which are good.

Spenser on Ireland.

MATE'RIALNESS, *n. s. [from material.]

1. State of being material.

2. Importance.

This affidavit is not sufficient as to the inability or materialness of the witnesses.

State Tr. Conn. Strongy, in Proc. against T. Bainbridge, (1739.)

MATE'RIATE,† n. s. [materialis, Latin.]

MATE'RIATED,† n. s. Consisting of matter.

After long inquiry of things immater in matter, interpose some subject which is immaterial or less material, such as this of sounds, to the end that the intellect may be rectified, and become not partial.

Bacon, Nat. Hist.

The material structure, and its vast compass.

Walden, Mon. of the Engl. p. 237.

MATE'RIATION, n. s. [from materia, Lat.]

The act of forming matter.

Creation is the production of all things out of nothing; a formation not only of matter but of form, and a maturation even of matter itself.

Brown.

MATE'RIAL, adj. [maternal, French; maternalis, Latin.] Motherly; befitting or pertaining to a mother.

The babe had all that infant care beguiles, And early knew his mother in her smiles:

Brown.

At his first breath the maternal love Those rudiments of reason did improve.

Dryden.

MATHEMATICAL. } adj. [mathemati-
MATHEMATICK. } cus, Latin.] Considered according to the doctrine of the mathematicians.

The east and west,
Upon the globe, a mathematic point
Only divides: thus happiness and misery,
And all extremes, are still continuous.

Denham, Scylp.
It is as impossible for an aggregate of lines to comprehend or exhaust one infinite, as it is for the greatest number of mathematic points to amount to or constitute a body.

Boyle.
I suppose all the particles of matter to be situated in an exact and mathematical order.

MATHEMATICALLY. adv. [from mathema- MATHEMATICALS.] According to the laws of the mathematical sciences.

We may be mathematically certain, that the heat of the sun is according to the density of the sun-beams, and is reciprocally proportional to the square of the distance from the body of the sun.

Boyle.
MATHEMATICALIAN. n. s. [mathematici-
MATHEMATICALIEN. French.] A man versed in the mathematicks.

One of the most eminent mathematicians of the age assured me, that the greatest pleasure he took in reading Virgil was in examining Æneas's voyage by the map.

Addison, Spect.
MATHEMATICKS. n. s. [μαθηματικά.] That science which contemplates whatever is capable of being numbered or measured; and it is either pure or mixt:
pure considers abstracted quantity, without any relation to matter; mixt is interwoven with physical considerations.

The mathematicks and the metaphysics
Fall to them, as you find your stomach serves you.

Shakespeare.
See mystery to mathematicks &c.

MATHER. n. s.
Brandy-liquor is used to mastry dying stuffs, such as mather is, being the powder or fucula of a root. Sir W. Petty, in Sprat's Hist. R. S. p. 193.

MATHER. n. s. [chamamelum sylvestre.]
An herb.

MATHEMATICS. n. s. [μαθηματικά.] The doctrine of mathematicks.

Mad mathesis alone was unconfined.

Pope.
MATIN. adj. [matine, French; matutinus,
MATIN. Latin.] Morning; used in the morning.

Up rose the victor angel, and to arms
The matin trumpet rang.

Milton, P. L.
I waste the matin lamp in sighs for thee,
Thy image steals between my God and me.

Pope.
MATIN. n. s. Morning.

The glow-worm shows the matin to be near,
And 'gins to pale his unseason'd fire.

Shakespeare.
MATINS. n. s. [matines, French.] Morning worship.

The winged choristers began
To chirp their matins.

Cleaveland.
By the poetical, no altar is consecrated without reliques: the vigils are celebrated before them, and the nocturn and matins, for the saints whose the reliques are.

Stillingfleet.
That he should raise his mixed crest on high,
And clap his wings, and call his family
To sacred rites; and vex 't'herb' powers
With midnight matins, at uncliv' hours.

Dryden.
MATRASS. n. s. [matrass, French.]

Matrass is the name of a chemical glass vessel made for digestion or distillation, being sometimes belied, and sometimes rising gradually tapered into a conical figure.

Quincy.
Protect from violent storms, and the too parting darts of the sun, your pennac'd tulips and ranunculus's, covering them with matrasses.

Evelyn, Kalendar.

MATRICE. n. s. [matrice, Fr. Cotgrave;
MATRIS. Latin.]

1. The womb; the cavity where the fœtus is formed.

If the time required in vivification be of any length, the spirit will exhale before the creature be mature, except it be enclosed in a place where It may have continuance of the heat, and closeness that may keep it from exhaling; and such places are the wombs and matrices of the females.

Bacon.

2. A mould; that which gives form to something enclosed.

Erpenius printed books are already sold; and his matrices of the oriental tongues are bought by Elsevir the printer.

Alty. Usher to Dr. Ward, (1696.) Lett. 59.
Stones that carry a resemblance of cockles, were formed in the cavities of shells; and these shells have served as matrices or moulds to them.

Woodward.

MATRICE. n. s. [matricidium, Lat.]

1. Slaughter of a mother.

Nature compensates the death of the father by the matricide and murder of the mother.

Brown, Vulg. Err.

2. [Matricida, Latin; matricide, French.]
A mother-killer.

Ainsworth.
To MATRICULATE. v. a. [from matricu-
la: "a matric, quod ea velut matrice contineantur militum nomina." Ains- worth.] To enter or admit to a membership of the universities of England; to enlist; to enter into any society, by settling down the name.

He, after some trial of his manners and learning, thought fit to enter himself at that college, and after to matriculate him in the university.

Walton, Life of Sanderson.

MATRICULATE. n. s. [from the verb.] A man matriculated.

Suffer me, in the name of the matriculates of that famous university, to ask them some plain questions.

Arbuthnot.

MATRICULATE. adj. Admitted into, or enrolled in, any society, by setting down
the name.

Why should she take shame,
That her goodly name
Honorably reported,
Should be set and sorted
To be matriculate with ladies of estate?

Scillon, Poems, p. 50.

MATRICATION. n. s. [from matriculate.]
The act of matriculating.

A scholar absent from the university for five years, is struck out of the matriculation book; and, upon his coming de novo to the university, ought to be again matriculated.

Ayliffe.

MATRIMONIAL. adj. [matrimonial, French; MATRIMONIAL. Latin.] Suitable to marriage; pertaining to marriage; con-subial; nuptial; hyemeneal.

If he relied upon that title, he could be but a king at court, and have rather a matrimonial than a regal power, the right remaining in his queen.

Bacon, Err. VII.

So spake domestic Adam in his care,
And matrimonial love.

Milton, P. L.

Since I am sure'd the husband, you the wife;
The matrimonial violence is mine,
Which, having fairly gain'd, I will resign. Dryden.

MATRIMONIALITY. adv. [from matrimo- MATRIMONIAL. Latin.] According to the manner or laws of marriage.

He is so matrimonially wedded unto his church, that he cannot quit the same, even on the score of going into a religious house.

Ayliffe, Parergon.

MATRIMONIOUS. adj. [from matrimony.]
Pertaining to marriage. Not in use.

More, as if forewarning the miserable work that men's ignorance and passion would make in this matrimonious business, and endeavouring his utmost to prevent it, condescends in this place to such a methodical and school-like way of defining and consequence, as in no place of the whole law treatise.

Milton, Treatise on Divorce.

MATRIMONY. n. s. [matrimonium, Lat.] Marriage; the nuptial state; the contract of man and wife; nuptials.

If any of you know cause not just impediment why these two persons should not be joined together to holy matrimony, ye are to declare it.

Common Prayer.

MATRIX. n. s. [Latin; matrice, French; MATRIX. Latin.] A place where any thing is generated or formed; matrix.

If they be not lodged in a convenient matrix,
they are not excited by the efficacy of the sun.

Brown, Vulg. Err.

MATRONE. n. s. [matrone, French; mat-
MATRONE. Latin.]

1. A wife, simply. Dr. Johnson has taken no notice of this sense in our language, which is the primary one of the Latin word. Bacon uses matronal in reference to this meaning.

That this woman may be loving and obedient to her husband, and in all quietness, sobriety, and peace, be a follower of his holy and godly matrons.

Comm. Pr. Form of Solomon. of Matrimony.

Our first father — press'd her matron lip
With kiss pure.

2. An elderly lady.

Come, civil night,
Thou sober suited matron, all in black.

Shakspeare.

Thy wises, your daughters,
Your matrons and your maids, could not fill up
The tedious tale of youth.

Shakspeare, Much Ado.

She was in her early bloom, with a discretion very little inferior to the most experienced matrons.

Trotter.

3. An old woman.

A matron sage Supports with homely food his drooping age.

MATRONAL. adj. [matronal, French, Cot- MATRONAL. grave; matronalis, Latin.] Suitable to a matron; constituting a matron.

He had heard of the beauty and virtuous behaviour of the queen of Naples, the widow of Ferdinand the younger, being them of matron years of seven-and-twenty.

Bacon.

To MATRONEIZE. v. a. [from matron.] To render matronlike, or sedate.

Childish matroneizes the giddy spirits.

Richardson, Familiar Lett. 167.

MATRONLIKE. adj. [matron and like.] Becoming a wife or matron; sedate;
modest; grave.

Now matronlike both manners and attire.

Dr. J. Harrington in his Wife, Epigr. 50.

Whereas religion should go array'd in his matronlike habit, they have clad her rather like a wanton courtesan in light dresses.

Houclit, Instruct. For. True, p. 17.

That ancient, serious, matronlike instrument, the virginal. Taylor, Ser. 127.
MA'TRONLY. adj. [matron and like].
 Grave; serious; becoming a wife or matron.

Painting, polishing, and pruning, beyond a matronly comeliness or gravity.

Bp. Taylor, Arif. Hendon. p. 71.
 Noted by all the neighbourhood for a matronly wife; a grave, solemn, matronly Christian.

Hammond, Works, iv. 564.

The matronly wife plucked out all the brown hairs, and the younger the white. L'Estrange.
MA'TRO'SS. n. s.

Matrosses, in the train of artillery, are a sort of soldiers next in degree under the gunners, who assist about the guns in traversing, spunging, firing, and loading them: they carry firelocks, and march along with the store-waggons as a guard, and as assistants, in case a wagon should break. Bailey.
MA'TTER. n. s. [matter, French; matéria, Lat.].

1. Body; substance extended.
 If thou the soul another soul do make,
 Because her pow'r is kept within a bound,
 She must some former stir or matter take,
 But in the soul there is no matter found. Shakespeare.

It seems probable to me, that God in the beginning formed matter in solid, massy, hard, impenetrable, moveable particles, of such sizes and figures, and with such other properties, and in such proportion to space as most conduced to the end for which he formed them; and that those primitive particles being solid are incomparably harder than any porous bodies compounded of them, even to very hard as never to wear or break in pieces, no ordinary power being able to divide what God himself made one in the first creation. Newton.

Some have dimensions of length, breadth, and depth, and have also a power of resistance, or exclude every thing of the same kind from being in the same place: this is the proper character of matter or body. Watts, Logic.

2. Materials; that of which any thing is composed.
 The upper regions of the air perceive the collection of the matter of tempests before the air here below. Bacon.

3. Subject; thing treated.
 The subject or matter of laws in general is thus far forth constant, which matter is that for the ordering whereof laws were instituted. Hobbes.
 I have words to speak in thy ear will make thee dumb; yet are they much too light for the matter. Shakespeare, Hamlet.

Son of God, Saviour of men! Thy name
 Shall be the copious matter of my song.

Milton, P. L.

It is matter of the greatest astonishment to observe the common boldness of men.

Decay of Chr. Piety.

I shall turn
 Full fraught with joyful tidings of these works,
 New matter of his praise and of our songs.

This is no certain in true philosophy, that it is matter of astonishment to me how it came to be doubted. Cheyne.

4. The whole; the very thing supposed.
 He grants the deluge to have come so very near the matter, that but very few escaped.

Widdow.

5. Affair; business; in a familiar sense.
 To help the matter, the alchemists call in many varieties out of astrology. Bacon, Nat. Hist.
Matters succeeded so well with him, that every body was in admiration to see how mighty rich he was grown. L'Estrange.

Never was any thing gotten by sensuality and sloth in matter of profit or reputation.

L'Estrange.

A fawn was reasoning the matter with a stag, why he should run away from the dog.

L'Estrange.

Some young female seems to have carried matters so far, that she is ripe for making advice.

Spectator.

If chance herself should vary,
 Observe how matters would miscarry.

Prior.

6. Cause of disturbance.

Where art thou? What's the matter with thee?

Shakespeare.

What's the matter, you dimensioned rogues,

That rubbing the poor's itch of your opinion,

Make yourselves scabs. Shakespeare, Coriol.

7. Subject of suit or complaint.

Slender, I broke your head; what matter have you against me?

— Marty, sir, I have matter in my head against you.

Shakespeare.

If the craftsman have a matter against any man, the law is open; let them imply one another.

Acts, xii. 58.

In armies, if the matter should be tried by duel between two champions, the victory should go on the one side; and yet if tried by the gross, it would go on the other.

Bacon.

8. Import; consequence; importance; moment.

If I had had time to have made new liveries, I would have bestowed the thousand I borrowed of you: but it is no matter, this poor dress doth better.

Shakespeare, Hen. IV.

And please yourselves this day;
 No matter from what hands you have the play.

Dryden.

A prophet some, and some a poor cry,
 No matter which, to neither of them Iye,
 From steepy Othrys' top to Filus drove His herd.

Shakespeare, Tit. And.

Placid or displeas'd, no matter now 'tis past;
 The first who dares be angry breathes his last.

Granville.

9. Thing; object; that which has some particular relation, or is subject to particular consideration.

The king of Armenia had in his company three of the most famous men for matters of arms.

Sidney.

Plato reprehended a young man for entering into a dissolute house; the young man said, Why for so small a matter? Plato replied, But custom is no small matter.

Bacon.

Many times the things deduced to judgement may be return and turn, when the reason and consequence thereof may trench to point of estate. I call matter of estate not only the parts of sovereignty, but whatsoever introduceth any great alteration, or dangerous precedent. Bacon, Essays.

It is a maxim in state, that all countries of new conquest, till they be settled, are rather matters of burden than of strength. Bacon, War with Spain.

10. Question considered.

Upon the whole matter, it is absurd to think that conscience can be kept in order without frequent examination. South.

Space or quantity nearly computed.

Bacon.

Way be goes to the market-town, a matter of seven miles off, to enquire if any had seen his ass.

L'Estrange.

I have thoughts to tarry a small matter in town, to learn somewhat of your lingo.

Congreve, Way of the World.

12. Purulent running; that which is formed by suppuration. [In the Craven dialect, madder, from the Welsh madredd, purulent matter. The Craven pronunciation is much more appropriate than that in common use. The etymon also is preferable to the French matiere, as given by Dr. Johnson."] Craven Dial. 1824.]

Is an inflamed tubercle in the great angle of the left eye, the matter being suppured, I opened it.

Wiemann, Surgery.

13. Upon the MATTER. A low phrase now out of use. Considering the whole; with respect to the main; nearly.

In their superiors it quenches jealousy, and layeth their competitors asleep; so that upon the matter, in a great wit deformity is an advantage to rising.

Bacon, Essays.

Upon the matter, in these prayers I do the same thing I did before, save only that what before I spoke without book I now read. Bp. Sanderson.

The elder, having consumed his whole fortune, when forced to leave his title to his younger brother, left upon the matter nothing to support it.

Clarendon.

Waller, with Sir William Balfour, exceeded in horse, but were, upon the matter, equal in foot.

Clarendon.

If on one side there are fair proofs, and no pretence of proof on the other, and that the difficulties are most pressing on that side which is destitute of proof, I desire to know, whether this be not upon the matter as satisfactory to a wise man as a demonstration.

Tilston.

MATTER-OF-FACT. Man. n. s. A term of modern times for a grave and precise narrator, remarker, or enquirer; one who sticks to the matter of any fact.

There was besides a sort of flying squadron of plain, sensible, matter-of-fact men, confined to no club.

Groves, Recollect. of Shrewsbury, p. 17.

One of our company, a doctor of divinity, and a plain matter-of-fact man.

Dowell, Life of Johnson.

To MA'TTER. v. n. [from the noun.]

1. To be importunate; to import. It is used with only it, this, that, or what before it.

It matters not, so they deny it, all;
 And can but carry the lie constantly.

B. Jonson, Catiline.

It matters not how they were called, so we know who they are.

Locke.

If Petrarch's muse did Laura's wit rebuke;
 And Cowley flatter'd dear Orinda's verse;
 She hopes from you — Puss take her hopes and fears.

I plead her sex's claim: what matters here?

Prior.

2. To generate matter by suppuration.

Deadly wounds inward bleed, such slight acc matters.

Sidney.

The herpes breves mattered, and were dried up with common opulments. Wiemann, Surgery.

To MA'TTER. v. a. [from the noun.] To regard; not to neglect; as, I matter not that calumny.

Laws my Fendrick parents matter'd not.

Dromston.

MA'TTERLESS. adj. [matter and less.]

Void of matter.

All fine noise

Of verse, mere matterless and tinkling toys.

B. Jonson, Horace.

MA'TTERY. adj. [from matter.]

1. Important; full of matter.

At my with your mattery senses, Momus; they are too grave and wise for this meeting.

B. Jonson, Poenaster.

2. Purulent; generating matter. Hulot.

The putrid vapours coagulate the phlegmatick humours of the body, which transcending to the lungs, causes their mattery cough.

Stewart on Consumption.

MA'TTLOCK.† n. s. [mattuc, Saxon.] An instrument of husbandry, used in digging; a kind of pickaxe, having the ends of the iron part broad instead of pointed.

Give me that mattlock, and the wrenching iron.

You must dig with mattlock and with spado,
And pierce the inmost centre of the earth.

The Turks laboured with mattlocks and pickaxes to dig up the foundation of the wall.

To destroy mountains was more to be expected from earthquakes than corrosive waters, and condemn the judgment of Nero, that wrought through moist Adon with mattlocks.

Brown, Valg. Err.

MA'TTRESS.† n. s. [matras, French; matras, Welsh. Dr. Johnson.—Sir J. Chardin, describing the manner of travelling in Persia, says that when they are about to remove from the inn where they have slept,—the valet de chambre puts up the matras, which is a kind of portmanteau where the bed and bed clothes are put up with as much convenience as in a chest; of which one horse will carry two. See his Travels, vol. i. p. 385.] A kind of quilt made to lie upon.

Content with a trucklebed, or a matress in the garret. Howell, Isarr. Fr. Trav. (1642), p. 129. Their matresses were made of feathers and straw, and sometimes of furs from Gaul. Arbuthnot.

Nor will the raging fever's fire abate,
With golden canopies and beds of state;
But the poor patient will as soon be found
On the hard matress, or the moother ground.

Dryden.

TO MATURATE.* v. a. [maturation, Lat. from maturus.] To ripen; to bring to perfection.

Great things are not achieved and matured by force or agility of body, but by prudence and subtilty of brain.

Waterhouse, Apol. for Leorn. (1658), p. 131. Such is the last product of a tree, perfectly matured by time and sun. Bp. Berkeley, Ser. 438.

MATURATION.† n. s. [maturation, Fr. Cotgrave; from maturus, Lat.]

1. The state of growing ripe.
One of the causes why grain—and fruits are more nourishing than leaves is, the length of time in which they grow to maturation.

There is the maturation of fruits, the maturation of drinks, and the maturation of imposthumes; as also other maturations of metals.

Bacon, Nat. Hist.

Maturation is especially observed in the fruits of trees, which are not ripe till after the winter, when the seeds are fit to be sown again.

Burton, Anat. of Med. p. 31.

2. The act of ripening.

Transplanting, meliorating the tastes, smells, &c. of plants; accelerating of germination and maturation in them.

Sir W. Petre, Advs. to Harish. p. 14. The temperate sown will no less to spare in summer; it is very well if it be sufficient for the maturation of fruits.

Bentley, Ser. 8.

3. [In physics.] Maturation, by some physical writers, is applied to the supuration of excrementitious or extravasated juices into matter, and differs from concoction or digestion, which is the raising to a greater perfection the alimentary and natural juices in their proper canals.

MATURATIVE.† adj. [maturativus, Fr. Cotgrave; from maturus, Lat.]

1. Ripening; conducive to ripeness.
Between the tropics and equator their second summer is hotter, and more maturative of fruits than the former.

Brown.

2. Conducive to the supuration of a sore.
Butter is maturative, and is profitably mixed with anodynes and suppuratives.

Wierman, Surg.

MATURE.† adj. [maturus, Lat.]

1. Ripe; perfected by time.

When once he was mature for man:
In Britain where was he,
That could stand up by his parallel,
Or rival object he?

Their prince is a man of learning and virtue,
mature in years and experience, who has seldom vanity to gratify.

Addison.

Mature the virgin was of Egypt's race,
Grace shad'd her limbs, and beauty deck'd her face.

Prior.

How shall I meet, or how accost the sage,
Unskill'd in speech, nor yet mature of age.

Pope, Odyss.

2. Brought near to completion.
This lies glowing, and is mature for the violent breaking out.

Shakespeare, Coriol.

Here I'de stand
Thou I'll rake up; and in the mature time,
With this ungracious paper strike the sight
Of the death-practic'd duke.

Shakespeare, C. Lear.

3. Well-disposed; fit for execution; well-digested.

TO MATURE.* v. a. [maturus, Lat.]

1. To ripen; to advance to ripeness.
Put as an apple with a pin full of holes, not deep, and smear it a little with sack, to see if the virtual heat of the wine will not mature it.

Bacon, Nat. Hist.

2. To advance towards perfection.
Love indulg'd my labours pass,
Matures my present, and shall bound my last.

Pope.

TO MATURE.* v. n. To become ripe; to be perfected.

Go on "sowing the seed with measure'd step" and unabating care. It may take root, where you least expect; and grow and mature, where you see it not.

Hapland, Adv. to a Student, p. 55.

MATURELY.† adv. [from mature.]

1. Ripely; completely.
With counsel well-digested.

Consult before thou enterprize any thing; and, after thou hast taken counsel, it is expedient to do it maturely.

Sir T. Elyot, Gov. fol. 72.

A prince ought maturely to consider, when he enters on a war, whether his coffers be full, and his revenues clear of debts.

Swift.

3. Early; soon. A Latinism.
We say so far from repining at God, that he hath not extended the period of our lives to the longevity of the antediluvians; that we give him thanks for contracting the days of our trial, and receiving us more maturely into those everlasting habitations above.

Brinkley.

MATURITY.† n. s. [maturité, French; maturitas, Lat.] Ripeness; completion.

Maturity is a mean between two extremities, wherein nothing lacketh or exceedeth; and is in such estate, that it may neither increase nor diminish without losing the denomination of maturity. The Greeks in a proverb do express it properly in two terms, which I can none otherwise interpret in English but Spurde thou steady.

Sir T. Elyot, Gov. fol. 71. b.

It may not be unfit to call some of young years to train up for those weighty affairs, against the time of greater maturity. Brown, Adv. to Villiers.

Impatient nature had taught motion
To start from time, and cheerfully to fly
Before, and retire upon maturity.

Various mortifications must be undergone, many difficulties and obstructions congregate, before we can arrive at a just maturity in religion.

Rogers, Sermon.

MA'TUTINAL.*† adj. [matutinus, French; matutinus, Latin.] Relating to the morning.

Their [the stars'] motions and vespertine motions.
Sir T. Herbert, Trav. p. 457.

Another matutinal expression in ancient use was, Give you good day.

Pegey, Anecd. of the Eng. Language.

MA'UDLIN.† adj. [maudlin, the corrupt appellation of Magdalen, who is drawn by painters with swollen eyes, and disordered look; a drunken countenance, seems to have been so named from a ludicrous resemblance to the picture of Magdalen.] Drunk; fuddled; approaching to ebriety.

And the kind mauling crowd melts in her praise.
She largely, what she wants in words, supplies
With maudlin eloquence of trickling eyes.

Macdonald.

MA'UDLIN.† n. s. [ageratum, Lat.] A plant. The flowers of the maudlin are digested into loose umbels.

MA'UGRE.† adv. [maugre, Fr.] In spite of; notwithstanding. It is now out of use.

This maugre all the world, will I keep safe;
Or some of you shall smole for it in Rome.

Shakespeare.

Maugre thy strength, place, youth, and eminence;
Thy valour, and thy heart; thou art a traitor.

I through the ample air, in triumph high
Shall lead hell captive; maugre hell! and show
The pow'r of darkness bound.

Milton, P. L.
Maugre all which, 'twas to stand fast,
As long as monarchy should last.

He prophesied of the success of his policy; which, after his death, immediately took root, and spread itself every where, maugre all opposition or persecution.

MA'VIS.† n. s. [mauvie, French.] A thrush, or bird like a thrush. An old word.

The world that cannot dream of worthy things,
When I do praise her, say I do but matter;
So doth the cuckoo, when the mauvie sings,
Begin his witless note space to clear.

Spenser, Sonnet.

In birds, kites have a resemblance with hawks, and blackbirds with thrushes and mauvies.

MA'VINK.*† n. s. [See MALKIN.] A dishcloth; a rag to sweep an oven. Cotgrave. Used still in some parts of England for a scarecrow; a figure made up of clouds or patches; hence a coarse or dirty wench; called also vulgarly a mauvie.

A crooked carcass, a mauvie, a witch, a rotten post, an bedge-stake, may be so set out and tricked up, that it shall make as fair a show, as much endeavour as the rest; many a silly fellow is so taken.

Burton, Anat. of Mel. p. 478.

MAUL.*† n. s. [maullus, Latin.] A heavy hammer; commonly written mall.

A man that beareth false witness is a maul, a sword, and sharp arrow.

The maul of sinners could have it thought, are the only means of schism.

Milton, Reas. of Ch. Gov. B. 1.

To MAUL.† v. s. [mauljan, Goth. mola, Icel. to beat, to bruise; from malless, Latin.] To beat; to bruise; to hurt in a course or butcherly manner.

We do maul and vex one another.

Durum, Anat. of Med. p. 105. Some other coarse prince, not as yet come to play in the world, shall have the wiser for To maul this great empire.

Fuller, Holy War, p. 286.

The most direct and efficacious way to ruin any man, is to misrepresent him; and it often so falls out that it wounds on both sides, and not only mauls the person misrepresented, but him also to whom he is misrepresented. South, Ser. ii. 349.

Will he who saw the soldier's mutton fist, And saw thee maul'd, appear within the list, To witness truth? Dryden, Juv.

Once every week poor Hannibal is maul'd. The thumbe is given, and strait the council's call'd. Whether he should to Rome directly go. Dryden, Juv.

I had some reprieve for peace; And, still they drove me out of state, Could maul a minister of state. Swift, Miscel. But fate with butchers' palps thy priestly stall, Meek modern faith, to murder, hack and maul. Pope.

MAUL-STICK. * n. s. [from the Germ. mahlen, Su. Goth. maela, to paint.] The stick by which painters keep their hand steady in working.

MAULORE.* adv. So Spenser has written maugre.

MAUM.* } adj. [perhaps from mola,
MAUMISH. } Teucrius, et pulvis lili.
MA'UMY. } n. cariosi. Kilian.] Soft; mellow; rotten. Maum and maumy are thus used in the north of England. The former, Grose observes, is "mellow, attended with a degree of dryness." Maumish is used by L'Estrange in the form of maumish, and in the sense of nauseous and provoking disgust, as well as rotten or putrid.

The flesh was maumish and rotten. L'Estrange. It is one of the most nauseous, maumish mortifications, for a man to have to do with a punctual, fiscal fop. L'Estrange.

MAUNCH.* n. s. [See MANCHE.] A sort of loose sleeve.

Long vests in large puffs or folds, and simple sleeves like unto the ancient maunch or surplice.

Sir T. Herbert, Trans. p. 141.

MAUND.† n. s. [mann, Saxon; mande, and menne, French; from manus, Lat. the hand.] A handbasket.

A thousand favours from a maund she drew, Of amber, crystal, and of bedded jet.

A maund charg'd with household merchandize.

Bp. Hall, Sat. iv. 2.

Or many maunds full of his mellow froth.

Bp. Hall, Sat. v. 1.

These filling maunds with cowslips.

Herick, Horopodia.

To MAUND.* v. n. [maundier, French, to beg; mendians, Norm. Fr. beggars.] To mutter, as beggars do; to mumble; to use unintelligible terms. Maunding, in the Canting Dictionary, is begging. See also To MAUNDER.

A rogue,

A very canter, Sir, one that maunds Upon the pad. B. Jonson, Staple of News.

To MAUNDER.† v. n. [Dr. Johnson derives this word in its first meaning from maundie, Fr. to curse; Serenius, from the Su. Goth. mana, provoke, exorcizare.]

1. To grumble; to murmur. He made me many visits, maunding as if I had done him a discourtesy in leaving such an opening. Wacnam, Surgery.

2. To wander about in a thoughtful manner; to talk confusedly; [perhaps from the Gael. mandagh, a stutterm.] A northern word. It is written both maunder and mender. See Lanchester and Craven Dial. Brockett's N. C. Words, and Westmoreland Gloss.

3. To beg. [maundier, French.] Beg, beg, and keep constables waking; maunder for better-milk!

Beaumont and Fl. Th. and Theatrical.

MA'UNDER.* n. s. [from To maund.] A beggar. Gloucestershire. Pegge. Springrove, the great commander of the maunders.

Gregory's Learned Words, (1684), p. 65.

MA'UNDERER. n. s. [from maunder.] A murmurer; a grumbler.

MA'UNDERING.* n. s. [from maunder.] Complaint.

The maunderings of discontent are like the voice and behaviour of a swine, who, when he feels it rain, runs grumbling about, and by that indeed discovers his nature, but does not avoid the storm. South, Ser. ii. 604.

MAUNDAY-THURSDAY.† n. s. [derived by Spelman from mande, a handbasket, in which the king was accustomed to give alms to the poor; by others from lies mandati, the day on which our Saviour gave his great mandate. That we should love one another.] The Thursday before Good-Friday.

He treateth, in his sacred parie, the maundie of Chryste with his apostles upon Shere Thursday. Morr, Answer to Tyndal on the Supper of our Lord, Ford. Here he trooks their maundie make, with sonderie solenne rights.

And signs of great humillite: — Each one of their a feete doth wash, &c.

Tr. of Navesmire's Popish Kingdom, fol. 51.

This day is called [dis mandati] maundie or maundie Thursday, from the commandment which our Saviour gave his apostles to commemorate the sacrament of his supper, which he this day instituted after the celebration of the passover; — or from that new commandment which he gave them, to love one another, after he had washed their feet, in token of the love he bore to them.

Whately on the Canon, Fr. ch. 5, § 14.

MAUSOLE'AN.* adj. [from mausoleum.] Monumental.

Hercules, heralds, black mourners, solemnities, obelisks, and mausolean tombs.

Burton, Anat. of Mel. p. 330.

MAUSOLEUM.† n. s. [Latin; mausoleus, French. A name which was first given to a stately monument erected by his queen Artemisia, to her husband Mausolus, king of Caria.] A pompous funeral monument.

Erect no mausoleums; for his best Monument is his spouse's marbled breast.

Dryden on the Death of Ld. Hastings.

MA'UTHER.* n. s. [moer, Danish, a girl; or rather from the Goth. matvi, the same.] A foolish young girl. Dr. Johnson notices mother as thus used, under the eighth sense of that word. It is a Norfolk word.

Kae, A way, you talk like a foolish mauther.

Sar, Sir, all is truth say she.

B. Jonson, Alchymist.

MAW.* n. s. [magaz, Sax.; mag, Su. Goth.]

1. The stomach of animals, and of human beings in contempt. Dr. Johnson. — Why Dr. Johnson should have said "in contempt," is difficult to guess. The word is very old in our language; and the citations which I add from Chaucer, Sackville, Bishop Hall, Purchas, Beaumont and Fletcher, and an admirable Discourse in 1644, as well as those before given, will show that no particular contempt is implied in the usage of the word.

There is but litle Latin in my mauw.

Chaucer, Shipman.

Satisfied from hunger of her mauw.

Sackville, Induct. Mir. for Mir.

So oft in feasts with costly changes clad,

To crammed maws a spert new stomach brings.

Spenser.

We have belts of dungs and of bellies and mawes of living creatures, and of their bloods.

Beacon.

To be jovial when God calls to mourning, to glut our maws when he calls to glister, when he would have us unckleled and squalid, he hates it to the death. Bp. Hall, Rem. p. 69.

The remainder, by consuming one another, were (a strange remedy) preserved from consumption; every feast must be let down by the shambles, and snore returning to their fellows' maws, than on their own legs.

Purchas, Pilgrim. (1617), p. 401.

I have no maw to marriage, yet this rascal, Tempts me extremely.

Beaumont and Fl. Mon. Thomas.

Drinease of bones, blackness of skin, wringing of mawes.

Seashore, Beacon. (1644), p. 17.

Though plentiful, all too little seems,

To stuff this maw, this vast unshelved corps.

Milton, P. L.

The serpent, who his maw obscure had fill'd,

The branches in his curl'd embraces held. Dryden.

2. The craw of birds. Gravitous birds have the mechanism of a mill; their maw is the hopper which holds and softens the grain, letting it down by degrees into the stomach, where it is ground by two strong muscles; in which action they are assisted by small stones, which they swallow for the purpose.

Abrutius.

3. An old game at cards.

The king being at the game of maw.

Sir A. Weldon, Court of K. James, p. 111.

They respect not him, except it be to play a game at chess, primero, saunt, maw, or such like.

Broome, Court of Lang. lib. 2.

MAWK.* n. s. [maik, Su. Goth. meddick, Dan. a worm and a maggot.]

1. A maggot. North. See also MAN.

Grace.

2. A slattern. See MAUKIN. Called vulgarly, in several parts of England, a mauke.

MA'WKIN.* See MAUKIN.

MA'WKINGLY.* adj. [from mauk.] Slatternly; slovenly; like a mauke.

Some silly souls are prone to place much piety in their mauking plainness, and in their censoriousness of others who use more comely and costly curiosities.

Bp. Taylor, Artif. Henderson, p. 57.

MA'WKISH.* adj. [perhaps from maue.]

Apt to give satiety; apt to cause loathing.

The same mankind joys in the same track are found.

Like a faint traveller, whose dusty mouth
Grows dry with heat, and spits a nation froth.

Flow, Welsted, flow, like thin liquor, beer,
So sweetly mellowed, and so smoothly dull.

MA'WKISHNESS. n. s. [from markish.] Aptness to cause loathing.

MA'WKY.* adj. [from mark.] Maggoty; full of maggots. North.

MA'WNET.* n. s. [or mammet; from mam or mother.] Dr. Johnson.—It is a corruption of Mahomet; and mauwmet, in contempt of that person, was first an idol, (then a puppet,) as mauwmetry was the worship of idols. This word was also written mauwmet, and is still found in this form in the north of England. A puppet, anciently an idol.

Unfelt worshipping of mauwmet.

In all their temples the mauwmet shall fall down.

Carried in a tent.

There you shall find in every corner a mauwmet, at every door a beggar, in every dish a priest.

MA'WNETRY.* n. s. [from mauwmet.] The religion of Mahomet; and thence employed for idolatry. Obsolete.

In destruction of Maunetrie,
And in increase of Christus law done,

They been according so as ye may here.

In his coffin is his mauwmet. And certes the sin of maunetrie is the first that God defended in the ten commandments, as beareth witness Exod. ch. 20. Thou shalt have no false gods, &c.

Throwing away the rags of maunetrie.

MA'WMISH.* adj. See MAUM.

MAW-WORM. n. s. [from mau and worm.] Ordinary gut-worms loosen, and slide off from the intern tube of the guts, and frequently creep into the stomach for nutriment, being attracted thither by the sweet chyle; whence they are called stomach or mau-worms.

MA'XILLAR. adj. [from maxilla, Latin.] Belonging to the jaw-bone.

The greatest quantity of hard substance continued is towards the head; there is the skull, the teeth, and the maxillary bones.

MA'XIM. n. s. [from maxime, French; maximum, Lat.] An axiom; a general principle; a leading truth.

This maxim out of love I teach.

It is a maxim in state, that all countries of new acquiescent, till settled, are rather matters of burden than strength.

Yet, as in duty bound, they serve him on;

Nor ease, nor wealth, nor life itself regard,
For 'tis their maxim, love is love's reward.

That the temper, the sentiments, the morality of men, is influenced by the example and disposition of those they converse with, is a reflection which has long since passed into proverb, and been ranked among the standing maxims of human wisdom.

MAXIMUM.* n. s. [Latin.] In mathematics, the greatest quantity attainable in any given case; opposed to minimum. Used also generally.

Good legislation is the art of conducting a nation to the maximum of happiness, and the minimum of misery.

MAY.† auxiliary verb, preterite might. [magan, Gothick; magan, Sax.; mogen, Dutch; mau, Danish.]

1. To be at liberty; to be permitted; to be allowed; as, you may do for me [per me sent] all you can.

He that is sent out to travel with the thoughts of a man, desiring to improve himself, may get into the conversation of persons of condition.

2. To be possible; in the words may be. It may be, I shall otherwise be think me.

3. To be by chance.

Be the workmen what they may be, let us speak of the work.

How old may Phillis be, you ask,
Whose beauty thus all hearts engages?

To answer is no easy task,
For she has really two ages.

4. To have power.

This also tendeth to no more but what the king may do; for what he may do of two kinds; what he may do as just, and what he may do as possible.

5. A word expressing desire.

May you live happily and long for the service of your country.

6. Formerly used for can.

From thence it comes, that this babe's bloody hand
May not be cleans'd with water of this well.

MAY-be.* Perhaps; it may be that; it may-hap. may happen. In the north of England, particularly in Cumberland and Westmoreland, the expression is may-be.

The stronger's heart, words well dispos'd
Have secret power to appease inflamed rage.

May be the amorous count solicits her
In the unlawful purpose.

To nothing yet, yet all those hast to give;
Then add those may-be years thou hast to live.

What they offer is bare may-be and shift, and scarce ever amounts to a tolerable reason.

MAY.† n. s. [from maius, Lat.]

1. The fifth month of the year; the confine of Spring and Summer.

May must be drawn with a sweet and amiable countenance, clad in a robe of white and green, embroidered with daffodils, hawthorns, and blue-bottles.

Ha! bounteous May, that dost inspire
Mirth and youth, and warm desire;
Words and groans are of thy dressing
Hill and dale doth boast by blessing.

2. The early or gay part of life.

On a day, alack the day!
Love, once started, is ever May;
Spied a blossom passing fair,
Playing in the wanton air.

Maiden are May when they are maid,
But the sky changes when they are wives,
Shakespeare.

Is in the very May-morn of thy youth,
Ripe for exploits.

I'll prove it on his body, if he dare;
Despight his nice fence, and his active practice,
His May of youth, and bloom of lusthood.

With equal ardour in your May of blood.

I am in the May of my abilities,
And you in your December.

5. A virgin; a maid; a young woman. [maui, Goth.; mai, may, Sax.] Obsolete.

Of outrage to thy hide and mazard. Hudibras.

TO MA'ZARD.* v. a. [from the noun.]. To knock on the head. A low expression.

I heard some talk of the carpenters' way, and I attempted that; but there the wooden rogues let a huge trap-door fall o' my head: If I had not been a spirit, I had been murdered.

B. Jonson, Masques at Court.

MAZE. n. s. [misen, Dutch, to mistake; maze, a whirlpool. Skinner.].

1. A labyrinth; a place of perplexity and winding passages.

Circular bow of rising folds, that tower'd Fold above fold, a surging maze. Milton, P. L.
The ways of Heaven are dark and intricate,
Puzzled with mazes and periphs of wit; error;
Our understanding searches them in vain.

Johnson.
Ha, like a capricious river, pour'd o' my song.
O'er all the mazes of enchanted ground.

Thomson.

2. Confusion of thought; uncertainty; perplexity.

He left in himself nothing but a maze of longing, and a diagon of sorrow. Shelley.

While they study how to bring to pass that religion may seem but a matter made, they lose themselves in the very maze of their own discourses, as if reason did even purposely forsake them, who of purpose forsake God, the author thereof.

Hobbes.
I have thrust myself into this maze,
Haply to live and thrive as best I may.

Shakespeare.
Others start as at a hill red'd,
In thoughts more elevate, and reason'd high
Of providence, foreknowledge, will, and fate,

Fit'd fate, free-will, foreknowledge absolute,
And found so end, in wandering maze lost.

TO MAZE.† v. a. [from the noun.]. To bewilder; to confuse.

I forget all that I can,
And stand like a mazed man.

Grever, Conf. Am. B. G.
Much was I maz'd to see this monstrous kind,
In hundred forms to change his fearful face.

Spenser.
I'm maz'd. B. Jonson, Fac.
Indeed! so late! the sluggish man replies,
Brushing the dews of slumber from his eyes.

Neville, Inst. of Jec. (1763), p. 78.

TO MAZE.* v. n. To be bewildered; to be confounded. Obsolete.

Ye maze, ye mazes, good sire, quoth she,
Chaucer, March. Tale.

MA'ZEDNESS.* n. s. [from maze]. Confusion; astonishment. Obsolete.

A mazer wrought of the maple ware,

Wherein is enchaused many a fair sight
Of beards and tigers that make fierce war.

Spenser, Ship. Cal.
Virgil observes, like Theocritus, a just decorum both of the subject and the persons, as in the third pastoral, where one of his shepherds describes a bowl, or mazer, curiously carved.

Dryden.
MA'ZY.† adj. [from maze]. Perplexed with windings; confused.

I went to range amid the maz'd thicket.

Spenser, Ship. Cal. Dec.
How from that aspire forth the crisped brooks,
Rolling on orient pearl and sands of gold,
With many error under pendant shades,
Ran merrily.

Milton, P. L.
The Lapithæ to chariots add the state
Of bits and bridles, taught the steed to bound,
To run the ring, and trace the easy round.

Dryden.

M.D. Medicina doctor, doctor of physick.

ME.†

1. The oblique case of I.

Me, only me, the hand of fortune bore,
Unbless to tread an interdicted shore. Pope, Ode.

For me the fates severely kind, ordain
A cool suspense. Pope.

2. Me is sometimes a kind of ludicrous expletive.

He thrusts me himself into the company of three or four gentlemenlike dogs, under the duke's table. Shakespeare.

He presently, as greatness knows itself,
Sleeps me a little higher than his row
Made to my father, while his blood was poor.

Shakespeare.
I, acquainted with the smell before, knew it was Crab, and goes me to the fellow that whips the dogs. Shakespeare.

I followed me close, came in foot and hand, and,
with a thought, seven of the eleven I paid.

Shakespeare, Hen. IV.

3. It is sometimes used ungrammatically for I; as methinks.

Me rather had, my heart might feel your love,
Than my unpleas'd eye see your courtesy.

Shakespeare.
4. A colloquial expression without for;
as, do me such a thing; spell me such a word.

ME'ACOCK.† n. s. [mes cog, Fr. Skinner; others from meck]. An uxorious or effeminate man; a coward.

As stout as a stock-fish, as meek as a meacock.
Apsas and Virginia, (1573).

A meacock is he, who dream'th to see bloodshed.

Mrs. for Mag. p. 418.
They are like my husband; mere meacocks, verily. Claphorne, Hollander.

ME'ACOCK.† adj. Tame; timorous; cowardly.

'Tis a world to see,
How tame, when men and women are alone,
A meacock wretch can make the courser shew.

Shakespeare.

MEAD.† n. s. [mead, Icel. mebo. mebu. Saxon; mede, meel, German; meeth, Dutch; meddighyn, methghyn, Welsh; hydromeli, Lat.]. A kind of drink made of water and honey.

Though not so sulative a drink as mead, yet it will be more grateful to the stomach.

Bacon.
He sheers his over-burden'd sheep;
Or mend for cooling drink prepares,
Of virgin honey in the juve.

Dryden.

MEAD.† } n. s. [mead, mebe, Sax; MEADOW.† } made, matter, Teut. from meida, Icel. to mow, Sacerius; from meap, Sax. the same, Mr. H. Tooke.]

Ground somewhat watery, not plowed, but covered with grass and flowers; pasture, or grass land, annually mown for hay. Mead is a word chiefly poetical.

Where all things in common do rest,
Come feed with the pasture and mead,
Yet what doth it stand you in need?

Tassier, Hus.

A land select from ferge drive;
A herd of beets, fair oxen, and fair kine,
From a vast meadow ground.

Milton, P. L.
Paints her, 'tis true, with the same hand which spreads,

Like glorious clouds, through the bow'r's meads,
When lavish nature with her best attire
Cloaths the gay spring, the season of desire.

Wallers.
Yet ere to-morrow's sun shall show his head,
The dewy paths of meadows we will tread,
For crowns and chaplets to adorn thy bed.

Dryden.

MEADOW-SAFFRON. n. s. [colchicum, Lat.].

A plant.

The meadow-saffron hath a flower consisting of one leaf, shaped like a lily, rising in form of a small tube, and is gradually widened into six segments; it has likewise a solid, bulbous root, covered with a membranous skin. Miller.

MEADOW-SWEET. n. s. [ulmaria, Latin.].

A plant.

MEADOW-WORT.* n. s. A plant; another name for the meadow-sweet.

Some other wild that grow;
As burnet all abroad, and meadow-sweet.

Dryden, Polyd. S. 15.

ME'AGER.† adj. [maigre, French; macer, Latin. Dr. Johnson.—The Saxon language has both mægen and mægne; the writers, therefore, of mæger or mægre are both justifiable. The Su. Goth. is mager, the Teut. mægher.].

1. Lean; wanting flesh; starved.

[They] art so lean and mægre waken late,
That scarce thy legs uphold thy feeble gate.

Spenser, Ulyss. Tale.

Now will the canker sorrow eat my bud,
And chase the native beauty from his cheek,
And he will look as hollow as a ghost,
As dim and meagre as an ague's fit.

Shakespeare, K. John.
Meagre were his looks,
Sharp misery had worn him to the bones.

Shakespeare.
Whatsoever their neighbour gets, they lose, and the very bread that one eats makes t'other meagre.
L'Estrange.

Fierce famine with her meagre face,
And fevers of the fiery race.
In swarms th'offending wretch surrounds,
All brooding on the blasted ground,
And limping death, led on by fate,
Comes up to shorten half our date.

Dryden.
2. Poor; hungry.
Canaan's happy land, when woad with toil,
Requir'd a sabbath year to mend the meagre soil.

Dryden.
To ME'AGER,† v. a. [from the adjective.]
To make lean.

A man meagred with long watching and painful labour. Knales, Hist. of the Turks.
His careless sorrow for the unhappy maid
Meagred his look, and on his spirits prey'd.
Dryden, Ovid.

ME'AGERLY,* adv. [from meagre.]
Poorly; barrenly.

Cotgrave, and Sherwood.
O physical power, which (some say) hath restrain'd

Approach of death, alas! thou hast help'd meagrely.
Sidney, Arcad. b. 4.

ME'AGERNESS,† n. s. [from meagre.]
1. Leanness; want of flesh.

It produces — restless thoughts, paleness, me-agerness, neglect of business, and the like.
Burton, Anat. of Mel. p. 612.

They were famished into such a meagerness.
Hammond, Works, iv. 647.

2. Scantness; bareness.
Poyning, the better to make compensation of the meagreness of his service in the wars by acts of peace, called a parliament. Bacon, Hen. VII.

MEAK, n. s. A hook with a long handle.
A meake for the peasant, and to swing up the trunk. Passer, Hawk.

MEAL, n. s. [meal, Saxon; repast or portion.]
1. The act of eating at a certain time.
Boas said unto her, at meal time, Come eat, and dip thy morsel. Ruth, ii. 14.

The quantity of aliment necessary to keep the animal in a due state of vigour, ought to be divided into meals at proper intervals.
Arbuthnot on Aliments.

2. A repast; the food eaten.
What strange fish
Hath made his meal on thee? Shalop, Tempest.

Give them great morsels of beef, and iron and steel, they will eat like wolves, and fight like devils. Shakespeare, Hen. V.

They made me a miser's feast of happiness,
And cou'd not furnish out another meal. Dryden.

3. A part; a fragment.
That yearly rent is still paid into the hanaper, even as the former casualty itself was wont to be,
in parcel meal, brought in and answered there.

4. [Dapple, Saxon; meel, Dutch; mahlen, to grind, German.] The flower or edible part of corn.

In the boiling and sifting of near fourteen years of such power and favour, all that came out could not be expected to be pure and fine meal, but must have a mixture of stear and bran in this lower age of human fragility. Fulton.

An old wretch conveys himself into a meal-tub for the mice to come to her, since she could not go to them. L'Estrange.

To MEAL, v. a. [meter, French.] To sprinkle; to mingle.

Were he meal'd
With that which he corrects, then were he tyrannous.
Shakespeare.

ME'ALMAN, n. s. [meal and man.] One that deals in meal.

ME'ALY, adj. [from meal.]

1. Having the taste or soft insipidity of meal; having the qualities of meal.
The meaty parts of plants dissolved in water make too viscid an aliment. Arbuthnot on Aliments.

2. Brespinkled; as with meal.
With four wings, as all furinaceous and meal-winged animals, as butterflies and moths.

Brown, Fals. Err.
Like a gay insect in his summer shine,
The fop light fluttering spreads his meaty wings.
Thomson.

MEALY-MOUTHED,† adj. [imagined by Skinner to be corrupted from mid-mouthed or mellow-mouthed; but perhaps from the sore mouths of animals, that, when they are unable to comminute
their grain, must be fed with meal. Dr.
Johnson. — This is not very probable.

Our word at first was meal-mouthed: "Ye hypocrites, ye whited walls and painted sepulchres, ye meal-mouthed counterfeits, ye devourers of widows." Harmer, Transl. of Beza's Serm. 1587, p. 315.
Again, in a very spirited description by Marston in his second satire, 1598.

"Who would imagine yonder sober man,
"That same devout meale-mouth'd precision,

"That cries good brother, kind sister,
makes a duck,

"After the antique grace; can always pluck

"A sacred booke out of his civil hose; —
"Says with a turn'd-up eye a solemn grace

"Of halfe an houre; then, with a silken cry

"Smiles on the holy crew; and then doth cry,

"O manners!"

These extracts serve to shew that mealmouthed denoted one who employed soft, insinuating, artful, hypocritical language. And so Minshew defines meal-gauge. "A fair spoken; cujus verba blanda sunt, et mollia, instar farinae,"
i. e. whose words are as soft as and as fine as meal." Using soft words, concealing the real intention; speaking hypocritically.

He cannot away with tolucco; for he is persuaded (and not much amiss) that 'tis a heart of bread-corn; which he could find in his heart to transport without licence; but, weighing the pe-nality, he grows mealy-mouthed, and dares not.

Overbury, Character. (1627?) sign. N.
The truth is, Clayton was false, mealy-mouthed, and poor spiritless. Life of A. Wood, p. 163.

She was a fool to be mealy-mouthed, where nature speaks so plain. L'Estrange.

MEALY-MOUTHEDNESS,† n. s. [from the adjective.] Hypocrisy in speaking.

18

MEAN,† adj. [mæne, Sax. common;
minne, Germ. inferior, less, Serenius;
gæine, Icel. vile, from man, a multitude,
a rabble, Wachter.]

1. Wanting dignity; of low rank or birth.
She was stricken with most obdurate love to a young man but of mean parentage, in her father's court, named Antiphila; so mean, as that he was but the son of her nurse, and by that means without other desert, became known of her. Sidney.

This fairest maid of fairer mind;
By fortune mean, in nature born a queen. Shelley.
Let pale fate's fear keep with the mean-born man.

Shakespeare.
And find no harbour in a royal court.

Shakespeare, Hen. VI.
True hope is swift, and flies with swallow wings;
Kings it makes gods, and meaner creatures kings.

Shakespeare.
2. Low-minded; base; ungenerous; spirit-less.

The shepherd knows not thunder from a sutor,
More than I know the sound of Marcus' tongue
From every meaner man. Shakespeare, Coriol.

Can you imagine I so mean could prove,
To save my life by changing of my love? Dryden.

We fast not to please men, nor to promote any mean worldly interest. Southey, Sermon.

3. Contemptible; despicable.
The Roman legion, and great Caesar good,
Our fatherland's meaner man. Philips.

4. Low in the degree of any good quality;
low in worth; low in power.

Some things are good, yet in so mean a degree of goodness, that many are not so disposed nor disallowed of God for them. Hooker.

French wheat is leaved, and requirith the best soil, recompenseth the same with a profitable plenty; and not wheat, so termed because it is unbearded, is contented with a meaner earth, and contending with a suitable gain. Cervus.

The hands be not holden of her majesty, but by a mean tenure in socage, or by knight's service at the most. Bacon.

By this extortion he suddenly grew from a mean to a mighty estate, inasmuch that his ancient inheritance being not one thousand marks yearly, he became able to dispense ten thousand pounds.

Darwin on Ireland.
To peaceful Rome new laws ordain;
Call'd from his mean abode his sceptre to sus-tain. Dryden.

I have sacrificed much of my own self-love, in preventing not only many mean things from seeing the light, but many which I thought tolerable.

Pope.
5. [Moyen, French.] Middle; moderate;
without excess.

He saw this gentleman, one of the properest and best-ground men that ever I saw, being of middle age and a mean stature. Sidney.

Now read with them those organic arts which enable men to discourse and write, and according to the latest style of lofty, mean, or lofty.

Milton on Education.
6. Intervening; intermediate.

In the moon while the heaven was black with clouds and wind, and there was a great rain.

1 Kings, xviii. 45.
MEAN,† n. s. [moyen, French.]

1. Mediocrity; middle; mean; medium.
His tempering goodly well
Their contraries dilutes with loved means.
Did place them all in order, and compell
To keep themselves within their sundry reigns,
Their link'd with adamant chains. Spenser.

Our men secures us; and our mere defects Prove our commodities. Shakespeare, K. Lear.

Temperance with golden square,
Betwixt them both can measure out a mean.

Shakespeare.

There is a mean in all things, and a certain measure wherein the good stops the beautiful consist, and out of which they never can depart.

Dryden, Dufrenoy.

But no authority of gods or men
Allow of any mean in justice. Rescrammon.
Against her then her force she grinds, joins,
And to the golden mean herself confines. Deaham.

2. Measure; regulation. Not used. Dr. Johnson says; citing only the following passage from Spenser, in which the word signifies (as it was formerly much used, and is not yet entirely out of use,) the tenor part of a musical composition; and not measure, or regulation.

The rolling sea resounding soft,
In his big tune then fully answered,
And on the rock the waves, breaking aloft,
A solemn mean unto them measured.

Spenser, F. Q.

A new voluntary decant, so farve out of tune,
that is agreeth neither with the tenor, nor mean.

Alp. Cressner, Anne, to Ep. Gordian, p. 105.
The treble cithret the air so sharp, as it returneth too swift to make the sound equal; and therefore a mean or tenor is the sweetest. Becon.

Now you are too fast,
And mar the concord with too harsh a decant;
There wanteth but a mean to fill your song.

Shakespeare, Two Gent. Fer.

The base and treble married to the mean.

Dryden, Barren's Wars, C. 3.

3. Interval; interim; meantime.

But with this wretched woman overcome,
Of anguish rather than of crime hath been,
Reserve her cause to her eternal doom,
And in the mean vouchsafe her honourable tomb.

Spenser.

In the mean, (turning to the officer who scoured him,) while he and I dispute this matter, mind you your business on his back.

Dryden, Life of Plutarch.

4. Instrument; measure; that which is used in order to any end.

Pemela's noble heart would needs gratefully make known the valiant means of her safety.

Sidney.

As long as that which Christians did was good, and no way subject to just reproof, their virtuous conversation was a mean to work the heathens' conversion unto Christ.

Hobbes.

It is no excuse unto him who, being drunk, committed incest, and alleged that his wife was not his own; in as much as himself might have chosen whether his wife should by that means have been taken from him.

Hobbes.

I'll devise a mean to draw the Moor
Out of the way, that your converse and business
May be more free.

Shakespeare, Othello.

No place will please me so, no mean of death,
As here by Caesar and by you cut off. Shakespeare.
Nature is made better by no mean,
But nature makes that mean; so over that art
Which, you say, adds to nature, is an art
That nature makes. Shakespeare, Wint Tale.

The mean might be the easier attained.

Milton, Doct. and Discip. of Divorce.

5. It is often used in the plural, and by some not very grammatically with an adjective singular: the singular is in this sense now rarely used. Dr. Johnson.—The use of the word means, in English, is remarkable, and may be thought capricious. It seems to be of French extraction. The French have le moyen frequently, but seldom les moyens. We, on the contrary, prefer the plural termination, means; yet still for the most part, though not always, we use it as a noun of the singular number, or as the French le moyen. It is one of those anomalies, which use hath introduced and established, in spite of analogy. We should not be allowed to say — a mean of making men happy. Bp. Hurd, Notes on Addison, Freehold, No. 28.

VOL. II.

The more base art thou,
To make such means for her as thou hast done,
And leave her on such slight conditions.

Shakespeare.

By this means he had them the more at vantage, being tired and harassed with a long march.

Because he wanted means to perform any great action, he made means to return the sooner.

Dantes on Ireland.

Strong was their plot,
Their parties great, means good, the season fit,
Their practice close, their faith suspected not.

Daniel.

By this means not only many helpless persons will be provided for, but a generation will be bred up not perverted by any other hopes. Spauld, Sermon.

Who is there that hath the leisure and means to collect all the proofs concerning most of the opinions he has, so as safely to conclude that he hath a clear and full view.

Locke.

A good character, when established, should not be reared in as an end, but only employed as a means of doing still further good.

Atterbury.

It renders us curious of approving ourselves to God by religious duties, and, by that means, securing the continuance of his goodness.

Atterbury.

6. By gl MEANS. Without doubt; without hesitation; without fail.

7. By no MEANS. Not in any degree; not at all.

The wine on this side of the lake is by no means so good as that on the other.

Addison on Italy.

8. Means are likewise used for revenue; fortune; probably from desmenza.

Your means are slender, your waste is great.

Shakespeare.

For competence of life I will allow you,
That lack of means enforce you not to evil;
And, as we bear you to reform yourselves.

Shakespeare, Hen. IV.

Excess did not build or adorn any house; the queen purchased spending his time, and himself his means.

Milton.

9. MEAN-TIME. } In the intervening MEAN-WHILE. } time; sometimes an adverbial mode of speech.

Mean-while

The world shall burn, and from her ashes spring
New heav'n and earth.

Milton, P. L.

Mean-time the rapid heavens roll'd down the light,

And on the shaded ocean rush'd the night.

Dryden.

Mean-time her warlike brother on the seas,
His waving streamers to the winds displays.

Dryden.

Mean time, in shades of night Eneas lies;
Care sets his soul, and sleep forsook his eyes.

Dryden.

Mean-while I'll draw up my Numidian troops,
And, as I see occasion, favour thee.

Adrian, Cato.

The Roman legions were all recalled to help their country against the Goths; mean-time the Britons, left to shift for themselves, and harassed by inroads from the Picts, were forced to call in the Saxons for their defence.

Suiff.

- To MEAN MEAN v. n. [meanan, Saxon.]

1. To have in the mind; to purpose.

These delights if thou canst give,
Mirth, with thee I mean to live. Milton, L'Al.

2. To think; to have the power of thought.
And he who now to sense, now nonsense lean-
ing,

Means not, but blunders round about a meaning. Pope.

To MEAN v. a.

1. To purpose; to intend; to design.

Ye thought evil against me; but God meant it unto good, to save much people alive. Gen. 1. 20.

And life more perfect have attain'd than fate
Meant me, by venturing higher than my lot.

Milton, P. L.

I practis'd it to make you taste your cheer
With double pleasure first, prepar'd by fear;
So loyal subjects often write their prince,
Yet mean his sacred person not the least offence.

Dryden.

2. To intend; to hint covertly; to understand.

When your children shall say, What mean you by this service? ye shall say, It is the passover.

Exod. xii. 36.

I forake an argument on which I could delight to dwell; I mean your judgement as your choice of friends. Dryden.

Whatever was meant by them, it could not be that Cain, as elder, had a natural dominion over Abel. Locke.

To MEAN v. n. [meanan, Sax. dolere.]
To moan; to lament. A northern word.

Brockett. In the Craven Dialect meaned is bewoaned. And in the old copies of Shakespeare's Mids. Night's Dream, the modern reading of "thus she (Thiabe) meane;" is "thus she means."

Where see the notes of Ritson and Stevens.
See also Dr. Jamieson on this usage of the word in Scotland, Diet. in V. To MEANE.

MEAN'DER. n. s. [Meander is a river in Phrygia remarkable for its winding course.] Maze; labyrinth; flexuous passage; serpentine winding; winding course.

Physicians, by the help of anatomical dissections, have searched into those various meanders of the veins, arteries, and intestals of the body.

Hall, Orig. of Mankind.

'Tis well, that while mankind
Through fate's perverse meander errs,
He can imagin'd pleasures find,
To combat against real cares.

Prior.

While ling'ring lives in meanders glide,
They scatter various life on either side.

The valleys smile, and with their flowery face,
And wealthy births confess the floods embrace.

Blackmore.

Law is a bottomless pit: John Bull was flattered by the lawyers, that his will would not last above a year; yet ten long years did Hocuss steer his cause through all the meanders of the law, and all the courts.

Arbutnot.

To MEAN'DER v. a. [from the noun.]
To wind; to turn round; to make flexu-ous.

By their meander'd creeks.

Dryden, Polyth. S. 1.
Meander'd way,
And labyrinth-like turnings.

Dryden, Polyth. S. 12.
A waving glow the bloomy beds display,
Blushing in the direction of day;
With silver-quivering rills meander'd o'er.

Pope, Mor. R. Ep. 4.

To MEAN'DER.* v. n. To run with a serpentine course; to be winding, or intricate.

Whether we fringe the sloping hill,
Or smooth below the verdant mead;
Whether we break the falling rill,
Or through meandering meads lead. Shenstone.
Conducting them, as the ground naturally meanders, amidst a few forest trees.

Graves, Recoll. of Shenstone, p. 59.

Thou only know'st
That dark meandering maze,
Where wayward Falsehood strays.

Moore, Canonicus.

MEAN'DRIM.* } adj. [from meander.]

MEANDRY. } Winding; flexuous.
This serpent, surging generation, with their meandrous turnings and windings, their mental reservations. Dean King, Sermon. Nov. 5. (1608), p. 27.
The river Says, with crooked and meandry turnings, encircleth the palace of the infernal Ith.

Beacon.

MEANDROUS.† adj. [from meander.]

Winding; flexuous.
With virtuous rectitude meandrous falsehold is incoherent. Lowell's Letters, (1662), p. 168.

MEANING. n. s. [from mean.]

1. Purpose; intention.
I am no honest man, if there be any good meaning toward you. Shakespeare, K. Lear.

2. Habitual intention.
Some whose meaning hath at first been fair,
Grow knaves by use, and rebels by despair.

Beacon.

3. The sense; the thing understood.

The meaning, out the name, I call: for thou,
Not of the muses nine, Milton, P. L.
These lost the sense their learning to display,
And those explain'd the meaning quite away.

Pope.

No word more frequently in the mouths of men than conscience; and the meaning of it is, in some measure, understood; however, it is a word extremely abused by many, who apply other meanings to it which God Almighty never intended.

Swift.

4. Sense; power of thinking.

He was not spiteful though he wrote a satire,
For still there goes some meaning to ill-nature.
— True no meaning puzzles more than will.

Pope.

MEANLY.† adv. [from mean. Sax. mæne-lice.]

1. Moderately; not in a great degree.

Dr. Metcalfe, master of St. John's College, a man meanly learned himself, but not meanly affected to set forward learning in others.

Archibald, Schoolmaster.

In the reign of Domitian, poetry was but meanly cultivated, but painting eminently flourished. Dryden, DuRoi.

2. Without dignity; poorly.

It was the winter wild,
While the heaven-born child,
All meanly wraps in the rude manger lies.

Milton, Old Nativ.

The Persian state will not endure a king
So meanly born. Denham, Sophy.

3. Without greatness of mind; ungenerously.

Would you meanly thus rely
On power, you know, I must obey.

Prior.

4. Without respect.

Our kindred, and our very names, seem to have something desirable in them: we cannot bear to have others think meanly of them. Watts, Logic.

MEANNESS. n. s. [from mean.]

1. Want of excellence.

The minister's greatness or meanness of knowledge to do other things, standeth in this place as a stranger, with whom our form of Common Prayer hath nothing to do.

Hooker.

This figure is of a later date by the meanness of
of the workmanship. Addison, on Italy.

2. Want of dignity; low rank; poverty.
No other nymphs have title to men's arms,
But as their meanness larger hopes imparts.

Walker.

Poverty, and meanness of condition, expose the wheat to scorch, it being natural for men to place their esteem rather upon things great than good.

South.

3. Lowness of mind.

The name of servants has been reckoned to imply a certain meanness of mind, as well as lowness of condition.

South.

4. Sordidness; niggardiness.

MEANT. pref. and part. pass. of Mean.

By Silvia if thy charming self be meant;

If friendship be thy virgin vows extent;

Or let me in Amiota's praises join;

Her's my esteem shall be, my passion thine. Prior.

MEASURE. n. s. Probably a corruption of measure; as, a measure of herrings is five hundred. Dr. Johnson from Ainsworth.

— Serenius, however, rightly cites the German mass, a measure, as the etymon of this word. See Mass.

MEASURE.† n. s. [Dr. Johnson takes no account of the etymology of this word, merely mentioning the Latin expression of morbilli for the disorder called the measles, and has confined the word to the plural number, with no other signification than that of disease. And, in the first of them, the citation from Shaks-peare belongs to the leper, and not to the disease. It is one of our oldest words, applied to a leper, as by Wicliffe, and in P. Plowman; and thus the adjective in the Ort. Vocab. 1514, "Measell, full of lepre, leprosus;" which is the modern measle. The old French has the same term measle, a leper. Kelham.

But it is from the German, mas, measle, a spot; whence measle, Su. pustules;
raselen, Teut.]

1. A leper. Obsolete.

Rase ye dede men, cleasme ye measles.

Blind men seen, crokide goen, measles be made cleue.

Wicliffe, St. Matt. xi.

So shall my lungs

Coin words till their decay, against those measles

Which we disdain should tetter us, yet sought

The very way to catch them. Shakespeare, Coriol.

2. In the plural, a critical eruption in a fever, well known in the common practice. Quincy.

Before the plague of London, inflammations of the lungs were rife and mortal, as likewise the measles. Archibald.

3. A disease of swine.

One, when he had got the inheritance of an unlucky old grange, would needs sell it, and proclaimed the virtues of it:—nothing ever derived on it, no owner of it ever died in his bed;—
the swine died of the measles, the sheep of the rot.

B. Jonson, Discourses.

4. A disease of trees.

Fruit-bearers are often infected with the measles,
by being scorched with the sun. Martinet, Herb.

MEASLED. adj. [from measle.] Infected

with the measles.

Thou vermin wretched,
As e'er in meadow park was hatched;
Thou tal of worship that dost grow
On rumple of justice as of cow. Hudibras, l. ii.

MEASLEDNESS.* n. s. [from measled.]
Diseased state of swine.

Colgrave, and Sherwood.

MEASLY. adj. [from measles.] Scabbied

with the measles.

Last trotted forth the gentle swine

To ease her against the stump,

And distinally was heard to whine,

All as the scribbled swine her meadly runny. Swift.

MEASURABLE.† adj. [from measure.]

1. That may be measured; that may admit of computation.

God's eternal duration is permanent and invariable, not measurable by time and motion, nor to be computed by number of successive moments.

Beatty, Sermon.

2. Moderate; in small quantity.

A measureable mildness or mean in all things.

North, Tr. of Philadelphia at Court, (1575), p. 91.

MEASURABLENESS. n. s. [from measurable.] Quality of admitting to be measured.

MEASURABLY. adv. [from measurable.]
Moderately.

Wine measurably drunk, and in season, bringeth gladness of the heart. Ecclesi. xiii. 28.

MEASURE. n. s. [measure, French; measure, Latin.]

1. That by which any thing is measured.

A tailor's news.

Who stood with shears and measure in his hand,
Standing on slippers, which his nimble haste

Had fobbed thrust upon contrary feet.

Told of many a thousand. Shakespeare, K. John.

A concise measure, of known and determinate capacity, serves to measure the capaciousness of any other vessel.

Hulder.

All magnitudes are capable of being measured;

but it is the application of one to another which makes actual measure. Hulder on Time.

When Moses speaks of measures, for example,
of an ephah, he presumes they knew what measure he meant: that he himself was skilled in weights and measures, arithmetic and geometry, there is no reason to doubt. Archibald on China.

2. The rule by which any thing is adjusted or proportioned.

He lived according to nature, the other by ill customs, and measures taken by other men's eyes and tongues. Jay, Taylor.

God's goodness is the measure of his providence.

More.

I expect, from those that judge by first sight and rash measures, to be thought fond or insolent.

Glanville, Scripps.

3. Proportion; quantity settled.

Measure is that which perfecteth all things, because every thing is for some end; either can that thing be available to any end, which is not proportionable therunto; and to proportion as well excess as defects are particulars. Hooker.

I enter not into the apparatus of the law of nature, or its measures of punishment, yet there is such a law. Locke.

4. A stated quantity; as, a measure of wine.

Be large in mind, anon we'll drink a measure

The table round. Shakespeare, Macbeth.

5. Sufficient quantity.

I'll never pursue again,

Till either death hath clost'd these eyes of mine,

Or fortune given me measure of revenge. Shaksp.

6. Allotment; portion allotted.

Good Kent, how shall I live and work
To match thy goodness? life will be too short,
And every measure fall me. Shakespeare, A. Lear.
We will not best of things without our measure, but according to the measure of the rule which God hath distributed to us, e measure to reach even unto you. 2 Cor. s. 13.

If else thou seek'st
Aught, not surpassing human measure, say,
Milton, P. L.
Our religion sets before us, not the example of a stupid stock, who had, by obsolete principles, hardened himself against all pain beyond the common measures of humanity, but an example of a man like ourselves. Tillotson.

7. Degree; quantity.

I have laid down, in some measure, the description of the old world.

Abbot, Description of the World.
There is a great measure of discretion to be used in the performance of confession, so that you neither omit it when your own heart may tell you that there is something amiss, nor over-scrupulously pursue it when you are not conscious to yourself of notable failings.

By. Taylor, Guide to a Penitent.
The rains were but preparatory in some measure, and the violence and consumption of the deluge depended upon the disruption of the great abyss.

Burnet, Theory of the Earth.
8. Proportionate time; musical time.
Amaryllis loveseth thy secret pains,
And thy fond heart beats measure to thy strains.
Prior.

9. Motion harmonically regulated.

My legs can keep no measure in delight,
When my poor heart no measure keeps in grief:
Therefore no dancing, girl, some other sport.
Shakespeare.

As when the stars in their ethereal race,
At length have roll'd around their liquid space,
From some point of heav'n their course adverse, And move in measures of their former dance.
Dryden.

10. A stately dance. This sense is, I be- lieve, obsolete.

Wooing, wedding, and repenting, is as a Scotch jig, a measure, and a cliche pace; the first suit is hot and lusty, like a Scotch jig, and full as fantastical; the wedding mannerly, modest as a measure, full of state and anarchy. Shakespeare.
Now are our brows bound with victorious wreaths,
Our stern alarms chang'd to merry meetings,
Our dreadful marches to delightful measures.
Shakespeare.

11. Moderation; not excess.

O love, be moderate, allay thy ecstasy;
In measure reign thy joy, scant this excess;
I feel too much thy blessing, make it less,
For fear I surfeit. Shakespeare, Merch. of Ven.
Hell hath enlarged herself, and opened her mouth without measure. Isa. vi. 14.

12. Limit; boundary. In the same sense is the Greek Μέτρον.

Τῆς ἐν τῷ διαβόλῳ τῆς ἀνίας, μέτρον ἔχειται
'ἡμεῖς ἐν τῇ βασιλείᾳ τοῦ αἵματος αἰθέριον'
'Αρχαῖος ἐκείνου.

Lord, make me to know mine end, and the measure of my days, what it is, that I may know how frail I am. Psalm. xxxix. 4.

13. Any thing adjusted.

Christ reveals to us the measures according to which God will proceed in dispensing his rewards.

Smalbridge, Sermon.
14. Syllables metrically numbered; metre.
I addressed them to a lady, and affected the softness of expression, and the smoothness of measure, rather than the bright of thought.
Dryden.

The numbers themselves, though of the heroic measure, should be the smoothest imaginable.

15. Tune; proportionate notes.

The joyous struggles, and light-foot fairies,
Which thither came to hear their music sweet,
And to the measures of their melodies
Did learn to move their nimble-shifting feet.
Spectator.

16. Mean of action; mean to an end. The original of this phrase refers to the ne- cessity of measuring the ground upon which any structure is to be raised, or any distant effect to be produced, as in shooting at a mark. Hence he that pro- portioned his means to his end was said to take right measures. By degrees measures and means were confounded, and any thing done for an end, and sometimes any transaction absolutely, is called a measure, with no more propriety than if, because an archer might be said to have taken wrong measures when his mark was beyond his reach, we should say that it was a bad measure to use a heavy arrow.

His majesty found what wrong measures he had taken in the conferring that trust, and lamented his error. Clarendon.

17. To have hard measure; to be hardly treated.

To MEASURE. v. a. [measurer, French; measure, Latin.]

1. To compute the quantity of any thing by some settled rule.

Archimedes having received from Philip, after the victory of Cheronæa, proud letters, writ back, that if he measured his own shadow, he would find it no longer than it was before his victory.
Bacon, Apophthegms.

2. To pass through; to judge of extent by marching over.

To measure kingdoms was his feeble step. Shaks.
I'll tell thee all thy whole device
At the park gate; and therefore haste away,
For we must measure twenty miles to-day. Shaks.
The vessel ploughs the sea,
And measures back with speed her former way.
Dryden.

3. To judge of quantity or extent, or greatness.

Great are thy works, Jehovah; infinite thy power! What thought can measure thee, or tongue relate thee? Milton, P. L.

4. To adjust; to proportion.

To secure a contented spirit, measure your desires by your fortunes, not your fortunes by your desires. By. Taylor.

Silver is the instrument as well as measure of commerce; and 'tis by the quantity of silver he gets for any commodity in exchange that he measures the value of the commodity he sells. Locke.

5. To mark out in stated quantities.

What thou seest is that portion of eternity which is called time, measured out by the sun, and marching from the beginning of the world to its consummation. Addison, Spect.

6. To allot or distribute by measure.

With what measure you mete, it shall be measured to you again. St. Mat. vi. 2.

MEASURELESS.† adj. [from measure.] Imme- asurable; immeasurable.

He shut up in measureless content. Shaks.
Compa'd with measureless eternity.

J. Hall, Poems, (1646.) p. 71.

MEASUREMENT.† n. s. [from measure.] Measurement; act of measuring; result of measuring.

Accurate measurements of all sorts of beautiful animals.

Barle on the Subl. and Beautiful, P. iii. §. 4.
MEASUREMENT.† n. s. [from measure.] One that measures.

The world's bright eye, time's measurer, begun
Through watery Capricorn his course to run.

Hovell, Poem to K. Ch. I. (1641.)
MEASURING. adj. [from measure.] It is applied to a cast not to be distinguished in its length from another but by measuring.

When lusty shepherds throng
The bar by turns, and none the rest out-go
So far, but that the best are measuring casts,
Their emulation and their pasture lasts. Wallar.

MEAS.† n. s. A bound. See MEAS.

TO MEAS.† v. a. To divide. See TO MEAS.

MEAT.† n. s. [metæ, mete, food, Saxon;
mæt, Goth. the same; the past participle,
Mr. H. Tooke observes, of matjan, metjan, to eat.]

1. Flesh to be eaten.

To the father he sent ten oxen laden with corn, and bread, and meat for his father by the way. Gen. xli. 23.

Carnivore, and birds of prey, are no good meat;
but the reason is, rather the choleric nature of those birds than their feeding upon flesh; for prents and ducks feed upon flesh, and yet are good meat. Bacon, Nat. Hist.

There was a multitude of exotics; as, the vegi-tatical mællæ, e. x. upon meat. Arbutnot.

2. Food in general.

Never words were music to thine ear,
And never most sweet savours in thy taste,
Unless I spoke or car'd. Shaks. Com. of Err.
Meats for the belly, and the belly for meats; but God shall destroy both. 1 Cor. vi. 13.

MEATED. adj. [from meat.] Fed; fodered.

Strong oxen and horses, wæl shed and wæl
ed, Wel meated and used. Tusser, Husb.

MEATY.† n. s. [See the etymology of MEAD.]

1. A drink, like mead; or probably the same.

Mouth made of honey, or liquorice sodden in water.

Robinson, Tr. of Moré's Utopia, (1551.) ii. 1.
For drink the grape

She crushes, inoffensive must, and mæth
From many a berry. Milton, P. L.

2. Option; preference. [what one mayeth.
Mr. H. Tooke, Div. of Purl. ii. 421.]
Used in Lincolnshire. Skinner and Grose. As, "I give thee the meat of buying."

MEATY.† adj. [from meat.] Fleshly, but not fat. Norfolk.

TO MEAW.† v. n. [miaua, Icel. miauler,
TO MEAWL.† French.] To cry as a cat.

See TO MEW. It is vulgarly pronounced, as it was thus formerly written, instead of mew. See Sherwood's Dict. And thus quack was written quake, to represent the sound better.

MEAZLING. part. generally called miz-zling.

The air feels more moist when the water is in small than in great drops; in measuring and soaking rains, than in great showers. Arbutnot on Air.

MECHANICAL. } adj. [mechanicus, Lat.; MECHANICK. } mechanique, French;
 from μηχανή.]

1. Constructed by the laws of mechanics.

Many a fair precept in poetry, is like a seeming demonstration in mathematics; very precious in the diagram, but failing in the mechanic operation. Dryden.

The main business of natural philosophy, is to argue from phenomena without feigning hypotheses, and to deduce causes from effects till we come to the very first cause, which certainly is not mechanical; and not only to unfold the mechanism of the world, but chiefly to resolve these, and such like questions. Newton, Opt.

2. Skilled in mechanics; bred to manual labour.

3. Mean; servile; of mean occupation.

Know you not, being mechanical, you ought not walk upon a labouring day, without the sign of your profession? Shakspeare.

Hang him, mechanical salt-butter rogue! I will stare him out of his wits; I will leave him with my cudgel. Shakspeare.

Mechanical slaves,

With greasy aprons, rules, and hammers, shall Uplift us to the view. Shakspeare, Ant. and Cleop.
 To make a god, a hero, or a king,
 Descend to a mechanical dialect. Bacon, Novum.

MECHANICK. n. s. A manufacturer; a law workman.

Do not bid me
 Dismiss my soldiers, or capitulate
 Again with Rome's mechanicks. Shakspeare, Coriol.

A third proverb is a very heavy philosopher, who possibly would have made a good mechanick, and have done well enough at the useful philosophy of the spade or the axvil. South.

MECHANICKS. n. s. pl. [mechanica, Latin.]

Dr. Wallis defines mechanics to be the geometry of motion, a mathematical science, which shews the effects of powers, or moving forces, so far as they are applied to engines, and demonstrates the laws of motion. Harri.

The rudiments of geography, with something of mechanicks, may be easily conveyed into the minds of active young persons. Watts, Impr. of the Mind.

Salmonus was a great proficient in mechanicks; and inventor of a vessel which initiated thunder. Brown.

To MECHANICALIZE. v. a. [from mechanical.] To render mean or low.

Cotgrave, and Sherwood.

MECHANICALLY. adv. [from mechanick.]

According to the laws of mechanism.

They suppose even the common animals that are in being, to have been formed mechanically, among the rest. Ray.

Later philosophers feign hypotheses for explaining all things mechanically, and refer other causes to metaphysics. Newton.

MECHANICALNESS. n. s. [from mechanick.]

1. Agreeableness to the laws of mechanism.

2. Meanness. Cotgrave, and Sherwood.

MECHANICIAN. n. s. [mechanician, Fr.]

A man professing or studying the construction of machines.

I appeal to painters, mechanicians, mathematicians. Barton, Anat. of Med. p. 92.

Some were figured like male, others like female screws, as mechanicians speak. Boyle.

MECHANISM. n. s. [mechanisme, French.]

1. Action according to mechanic laws.

After the chyle has passed through the lungs, nature continues her usual mechanism, to convert it into animal substances. Arbutnot on Aliment.

He acknowledges nothing besides matter and motion; so that all must be performed either by mechanism or accident, either of which is wholly unaccountable. Bentley.

2. Construction of parts depending on each other in any complicated fabric.

MECHANISM. n. s. [from mechanism.] A mechanism.

The mechanist will be afraid to assert before hardy contradiction, the possibility of tearing down bulwarks with a silk-worm's thread; and the astronomer of relating the rapidity of light, the distance of the fixed stars, and the height of the lunar mountains. Johnson, Rambler, No. 117.

MECHLIN. adj. The epithet given to lace made at Mechlin.

With eager beats his mechlin cravat moves. Town Eclogues.

MECHOACAN. n. s. [from the place.]

Accept a bottle made of a serpentine snake, which gives us some infused therein for four or twenty hours the taste and operation of the Spaw water, and is very medicinable for the cure of the spleen.

Watson.

The hearts and galls of pikes are medicinable.

Watson.

MEDICINAL.† adj. [medicinalis, Latin:] this word is now commonly pronounced medicinal, with the accent on the second syllable; but more properly and agreeably to the best authorities, medicinal on the third. Dr. Johnson.—

This is not strictly the case. For Dr. Johnson has introduced an example from Milton, as if the great poet had countenanced medicinal, where the true reading is medicinal, namely in Samson Agonistes; which Milton also had before employed in Comus; though Dr. Johnson has not noticed it. See the edition of Milton's Poetical Works, 1809, vol. v. p. 396. In like manner, two examples from Donne, now added, will show that medicinal was the pronunciation, even though written medicinal.]

1. Having the power of healing; having physical virtue.

Come with words as medicinal as true
Honest as either; to purge him of that humour
That presses him from sleep.

Shakespeare, Wind. Tale.
Since herbs and roots by dye lose not all,
But they, yea aches too, are medicinal.

Donne, Poems, p. 215.
Of medicinal and aromatick twigs.

Ibid. p. 263.
The medicinal bitterness hath its ingredients,
truth and charity.

Bp. Morton, Discharge, &c. p. 247.
And yet more medicinal is it than that Moly.

Milton, Comus.
Thoughts my tormentors, arm'd with deadly stings,

Mangle my apprehensive tenderest parts;
Exasperate, excoberate, and raise,
Dire inflammation, which no cooling herb Nor medicinal liquor can assuage. Milton, S. A.
The second causes took the swift command,
The medicinal head, the ready hand;
All but eternal doom was conquer'd by their art.

Dryden.

2. Belonging to physick.

Learned he was in med'cal lore,
Far by his side a pouch he wore,
Replete with strange hermetick powder,
That wounds nine miles point-blank with soldier.

Butler.
Such are called medicinal days by some writers, wherein no crisis or change is expected, so as to forbid the use of medicines; but it is most properly used for those days wherein purging, or any other evacuation, is more conveniently completed.

Quincy.
Medicinal hours are those wherein it is supposed that medicines may be taken, commonly reckoned in the morning fasting, about an hour before dinner, about four hours after dinner, and going to bed; but times are to be governed by the symptoms and aggravation of the disorder.

MEDICINALLY,† adv. [from medicinal.]

Physically.
Philosophically, medicinally, to show the causes, symptoms, and several cures of it, [melancholy,] that it may be the better avoided.

Barton, Anat. of Mel. To the Reader.
The witnesses that leach-like liv'd on blood,
Sucking for them were medicinally good.

MEDICINE,† n. s. [medicine, French; medicina, Lat. It is generally pronounced as if only of two syllables, med'cine.]

1. Physick; any remedy administered by a physician.

O, my dear father! restoration, hang thy medicine on my lips; and let this kiss Repair those violent harms. Shakespeare, K. Lear.

A merry heart doth good like a medicine; but a broken spirit drieth the bones. Prov. xvii. 22.

I wish to die, yet dare not death endure;
Detest the medicine, yet desire the cure. Dryden.

2. A physician. [medecin, Fr.] Not in use.

Meet we the medecin of the sickly weal;
And with him pour we in our country's purge,
Each drop of us. Shakespeare, Macbeth.

To MEDICINE,† v. a. [mediciner, old French; from the noun.] To restore or cure by medicine; to apply medicine to.

Not now perhaps in use.
Not all the drowsy syrups of the world,
Shall ever medicine thee to that sweet sleep
Which thou ow'st dost yesterday. Shakspeare, Othello.

Thus medicine our eyes, we need not doubt to see more into the meaning.

Milton, Tetrachordon.

Johnson, Fug. Err.

MED'IOCRE,* adj. [French; from mediocris, Lat.] Of moderate degree; of middle rate; middling. A word introduced perhaps into our language by Swift; as I gather from additions made to the former edition of this dictionary: in which, however, I observed that Snijff had used the word mediocrist; and that the French word is old.

The verses—were very mediocris in themselves.

Swift, Lett. to Pope.

MED'IOCRIST,* n. s. [from mediocris, Fr.] One of middling abilities.

He (Hughes) is too grave a poet for me; and I think among the mediocrists in prose as well as verse.

Swift, Lett. to Pope.

MED'IOCRITY. n. s. [mediocrité, French; mediocritas, Latin.]

1. Moderate degree; middle rate.

Men of age seldom drive business home to the full period, but content themselves with a mediocrity of success.

There appeared a sudden and marvellous conversion in the duke's case, from the most exalted to the most depressed, as if his expedition had been capable of no mediocrity.

He likes the mediocrity of wit to one of a mean fortune, who manages his store with great parsimony; but who, with fear of running into profusion, never arrives to the magnificence of living.

Dryden, State of Innocence.
Getting and improving our knowledge in substances only by experience and history, is all that the weakness of our faculties in this state of mediocrity, while we are in this world, can attain to.

Lark.

2. Moderation; temperance.

Least appetite, in the use of food, should lead us beyond that which is meet, we owe obedience to that law of reason which teacheth mediocrity in meats and drinks.

When they urge us to extreme opposition against the church of Rome, do they mean we should be drawn unto it only for a time, and afterwards return to a mediocrity.

Hosker.

To MEDITATE. v. a. [mediter, French; meditor, Latin.]

1. To plan; to scheme; to contrive.

Some affirmed that I meditated a war; God knows, I did not then think of war. K. Charles.

With inward rage he meditates his prey. Dryden.

Before the memory of the flood was lost, men meditated the setting up a false religion at Babel.

Farley.

2. To think on; to revolve in the mind.

Then among
There set a man of ripe and perfect age,
Who did them meditate all his life long.

Spenser, F. Q.
Blessed is the man that doth meditate good things in wisdom, and that reasoneth of holy things.

Eccles. xiv. 30.

To MEDITATE. v. n. To think; to muse; to contemplate; to dwell on with intense thought. It is commonly used of pious contemplation.

His delight is in the law of the Lord, and in his law doth he meditate night and day. Psal. i. 2.

I will meditate also of all thy work, and talk of all thy doings.

Psalm. lxxvi. 15.

Meditate till you make some act of piety upon the occasion of what you meditate; either get some new arguments against a sin, or some new encouragements to virtue.

Bp. Taylor.
To worship God, to study his will, to meditate upon him, and to love him; all these bring pleasure and peace.

Tillotson.

MEDITATION. n. s. [meditation, French; meditatio, Latin.]

Brerewood.

2. Inland; remote from the sea.

It is found in mountains and mediterraneus parts; and so it is a fat and uncultivated sublimation of the earth.

Brown.

We have taken a low height of the mountains than is requisite, if we respect the mediterraneus mountains, or those that are at a great distance from the sea.

Burnet.

MEDIUM,† n. s. [medium, Latin. Sometimes the Latin plural media is used, instead of the English mediums.]

1. Any thing intervening.

Whether any other liquors, being made mediums, cause a diversity of sound from water, it may be tried.

Bacon.

The most barbarous nations, and uncivil people who know no arts or sciences, and consequently no artificial means, have known, acknowledged, and worshipped a God.

Bp. Horius, Rem. p. 547.

I must bring together
All these extremes; and must remove all mediums,
That each may be the other's object. Drakem.

Seeing requires light and a free medium, and a right line to the objects; we can hear in the dark, unimpaired, and by curve lines.

Hollier.

4

He, who looks upon the soul through its outward actions, often sees it through a deceitful medium, which is apt to discolour the object.

Addison, Spect.

The parts of bodies on which their colours depend, are denser than the medium which pervades their interstices.

Newton, Opticks.

Against filling the heavens with fluid mediums, unless they be exceeding rare, a great objection arises from the regular and very lasting motions of the planets and comets in all manner of courses through the heavens.

Newton, Opticks.

2. Any thing used in ratiocination, in order to a conclusion ; the middle term in an argument, by which propositions are connected.

This cannot be answered by those mediums which have been used.

MEEK. adj. [from miuk, soft, Icel. and Su. Goth. See To MEEK.]

1. Mild of temper; not proud; not rough; not easily provoked; soft; gentle.

Moses was very meek above all men.

Numb. xii. 3.

But he her fears to cease, Sent down the meek-ey'd pence.

Milton, Ode, Nativ.

We ought to be very cautious and meek-spirited, till we are assured of the honesty of our ancestors.

Collier.

2. Expressing humility and gentleness.

Both confound Humbly their faults, and pardon begg'd, with tears

Watering the ground, and with their signs the air

Frequenting, sent from hearts contrite, in sign Of sorrow unfeign'd, and humiliation; as in Milton, P. L.

To MEEK. v. a. [from meek, Su. Goth. mykia, Icel. from miuk.] To humble.

He that higheth himself shall be meek; and he that meeketh himself shall be enhumiliated.

Wicliff, St. Matt. xxi.

Shall not God spare woe and felle creatures mewing themselves, and knowing they owe in fytmyte?

Bp. Fisher, Ps. p. 10.

To MEEKEN. v. a. [from meek.] To make meek; to soften. This word I have found nowhere else, Dr. Johnson says, citing only the last of the passages from Thomson. It had been in use more than a century before Thomson's time, and Thomson seems to have been fond of the word.

A journey tedious for a strength so young I undertook:—

Climb'd mountains where the wanton kidding dalls, Then with soft steps enm'd the meekens'd valleys, In quest of memory.

Where meekens'd sense, and amiable grace, And lively sweetness dwell.

The sun sheds equal o'er the meekens'd day.

The glancing lion roars, his horrid hair Was meekens'd, and he join'd his sullen joy.

Thomson, Autumn.

MEEKLY. adv. [from meek.] Mildly; gently; not ruggedly; not proudly.

Be therefore, O my dear lords, pacify'd, And this sea-meeting discord meekly lay aside.

No pride does with your rising honours grow, You meekly look on suppliant crowds below.

Spenser, F. Q.

Meekness, n. s. [from meek.] Gentleness; mildness; softness of temper.

That pride and meekness mixt by equal part, Do both appear to adorn her beauty's grace.

You sign your place and calling, in full seeming.

With meekness and humility; but your heart Is cramm'd with arrogance, spleen, and pride.

When his distemper attacked him, he submitted to it with great meekness and resignation, as became a Christian.

MEER. adj. [See MERE.] Simple; unmixed.

MEER. n. s. [See MERE.] A lake; a boundary.

MEERED. adj. Relating to a boundary; meer being a boundary or mark of division.

What, although you fled—why should he follow?

The itch of his affection should not then Have nick'd his captainship; at such a point, When half to half the world oppos'd, he being The moved question.

MEET. adj. [of obscure etymology.]

1. Fit; proper; qualified; applied both to persons and things. Now rarely used, except as a northern expression.

Alas! my dear love, why do you sleep this long, When meeter were that you should now awake?

If the election of the minister should be committed to every parish, would they choose the meeter?

Spenser.

W. Higgin.

I am a tainted wether of the flock,
Mute for death. Shakespeare, Merch. of Ven.
 To be known shortens my laid intent,
 My boon I make it, that you know me not,
 'Till time and I think meet. Shakespeare, A. Lear.
 What at any time, have you heard her say?
 — That, sir, which I will not report after her.
 — You may to me, and 'tis most meet you should.

Shakespeare.
 York is meetest man
 To be your regent in the realm of France.

Shakespeare.
 The eye is very proper and meet for seeing.

2. MEET with. Even with. [from meet, the verb.] A very common expression in the midland counties, and signifies, he'll be your match, he'll be even with you. Stevens.

Niece, you tax Signior Benedick too much;
 but he'll be meet with you. Shakespeare.
 To MEET. v. a. pret. I met; I have met;
 particip. met. [metan, Saxon, to find;
moeten, Dutch. Dr. Johnson. — It is from the Gothic moþjan, to meet.]

1. To come face to face; to encounter, by travelling in opposite directions.
Met'st thou my possa? Shakespeare.
 His daughter came out to meet him with umbrells and doves. Judges, xl. 34.
 Meanwhile our primitive great sire, to meet
 His godlike guest, walks forth. Milton, P. L.
 2. To encounter in hostility.

To meet the noise
 Of his almighty engine, he shall hear Infernal thunder. Milton, P. L.
 So much'd they stood;
 For never but once more was either like
 To meet so great a foe. Milton, P. L.

3. To encounter unexpectedly.
 So judge thou wilt, presumptuous, till the wrath
 Which thus incur'st at by, prompt thy flight,
 Sevenfold, and scourge that wisdom back to hell.
Milton, P. L.

4. To join another in the same place.
 Chance may lead where I may meet
 Some wandering spirit of Heaven by fountains side. Milton, P. L.
 Or in thick shade retired.

Milton, P. L.
 I knew not, till I met
 My friends, at Ceres' now deserted seat. Dryden.
 Not lock back to see,
 When what we love we ne'er must meet again. Dryden.

5. To close one with another.
 The nearer you come to the end of the lake, the mountains on each side grow higher, till at last they meet. Addison.

6. To find; to be treated with; to light on.
 Had I a hundred mouths, a hundred tongues,
 I could out half these horrid crimes repeat;
 Nor half the punishments those crimes have met.
Dryden.

Of vice or virtue, whether blest or curst,
 Which meets contempt, or which companion fire.
Page.
 To me no greater joy,
 Than that your labours meet a prosperous end.

Graville.
 7. To assemble from different parts. This is the right place for the example which follows from Milton, and which the folio editions partly exhibit. But in the quarto editions it is transferred to the third meaning of the neuter verb; and Mr. Malone says, that it surely belongs to the verb neuter. Such a mistake would not have been made, if the whole passage of the poet had been duly attended to: in which met is clearly the participle of the verb active meet, i. e. having been assembled together

from different parts.

Those two mazy pillars
 With horrible convulsion to and fro
 He tugg'd, he shook, till down they came and down
 The whole roof after them, with burst of thunder
 Upon the heads of all who sat beneath,
 Lords, ladies, captains, counsellors, or priests,
 Their choice nobility and flower, not only
 Of this but each Politian city round,
 Met from all parts to solemnize this feast.

Milton, S. A.

To MEET. v. n.
 1. To encounter; to close face to face.
 2. To encounter in hostility.
 Then born to distance by the ideas of men,
 Like adamant and steel they met again. Dryden.
 3. To assemble; to come together.
 They appointed a day to meet in together.

Mac.

The materials of that building happily met together, and very fortunately raised themselves into that delicate order, that it must be a very great chance that parts them. Tillotson.
 4. To MEET with. To light on; to find:
 it includes, sometimes obscurely, the idea of something unexpected.

When he conceals to experience of service abroad, he maketh as worthy a soldier as any nation he meriteth with. Spenner.

We met with many things worthy of observation. Bacon.
 Hercules' meeting with pleasure and virtue, was invented by Prodicus, who lived before Socrates.

Addison.

What a majesty and force does one meet with in these short inscriptions: are not you amazed to see so much history gathered into so small a compan? Addison on Anc. Medals.

5. To MEET with. To join.

Yellst off at oak shall meet with us. Shakspeare.
 6. To MEET with. To suffer unexpectedly.
 He, that hath suffered this disorderly spring,
 Hath ood himself met with the fall of leaf.

Shakspeare.

A little sum you mourn, while most have met
 Walk thro' the loss, and by as vile a cheat. Crotch.

7. To MEET with. To encounter; to engage.

Royal mistress,

Prepare to meet with more than brutal fury
 From the fierce prince. Rome, Amb. Step-mother.
 8. To MEET with. A Latinism. To obviate; before-occure objecto.

Before I proceed farther, it is good to meet with an objection, which if not removed, the conclusion of experience from the time past to the present will not be sound. Bacon.

9. To advance half way.

He yields himself to the man of business with reluctance, but offers himself to the visits of a friend with facility, and all the meeting readiness of desire. South.

Our meeting hearts

Convened soon, and marriage made us one. Rome.
 10. To unite; to join; as, these rivers meet at such a place and join.

MEET. n. s. [from meet.] One that ac-costs another.

There are beside

Lascivious meeters, to whose venem'd sound
 The open ear of youth doth always listen.

Shakspeare.

MEET. adv. See METE. 12

MEETING. n. s. [from meet.]

1. An assembly; a convention.
 If the fathers and husbands of those, whose relief this your meeting intends, were of the household of faith, then their relics and children ought not to be strangers to the good that is done in it, if they want it. Swift, Sermon.

Since the ladies have been left out of all meetings except parties at play, our conversation hath degenerated. Swift.

2. An interview.
 Let's be revenged on him; let's appoint him a meeting, and lead him on with a fine baited delay.
Shakspeare.

3. A conventicle; an assembly of dissenters.

4. A conflux: as, the meeting of two rivers.
 MEETING-HOUSE. n. s. [meeting and house.]
 Place where dissenters assemble to worship.

His heart misgave him that the churches were no more meeting-houses; but I soon made him easy.

Addison.

MEETLY. adv. [from the adjective.]
 Fitly; properly.

You can do better yet; but this is meetly.

Shakspeare, Act. and Clop.

See then all this contrariety of sects most well reconciled. Sp. Bredin, Cyp. of Cert. l. 923.

MEETNESS. n. s. [from meet.] Fitness; propriety.

This worthiness of meetness, fitness, or due disposition for the heavenly glory, comprehends a deep and profound sense of our own utter unworthiness of it. Sp. Bull. Works, i. 384.

MEGACROM. n. s. [μαγας, great, κρομα,
 the world, Gr.] The great world.

I desire him to give me leave to set forth our microcosm, then, in some such deformed way, as he doth the megacosm, or great world.

Sp. H. Croft, Anim. on Burnet's Theory, 1683, p. 138.

MEGAPOLIS. n. s. [μαγας, great, πολις,
 a city.] A principal city; metropolis.
 Not in use.

Amadard — is at this present the megapolis of Cambray. Sp. T. Herbert, Trans. p. 64.

MEGRIN. n. s. [from hemigrina; Latin,
hemigrina; Gr. ημιγραφια; Fr. migrain.
 Our own word at this was migrain. See Huloet's Dict.] Disorder of the head.

In every megrin or vertigo there is an observation joined with a semblance of turning round.

Bacon, Nat. Hist.

There screen'd in shades from day's detested
 glare,
 Sleepn sighs for ever on her pensive bed,
 Pain at her side, and megrin at her head. Pope.

He accused some of giving all their customers
 colicks and megrins. Tulzer, No. 131.

To MEIN. n. s. [Dr. Johnson merely introduces this word from Ainsworth, without etymology, and without example. It is one of our oldest; and is the Sax. menjan, to mix.] To mingle.
 Obsolete. The participle, meint or meint.

Of love the sickesse
 Is meint with sweete and bitterness.

Chaucer, Rom. R. 2296.

The salt Medway, that trickling stream
 Adornes the dales of Kent,
 Till with his elder brother Thames
 His brackish waves be meint.

Spenser, Shep. Cal. July.

Amongst the woods that thrives meet.

Spenser, Virg. a. Gnat.

MEIN. n. s. [mezin, French. See the second sense of the substantive many.]

Wicliffe uses the adjective meynel, "Grete ghe wel her meynel chirche," which in our present version is, "the church that is in their house," Rom. xvi. 5.] A family; a retinue; domestic servants.

When Jacob came to a forde, he made all his meyn to go before. Lut. Fatio, fol. 18. b. Whilst all the world consisted of a few householders, the elder (or father of the family) exercised authority over his meyn.

They summon'd up their meyn; strait took home;
Commanded me to follow, and attend.
Shakespeare, K. Lear.

The words are a meliosis, and import much more than they express. South, vol. iv. s. 10.

MELAMPODE. * n. s. [melampode, Lat.] The black hellebore.
Here grows melampode every where,
And terebinth, good for gouts.
Spenser, Shep. Cal. July.

MELANAGOGUES. n. s. pl. (from melan; and gag.) Such medicines as are supposed particularly to purge off black choler.

MELANCHOLICK. * adj. (from melancholy.) 1. Disordered with melancholy; fanciful; hypochondriacal; gloomy.

Our melancholick friend, Propertius,
Hath plac'd himself up in his Cynthia's tomb:
And will by no intreaties be drawn thence.

B. Jonan, Postulat.
If he be mad, or angry, or melancholick, or sprightly, he will paint whatsoever is proportionable to any one. Dryden.

The commentators on old Aristotle, 'tis urg'd, in judgment vary:
They to their own conceits have brought
The image of his general thought:
Just as the melancholick eye
Sees fleets and armies in the sky. Prior.

2. Unhappy; unfortunate; causing sorrow.
The king found himself at the head of his army, after so many accidents and melancholick perplexities. Clarendon.

3. Dismal. Not noticed by Dr. Johnson.
Like the black and melancholick yew-tree,
Dost think to root thyself in dead men's graves,
And yet to prosper? Webster, Vittoria Corombona.
I was tempted to it, by the melancholick prospect I had of it. Dryden, Lett. ed. Malone, l. 8.

MELANCHOLIAN. * n. s.

MELANCHOLICK. * n. s.

1. A person diseased with melancholy.
We shall accordingly observe omens, the falling of salt, a dream of a funeral, an unlucky day or hour, the voice of the scintilla, odd noises in the night, to command the most solemn regards of persons whose imagination is more active and busy than their reason; heathens, women, young persons, melancholicks, superstitious or infirm persons, the illiterate multitude. Spenser on Prodigies, (1665), p. 75.

You may observe, in the modern stories of our religious melancholicks, that they commonly pass out of one passion into another, without any manner of reasoning. Scott, Works, (ed. 1718), li. 125.

2. A gloomy state of mind.

My condition is much more than yours, and different I believe from any other man's; and will very well justify the melancholick that, I confess to you, possesses me. Ld. Clarendon, Life, p. 11.

VOL. II.

MELANCHOLY. * adv. (from melancholy.) In a melancholy manner.

On a pedestal — is set the statue of this young lady, reposing herself in a curious wrought out chair, all of polished alabaster; melancholically inclining her cheek to her right hand.

Kemp, Monument. Westminster, (1685), p. 69.

MELANCHOLINESS. * n. s. (from melancholy.) Disposition to gloominess; state of being melancholy.

When a boy, he was phlegmatic enough; but withal he had then a contemplative melancholiness. Aubrey, Acc. of Hobbes, Anec. ii. 600.

This false persuasion in the quakers of being immediately inspired, arises from the melancholiness of their temper. Hobbes, Acc. of Familism, (1678), p. 105.

MELANCHOLIOUS. * adj. [melancholios, old French.] Melancholy; gloomy; dismal. A word well authorized, but not now in use.

And am so melancholious. Gower, Conf. Am. B. 5.
However flat and melancholious it be, and must serve, though to the eternal disturbance and languishing of him that complains. Milton, Doct. and Disc. of Div. i. 3.

MELANCHOLIST. * n. s. (from melancholy.) One disordered with melancholy; a fanciful or hypochondriacal person.

The melancholist was afraid to sit down for fear of being broken. Clarendon, Est. iv.

As laughter is a faculty peculiar to the human species, the resolution of a religious melancholick entirely to discard it may be reckoned a little easy towards putting away the properties of a rational creature. Bp. Laington, Enthus. of Math. and Pap. i. 20.

To MELANCHOLIZE. * v. a. (from melancholy.) To become melancholy or gloomy.

They dare not come abroad all their lives after, but melancholick in corners, and keep in holes.

Burton, Anat. of Mel. p. 99.
His phantasy is so restless, operative; and quick, that if he be not in perpetual action, ever employed, it will work upon itself, melancholick, and be carried away instantly with some fear, jealousy, discontent, suspicion, some vain conceit or other. Burton, Anat. of Mel. p. 990.

If we be not otherwise well employed, we shall be apt in our thoughts to melancholick, and dost upon our misfortunes; the sense of them will fasten upon our spirits, and gnaw our hearts. Burton, vol. iii. s. v.

To MELANCHOLIZE. * v. a. To make sad or melancholy. With the accent formerly on the second syllable, as it was also upon melancholy. See MELANCHOLY.

That thick cloud, you are now enveloped with, of melancholick old age, and undeserv'd adversity.

Mrs. Seng of the Soul, Dedicat. (1647).
Like faithful wife, that by her frugal piety,
Peevish demeanor, sullied sad disdain,
Doth deeply deep the sprightly melancholick
Of her aggrieved husband.

Mrs. Seng of the Soul, l. iii. 40.

MELANCHOLY. † n. s. [melancholie, Fr. from melan; and cholē, Greek. — This word was formerly accented on the second syllable by our poets, as by Spenser, B. Jonson, and Dryden; which Dr. Johnson has not noticed. Yet it was evidently poetical licence only; for Dryden thus uses the word, with the accent both on the first and second syllables:

"And being rous'd out of melancholly,
"Fly, whirle-wind thoughts, unto the heavens, quoth he."

Dryden, Shepherds Garland, (1695), p. 4.
"But melancholick grafted in thy braise."

Ibid. p. 5.

It may be added, that this word is rarely found in the plural number. An instance occurs in Lord Rivers's translation of the Dictes and Sayings of the Philosophers, printed by Caxton in 1477. "The maistre of a grete house hath many melancholies," sign. F. vi.]

1. A disease, supposed to proceed from a redundancy of black bile; but it is better known to arise from too heavy and too viscid blood: its cure is in evacuation, nervous medicines, and powerful stimuli. Quincy.

2. A kind of madness, in which the mind is always fixed on one object.

I have neither the scholar's melancholy, which is emulation; nor the musician's, which is fantastical; nor the courtier's, which is proud; nor the soldier's, which is ambitious; nor the lawyer's, which is politic; nor the lady's, which is nice; nor the lover's, which is all these: but it is a melancholy of mine own, compounded of many simples, extracted from many objects, and, indeed, the sundry contemplation of my travels, in which my often rumination wraps me in a most humorous sadness. Shakespeare, As you like it.
Moon struck madness, mooping melancholy. Milton, P. L.

3. A gloomy, pensive, discontented temper.

I protest, that he had only been to seek solitary places by an extreme melancholy that had possessed him. Hidney.

All these gifts come from him; and if we murmur here, we may at the next melancholy be troubled that God did not make us angels.

Bp. Taylor, Holy Living.
This melancholy flatters, but unmans you;
What is it else but penury of soul.

A lazy frown, a numbness of the mind? Dryden.
In those deep solitudes and awful cells,
Where heavenly pensive contemplation dwells,
And ever-musing melancholick reigns. Pope.

MELANCHOLY. * adj. [melancholique, Fr.]

1. Gloomy; dismal.

Think of all our miseries
But as some melancholick dream, which has awak'd us.

To the renewing of our joys. Denham.
If in the melancholy shades below,
The flames of friends and lovers cease to glow;
Yet mine shall avert ill, mine undecay'd,
Burn on through death, and animate my shade. Pope.

2. Diseased with melancholy; fanciful; habitually dejected.

How now, sweet Frank; art thou melancholy?
Shakespeare.

He observes Lamech more melancholy than usual, and imagines it to be from a suspicion he has of his wife Adah, whom he loved. Locke.

MELANGE. * n. s. (French.) A mixture.
Our conversation was a strange melange of French and Italian. Drummond, Trav. Lett. 2. (1744).

MELICERIS. n. s. [meliceris.]

Meliceris is a tumour inclosed in a cystis, and consisting of matter like curdy. If the matter resembles milk curds, the tumour is called aliteroma; if like honey, melicaria; and if composed of fat, or a suety substance, steatony.

Sharp.

MELILOT. n. s. [melilot, French; melilotus, Latin.] A plant.

TO MELOIATE. v. a. [meliorer, French, from melior.] To better; to improve.

Grafting meliorates the fruit; for that the nourishment is better prepared in the stock than in the crude earth.
Bacon.

But when we graft or buds inoculate,
Nature by art we nobly meliorate.
Denham.

A man ought by no means to think that he should be able so much as to alter or meliorate the humour of an ungrateful person by any acts of kindness.
South.

Castration serves to meliorate the flesh of those beasts that suffer in the groin.
Ground.

Much labour is requir'd in trees.
Well must the ground be digg'd, and better dress'd,
New soil to make, and meliorate the rest.
Dryden, Virg.

MELIORATION. n. s. [melioration, Fr.; from meliorate.] Improvement; act of bettering.

For the melioration of music that is yet much left, in this point of exquisite concert, to try.
Bacon.

Which is found a notable way for melioration of the fruit.
St. T. Brown, Miscell. p. 47.

A direct discouragement of melioration is directly as if the law had said in express terms, Thou shalt not improve.

Burke, Tracts on the Popery Laws.

MELIORITY. n. s. [from melior.] State of being better. A word very elegant, but not used.

Men incline unto them which are softest, and least in their way, in despite of them that hold them hardest to it; so that this colour of maturity and pre-eminence is a sign of weakness.
Bacon.

The order and beauty of the inanimate parts of the world, the discernable ends of them, the maturity above what was necessary to be, do evince, by a reflex argument, that it is the workmanship not of blind mechanism, but of an intelligent and benign agent.
Hewley.

TO MELLY. v. n. [meler, se meler, French.] To mix; to meddle. Obsolete.

Here is a great deal of good water
Lost for lack of telling;
Now sicker I see thou dost but sleep,
Harm may come of meddling. Spenser, Shep. Cal.

Hence, ye profane, meddle not with holy things!
Bp. Hall, Soc.

MELL. n. s. [mell, Latin.] Honey.

Her smiles were mell, and her looks were cheerful unto all;
Even such as neither wanton seeme, nor waiward;
mell, nor gall. Warner, Albion's England.

MELLI'FEROUS. adj. Productive of honey.
Dict.

MELLIFICATION. n. s. [melifico, Latin.] The art or practice of making honey; production of honey.

In judging of the air, many things besides the weather ought to be observed; in some countries, the silence of grasshoppers, and want of mellification in bees.
Arbuthnot.

MELLY'FLUCK. n. s. [mell and fluo, Latin.] A honied flow; a flow of sweetness.

He was after struck with the pastoral melliflucence of his lyric measures.

Warton, Milton's Sm. Poems, Pref.

MELLY'FLUENT. † adj. [mell and fluo, Lat.] Flowing with honey; flowing with sweetness.

A mellyfluous voice, as I am a true knight.
Shakespeare.

As all those things which are most mellyfluous are soonest changed into cooler and bitter, so are our vanities and pleasures converted into the bitterest sorrows.

Innumerable songsters, in the freshening shade
Of new sprung leaves, their modulations mix
Mellyfluous. Thomson, Spring.

The freely flowing verse
In thy immortal praise, O form divine,
Smooths her mellyfluous stream.
Alexander, Pleas. of Imag. B. 1.

And thus I construed the mellyfluous strain.
Shenstone, Eleg. 6.

MELLOW. † adj. [meapp, soft, Saxon; Skinner; more nearly from mollis, melle, mellum, mellaw; though r is indeed easily changed into l in common speech. Dr. Johnson.—Su. Goth. miæll, miællr, facile solubilis; miællæet, prædulcis. Serenius.]

1. Soft with ripeness; full ripe.

A storm, or robbery, call it what you will,
Shook down my mellow hangings, nay, my leaves.
Shakespeare.

An apple to my hand works different effects upon my senses: my eye tells me it is green; my nose, that it hath a mellow scent; and my taste, that it is sweet.

A little longer,
And nature drops him down without your sin,
Like mellow fruit, without a wistful storm.
Dryden.

2. Soft in sound.

Of seven smooth joints a mellow pipe I have,
Which with his dying breath Dametas gave.
Dryden.

3. Soft; unctuous.

Camomile sheweth mellow grounds fit for wheat.
Bacon.

4. Drunk; melted down with drink.

Greedy of physicians' frequent fees,
From female mellow praise he takes degrees.
Rowe, common.

In all thy humours, whether grave or mellow,
Thou'st such a tawny, toothy, pleasant fellow;
Hast so much wit, and mirth, and spleen about thee,
There is no living with thee, nor without thee.
Addison.

TO MELLOW. v. a. [from the adjective.]

1. To ripen; to mature; to soften by ripeness; to ripen by age.

Lord Aubrey Vere
Was done to death, and more than so, my father;
Even in the doubtful of his mellow'd years.
Shakespeare.

The royal tree hath left its royal fruit
Which mellow'd by the stealing hours of time,
Will well become the seat of majesty.
Shakespeare, Rich. III.

On foreign mountains may the sun rise
The grape's soft juice, and mellow it to wine.
Addison.

2. To soften.

They plow in the wheat stubble in December;
and if the weather prove frosty to mellow it, they do not plow it again till April. Mortimer, Hist.

3. To mature to perfection.

This episode, now the most pleasing entertainment of the Æneis, was so accounted in his own age, and before it was mellowed into that reputation which time has given it. Dryden.

TO MELLOW. v. n. To be matured; to ripen.

Though no stone tell thee what I was, yet thou
In my grave's inside see'st, what thou art now;
Yet thou'rt not yet so good, till us death lay
To ripe and mellow there: we're stubborn clay.
Dante.

MELLOWNESS. n. s. [from mellow.]

1. Maturity of fruits; ripeness; softness by maturity.

My reason can consider greenness, mellowness, sweetness, or coldness, singly, and without relation to any other quality that is painted in me by the same apple. Digby of Broden.

The Springs, like youth, fresh blossoms doth produce.

But Autumn makes them ripe, and fit for use;
So age a mature mellowness doth set
On the green promises of youthful heat. Denham.

2. Maturity; full age.

3. Softness of sound.

This is that "suaviloquentia," that mellowness and sweetness of speaking, so much praised in some of the Roman orators, in opposition to the rusticity of many declaimers.

Ath. Hort. Instruct. to the Cery of Tuam.

MELODY. n. s. [melodie, French; melis, Greek.] Music; sweetness of sound.

Melody may be defined the means or method of ranging single musical sounds in a regular progression, either ascending or descending, according to the established principles.

Arcton on Musical Expression.

The prophet David having singular knowledge not in poetry alone but in music also, judging them both to be things most necessary for the house of God, left behind him a number of divinely inspired poems, and was farther the author of adding unto poetry melody in public prayer, melody both vocal and instrumental, for the raising up of men's hearts, and the sweetening of their affections towards God.

Singing and making melody in your hearts to the Lord. Hosier.

Why rather, sleep, liest thou in smoky cribs, And lusht with buzzing night flies to thy slumber; Than in the perfum'd chambers of the great,

And lull'd with sounds of sweetest melody? Shakespeare.

Lend me your songs, ye nightingales: Oh pour The many-running soul of melody Thomson, Spring.

The women attendants perform only the most menial offices.

Gulliver's Travels.

ME'NIAL.† n. s. One of the train of servants.

Menials are those servants, which live within their master's walls.

Termet de la Ley.

Surely the great Housekeeper of the world, whose charge we are, will never leave any of his menials without the bread of sufficiency.

Bp. Hall, Balm of Gilead.

ME'NDMENT. \ n. s.* [from mend.] Amendment; improvement.

Zealous was, and would have all things mended;

But by that mendment nothing else he meant

But to be king; so that mark was his bent.

Mir. for Mag, p. 355.

This writer's flood shall be for their mendment or fertility, not for their utter vastation and ruin.

Bp. Gordon, Hierap. (1653) Pref.

ME'NINGES. n. s. [μενινγες.] The meninges are the two membranes that envelope the brain, which are called the pia mater and dura mater; the latter being the exterior involucre, is, from its thickness, so denominated.

The brain being exposed to the air growth fluid, and is thrust forth by the contraction of the meninges.

Wicman.

MENTAL. adj. [mentale, French; mentis, Latin.] Intellectual; existing in the mind.

What a mental power
This eye shoots forth! How big imagination Moves in this lip? To the dumbness of the gesture

One might interpret. Shakespeare, Timon.

So deep the power of these ingredients pierc'd,
Even to the inmost seat of mental sight,
That Adam, now enforc'd to close his eyes,
Sunk down, and all his spirits became entranc'd.

Milton, P. L.

The metaphor of taste would not have been so general, had there not been a conformity between the mental taste and that sensitive taste that affects the palate. Addison.

If the ideas be not innate, there was a time when the mind was without those principles; for where the ideas are not, there can be no knowledge, no assent, no mental or verbal propositions about them. Locke.

She kindly talk'd, at least three hours,
Of plastic forms, and mental pow'r. Prior.

Those inward representations of spirit, thought, love, and hatred, are pure and mental ideas, belonging to the mind, and carry nothing of shape or sense in them. Watts.

ME'NTALLY. adv. [from mental.] Intellectually; in the mind; not practically or externally, but in thought or meditation.

If we consider the heart the first principle of life, and mentally divide it into its constituent parts, we find nothing but what is in any muscle of the body. Rowley.

MENTION. n. s. [mention, Fr. mentio, Latin.]

1. Oral or written expression, or recital of any thing.

Think on me when it shall be well with thee; and make mention of me unto Pharaoh. Gen. xl. 14.

The Almighty introduces the proposal of his laws rather with the mention of some particular acts of kindness, than by reminding mankind of his severity. Rogers.

2. Cursory or incidental nomination.

Haply mention may arise
Of something not unreasonable to ask. Milton, P. L.

To ME'NTION. v. a. [mentioner, Fr. from the noun.] To write or express in words or writing.

I will mention the loving kindnesses of the Lord, and the praises of the Lord. Job. xliii. 7.

mephitick. } phitick is in the old vocabulary of Cockerm.] Ill savoured;
stinking.

Mephitical exhalations are poisonous or noxious steams issuing out of the earth, from what cause soever. Quincy.

Such is the famous grotto del cani in Italy, called the poisonous mouth; the streams whereof are of a mephitical or noxious quality.

Dr. Lavington, Ess. of Math. and Pop. ii. 154.
These philosophers consider men in their experiments, no more than they do mice in an air pump, or in a recipient of mephitick gas. Burke.

MERA'CIOUS. adj. [meracus, Lat.] Strong;
racy.

ME'RCABLE. adj. [mercior, Lat.] To be — Master, a mercenarie, or a pedant,

I know not what but formal to appear.

Shakespeare, Tem. of the Shew.

*ME'RCANTILE.* adj.* Trading; commercial;
relating to traders.

The only proceed (that I may use the mercen-tile term) you can expect, is thanks.

Howell, Lett. (dat. 1621.) l. i. 29.
Navigation and mercenarie negotiation are the two poles whereon that state doth move.

Howell, Instruct. For. Trav. p. 167.

The expedition of the Argonauts was partly mercenarie, partly military. Arbuthnot on Coins.
Let him travel, and fulfil the duties of the military or mercenarie life; let prosperous or adverse fortune call him to the most distant parts of the globe, still let him carry on his knowledge, and the improvement of his soul. Watts.

ME'RCAT. n. s. [mercatus, Lat.] Market;

practice of buying and selling.

*ME'RCENARINESS.* n. s.* [from mercenary.] Venality; respect to hire or reward.

Charity casts out all other mercenariness. 1st. Duty of Man, Bond. vi.

To forego the pleasures of sense, and undergo the hardships that attend a holy life, is such a kind of mercenariness, as none but a resigned, believing soul is likely to be guilty of; if, for itself, and even the fear of hell, may be one justifiable motive of men's actions. Boyle.

ME'RCENARY. adj. [mercenaire, Fr.
mercennarius, Lat.]

1. Venal; hired; sold for money.
Many of our princes, woe the while!
Lie down'd, and soak'd in mercenary blood. Shakespeare.

Divers Almans, who served in his garbison, being merely mercenary, did easily incline to the strongest. Haywood.

2. Too studious of profit; acting only for hire.

The appellation of servant imports a mercenary temper, and denotes such an one as makes his reward both the sole motive and measure of his obedience. South, Sermon.

'Twas not for nothing I the crown resign'd;
I still must own a mercenary mind. Dryden, Aureng.

*ME'RCENARY.* n. s.* [mercenaire, French.]
A hiring; one retained or serving for pay.

There are but sixteen hundred mercenaries. Shakespeare, Hen. V.

He a poor mercenary serves for bread;
For all his travel, only cloth'd and fed. Sandys.

*ME'RCER.* n. s.* [mercier, French. Dr.
Johnson.—Originally a mercer was a dealer in various articles: a sort of pedlar, as Cotgrave renders mercier,
"a mean haberdasher of small wares, a tradesman that retails all manner of small wares, and hath no better than a shed or booth for his shop." The Spanish mercero is much the same. Both are from the Latin merx, mercis, any kind of merchandise. See also ME'RCERY.]
One who sells silks.

The draper and mercer may measure religion as they please, and the weaver cast her upon what loom he please. Hovell.

These external manners of laments
Are mercy shadows to the unseen grief,
That swells with silence in the tortur'd soul.

It is below reasonable creatures to be conversant in such diversions as are mercy innocent, and have nothing else to recommend them. Addison.

Above a thousand bought his almsman mercy to find what he said against me.

Price out your life for other ends
Than mercy to oblige your friends.

2. Absolutely.
The same beneficence shall be oftentimes mercy only.

That grows to seed; things rank and gross in nature
Possess it mercy.

I am as happy
In my friend's good, as if 'twere mercy mine.

MERCETRIOUS, v. a. [meretricious, Latin.] Whorish; as that is practised by prostitutes; alluring by false show.

The meretricious world claps our cheeks,
And fondles us into fallacies.

An enchanting meretricious tide
Of sweets and graces overflows all.

Jeresh, for all her paintings and fine meretricious pranking herself up, was to be thrown out at the window, and her self to be devoured by dogs.

Our degenerate understandings having suffered a sad divorce from their dearest object, defile themselves with every meretricious semblance, that the variety of opinion presents them with.

Not by affected, meretricious airs,
But strict harmonious symmetry of parts.

MERCETRIOUSLY, v. a. [from meretricious.] Whorishly; after the manner of whores.

Meretriciously to hunt abroad after false affections.

MERCETRIOUSNESS, n. s. [from meretricious.] False allurement like those of strumpets.

MÉRIT. n. s. [meritum, Latin; merite, French.]

VOL. II.

1. Desert; excellence deserving honour or reward.

She deem'd I well deserv'd to die,

And made a merit of her cruelty. Dryden.

Not common, not more learn'd than good;

With manners generous as his noble blood;

To him the wit of Greece and Rome was known,

And every author's merit but his own. Pope.

Than titles, figures, shape, and dress;

That merit should be chiefly plac'd

In judgement, knowledge, wit and taste. Swift.

2. Reward deserved.

Those laurel groves, the merits of thy youth,

Which thou from Mahomet didst greatly gain,

While bold avenger of resistance turn,

Thy sword did godlike liberty maintain. Prior.

3. Claim; right; character with respect to desert of good or evil.

You have the captives; use them

As we shall find their merits and our safety

May equally determine. Shakespeare, A. Lear.

As I am studious to promote the honour of my native country, I put Chaucer's merits to the trial, by turning some of the Canterbury tales into our language. Dryden.

When a point hath been well examined, and our own judgement settled, after a large survey of the merits of the cause, it would be a weakness to continue fluttering. Watts.

TO MÉRIT. v. a. [meriter, French.]

1. To deserve; to have a right to claim any thing as deserved.

Amplify have merited of me, of all The infernal empire. Milton, P. L.

A man at best is incapable of meriting any thing from God. South, Sermon.

2. To deserve; to earn; it is used generally of good, but sometimes of ill.

Whosoever jewels I have merited, I am sure I have received none, unless experience be a jewel; that I have purchased at an infinite rate. Shakespeare, W. of Windsor.

If such rewards to vanquish'd men are due, What prize may Nisus from your bounty claim, Who merited the first rewards, and fame? Dryden.

MÉRITABLE. adj. [from merit.] Deserving of reward; fit to be rewarded.

The people generally are very captivous, and apt to applaud any meritable work. B. Jonson, Cus. is altered.

MÉRITOIRIOUS. adj. [meritoire, French; from merit.] Deserving of reward;

high in desert.

In justice of so great and meritorious a service, in bringing all the Irish to acknowledge the king for their life, they did great hurt. Spencer on Ireland.

The war that hath such a foundation will not only be reputed just, but holy and meritorious. Raleigh, Ess.

Sufficient means of redemption and salvation, by the satisfactory and meritorious death and obedience of the incarnate Son of God, Jesus Christ, God blessed for ever. Sanderus.

This is not only the most prudent, but the most meritorious charity, which we can practise. Addison, Spect.

MÉRITOIRIOUSLY. adv. [from meritorious.]

In such a manner as to deserve reward.

He carried himself meritoriously in foreign employments in time of the interdict, which held up his credit among the patriots. Watson.

MÉRITOIRIQUENESS. n. s. [from meritorious.] The act or state of deserving well.

There was a full persuasion of the high meritoriousness of what they did; but still there was no law of God to ground it upon, and consequently it was not conscience. South.

MÉRITOIRE. adj. [meritoire, French.]

Deserving of reward; meritorious.

How meritorious is thine deed

Of charity to clothe and feed

The poor folk. Gower, Conf. Am. Prol.

It is more meritorious and better to have pity upon the fool than upon the worldly wise man. Ld. Rivers, Discourse, Sayings of the Philos. (1477), A. vi.

5 C

MERRIMAKE, n. s. [merry and make.] A festival; a meeting of mirth; merry pranks.

Thou'st, now nix the time of merrymake,
Nor Pan to beie, nor wit with love to play;
Sike mirth in May is meetest for to make,
Or summer shade, under the cocked hay.

Spenser, Shep. Cal.
The knight did not forbear,
Her honest mirth and pleasure to partake,
But when he saw her gibe, and toy, and gaze,
And pass the bounds of modest merrymake,
Her dalliance he despised.

Spenser, F. Q.
To MERRIMAKE, v. n. To feast; to be jovial.

With thee 'twas Marian's dear delight
To mull all day, and merrymake at night.

Gay, Pastorals.

A number of merriments and jests, wherewith they have pleasantly moved much laughter at our manner of serving God.

Hooker.
Methought it was the sound
Of riot and ill-managed merriment. Milton, Comus.

MERRINESS, n. s. [from merry.] Mirth; merry disposition.

The stile shall give us cause to climb in the merriness.

Shakespeare.

MERRY, adj. [Dr. Johnson has offered no etymology; it is the Saxon myrige, myrige, mery, mepie; of which an ancient sense is sweet, pleasant, agreeable; and so merry is used by our old authors. In Gen. xlii. 10. myrige is applied to the plain of Jordan, where our present translation uses the words, "as the garden of God," and a more ancient one, "paradise;" to denote a pleasant and fruitful country; and thus some of the old commentators, "sicut locus amenissimus."]

1. Pleasant; sweet; agreeable; delightful; charming. Dr. Johnson has given, as a third illustration of the word, a single example from Dryden, with the definition of prosperous; which belongs to the present meaning; hitherto overpassed in our dictionaries. Spenser thus applies merry to wind and weather; i. e. pleasant, or agreeable, not foul, not tempestuous, fair.

The nightingale with merry a note,

Answer'd him, that all the wood rang.

Chaucer, Flower and Leaf.

His voys was merryer than the merry organ,
On mase daies that in the churches gon.

Chaucer, Nonnes Pr. Tale.

A citee —

That stood full merry upon an haven side.

Chaucer, Nonnes Pr. Tale.

At length they all merry upon an haven side,
There eke my feeble bark awhile may stay,
Till merry wind and weather call her thence away.

Spenser, F. Q. i. xli. 1.

The merry harp with the lute, [in the older version, pleasant harp.]

Psalms lxxxi. 2.

In my small pinnace I can sail,
Contenting all the blustering rois;
And running with a merry laughing sail,
With friendly stars my safety seek.

Within some little winding creek,
And see the storm ashore.

Dryden.

2. Laughing; loudly cheerful; gay of heart.

They drank and were merry with him.

The vine languisheth, all the merry-loved sigh.

Im. xxiiv.

Some that are of an ill and melancholy nature, incline the company into which they come to be sad and ill-disposed; and others that are of a jovial nature, do dispose the company to be merry and cheerful.

Bacon, Nat. Hist.

Man is the merriest species of the creation; is all about and below him are serious.

Addison.

5. Causing laughter.

You kill'd her husband, and for that vile fault

Two of her brothers were condemn'd to death;
My hand cut off, and made a merry jest.

Shakespeare.

4. To make MERRY. To junket; to be jovial.

They trod the grapes and made merry, and went into the house of their God.

Judges, ix. 27.

A fox 'app'd a bevy of jolly, gossiping wenches making merry over a dish of pullets.

1. Estrange.

MERRY, n. s. [merrie, Fr.] The common wild red cherry.

MERRY-ANDREW, n. s. [This term is traced to a facetious practitioner in physick of Henry the Eighth's time, and who is said to have been the physician of that monarch. His name was Andrew Borde. "Dr. Borde was an ingenious man, and knew how to humour and please his patients, readers, and auditors. In his travels and visits, he often appeared and spoke in public; and would often frequent markets and fairs, where a conflux of people used to get together, to whom he prescribed; and to induce them to flock thither the more readily, he would make humorous speeches, couched in such language as caused mirth, and wonderfully propagated his fame! — 'Twas from the Doctor's method of using such speeches at markets and fairs, that in aftertimes those that imitated the like humorous, jocular language, were styled Merry Andrews; a term much in vogue on our stages." Hearne, Benedict. Abb. ed. Ox. 1735, tom. i. Pref. p. 50.] A buffoon; a zany; a jack-pudding.

He would be a satirist because he is a buffoon; as if there were no more to the making of a counsellor, than the faculties of a merry-andrew or tumbler.

1. Estrange.

The first who made the experiment was a merry-andrew.

Spektator.

MERRYMEETING, n. s. [merry and meet.] A meeting for mirth; a festival.

It struck their fancy luckily, and unattended the merry-meeting. Jp. Taylor, House of Estimating.

The studious man prefers a book before a revel, the rigors of contemplation before merry-meetings and jolly company.

South, Serms. vii. 400.

MERRYTHOUGHT, n. s. [merry and thought.] A forked blow on the body of fowls; so called because boys and girls play in play at the two sides, the longest part broken off betokening priority of marriage.

Let him not be breaking merrythoughts under the table with my cousin.

Edwards, Contempt of the Clergy.

MESBON, n. s. [merzio, Lat.] The act of sinking, or dipping.

16

The mesario also in water, and the mesario thence, do both give death to the former, (to a natural and worldly dullness,) and reciting to a new life.

Burton on Diapnoia.

MESERNAICK, n. s. [mesarapau; mesarapau, French; analogy requires it mesarapau.] Belonging to the mesenteric.

It tasteth leave of the permanent parts at the mouths of the nerves, which themselves enter into the mesenteric veins.

Brown, Vulg. Err.

The most subtle part of the chyle passeth immediately into the blood by the absorbent vessels of the guts, which discharge themselves into the mesenteric veins.

Arbutnot.

MESERNAICK, impersonal verb. [me and seems, or it seems to me: for this word it is now too common to use methinks or methought, an ungrammatical word. Dr. Johnson. — But see METHINKS.] I think; it appears to me; methinks.

Me seems that the party that forsoyeth his marriage doth sycend the law of nature.

State of Good Men. (Cast. 1486.) f. li. b. 6. Yet there, meserna, I hear her singing loud.

Sidney.

Meserned by my side a royal maid,
Her dainty limbs full softly down did slide.

Spenser, F. Q.

To that general adjunction of the land meserna that the custom or tenure can be no bar nor impeachment.

Spenser on Ireland.

MESENTERY, n. s. [mesenterique; mesenterie, French.] That round which the guts are convolved.

When the chyle passeth through the mesenterie, it is mixed with the lymph. Arbutnot on Alimente.

MESENTERICK, adj. [mesenterique, French; from mesenterie.] Relating to the mesenteric.

They are carried into the glands of the mesenteric, receiving a fine lymph from the lymphatic ducts, which dilutes this chylous fluid, and scours its containing vessels, which, from the mesenteric glands, unite in large channels, and pass directly into the common receptacle of the chyle.

Clergue.

MESH, n. s. [maesche, Dutch; maeke, old French; it was therefore better written, as it is commonly pronounced, maek.] The interstice of a net; the space between the threads of a net.

The drovers hang square nets athwart the tide, thorough which the shoal of pikehead passing, leave many behind entangled in the meshes.

Corcor, Surry of Cornwall.

Such a hare is maddest the youth, to skip o'er the meshes of good counsel the cripple.

Shakespeare, Merch. of Ven.

He spreads his subtle net from sight,
With twinkling glances to betray

Dryden.

The larks that in the meshes light.
With all their mouths the nerves the spirits drink,
Which through the cell of the fine strainers sink:
These all the channel'd fibres every way,
For motion and sensation, still convey:

The greatest portion of the arterial blood,
By the close structure of the parts withstood,
Whose narrow meshes stop the grosser food.

Shakespeare, Merch. of Ven.

To MESH, v. a. [from the noun.] To catch in a net; to ensnare.

They were so meshed in this kynde of follie, that they knewe neither what they sayde, nor what they did.

North, Tr. of Philosophie at Court, (1575.) p. 89.

The fire by cleare meshes in her hair,
By the bright radiance shewn

Dryden.

From her clear eyes, rich jewels were,
They so like diamonds shone.

Dryden.

Me'shy. adj. [from mesh.] Reticulated; of net-work.

Some build his house, but thence his issue bars,
Some make his meshy bed, but never his rest.

Caught in the meshy snare, in vain they beat
Their idle wings. Thomson.

Me'slin. n. s. [from mesler, French, to mix; or rather corruptly pronounced for miscellane. See MASLIN, Dr. Johnson.—It has been there observed, that the word is more probably of Goth. origin; maesthyn, Teut. farrago; mytic, Sax. various.] Mixed corn; as, wheat and rye.

What reason is there which should but induce, and therefore much less enforce, us to think, that case of dissimilitude between the people of God and the heathen nations about them, was any more the cause of forbidding them to put on garments of sundry stuff, than of charging them withal not to sow their fields with meslin. Hosier, iv. § 7.
If works for the thousand be mind for to have,
Of wheat and of meslin undimmed go sown.

Tasso.

MESOLEUTYS. n. s. [μεσολεύτης.] A precious stone, black, with a streak of white in the middle. Dict.

MESOLOGARITHMUS. n. s. [μεσολογάρητος, and αριθμός.] The logarithms of the cosines and tangents, so denominated by Kepler. Harris.

MESOMELAS. n. s. [μεσόμελος.] A precious stone with a black vein parting every colour in the midst. Bailey.

MESPRIS. n. s. [mespris, French. Dr. Johnson gives the word mespris, supposing it to be an error of the press in the first passage from Spenser, which only he has cited. It is indeed an error made in the second edition of the Fairy Queen, which some editions have followed. But mespris is repeated by the poet.] Contempt; scorn.

Mammon was much displeas'd, yet note he chuse
But bear the rigour of his bold mespris.
And thence him forward led, him further to en-vice. Spenser, F. Q. ii. vii. 39.

Then, if all fallye, we will by force it win,
And eke reward the wretch for his mespris,
As may be worthy of his haughty sin.

Spenser, F. Q. iii. ix. 9.
With love of her, and shame of such mespris.
Spenser, F. Q. iv. iv. 11.

MESS. n. s. [mes, old French; meso, Italian; misus, Latin; mes, Gothic; mye, Saxon, a dish. Dr. Johnson.—The past participle of the Saxon merpan, cibare, to furnish meat or food; in French metis; in Italian messo, from the same verb. Mr. H. Tooke, Div. of Parl. ii. 527.—I differ both from Dr. Johnson and Mr. Tooke. Yet Dr. Johnson, in part of his etymology, is thus supported by bishop Patrick. "It was the ancient custom for great men to honour such as were in their favour, by sending dishes to them, which were first served up to themselves: from whence they were called messes, messes, things sent." Note on Genesis, xlii. 34. But I consider the word as denoting a measure or portion; and thus Sir John Charn-din informs us that in Persia, Arabia, and the Indies, a carver parts each dish, which is set before the master of the house, or the principal guest, or in the middle of the hall, into as many portions, put into different plates, as there are people to eat. And so Benjamin's mess, on which the learned bishop has made the preceding remark, is five portions, or five times as much of every thing as any of his brethren's. Our word, in this sense, is to be found in the Germ. mass, a measure; and thus, in our old lexicography, mess is explained "a measure of meat, a mease of pottage." Huloet's Dict. See also MEAZE.]

1. A dish; a quantity of food sent to table together.

The bounteous huswife, nature, on each bush Lays her full mess before you. Shakspeare, Timon.
New your traveller,
He and his toothpick at my worship's mess.

I had as lief you should tell me of a mess of porridge.
Shakspeare, M. Wint. of Windsor.
Herbs and other country messes,
Which the neat-handed Phillis dresses.

Had either of the crimes been cooked to their palates,
they might have changed messes.
Decay of Chr. Piety.
From him he next receives it thick or thin,
As pure a mess almost as it came in. Pope.

2. The ordinary of military men at a regulated price; the meal provided for a certain number. See TO MESS.

TO MESS. v. n.

1. To eat; to feed. If this be the general sense of the word, of which however Dr. Johnson gives neither example nor etymology, it may be from the Saxon merpan, to furnish meat or food.

2. To contribute to the common expence of the table in settled proportions; to eat and drink together at a regulated price. Chiefly a military phrase. [from the substantive.]

We will place them at an Inn, where the officers of a regiment he had served in were messing.
Fyer, Sketches on Var. Subjects, (1796), p. 10.

MES'SAGE. n. s. [message, Fr. q. d. med-sagere, à Suio-Goth. med, cum, with, and aarga, dicere, to speak. Serenius.] An errand; any thing committed to another to be told to a third.

She doth display
The gate with pearls and rubies richly dight,
Through which her words so wise do make their way.

To bear the message of her gentle spirit. Spenser.
My one, that is a herald and a prince,
Do a message to his kingly son? Shakspeare.
She is fair, and fairer than that word,
Of wondrous virtues; sometimes from her eyes
I did receive fair speechless messages. Shakspeare.

Gently last thou told
Thy message, which might else in telling wearied
And in uttering end us. Milton, P. L.

Let the minister be low, his interest in-conderable, the word will suffer for his sake;
the dignity of the messenger.

The welcome message made, was soon receiv'd;
'Twas to be wish'd and hop'd, that scarce believ'd
Dryden.

ME'SSENGER. n. s. [messager, French. Dr.

Johnson.—And so our own word was at first written. "This message tormented was, till he tellen plain and plain, &c. Chaucer, Man of Lawes Tale.] One who carries an errand; one who comes from another to a third; one who brings an account or foretoken of any thing; an harbinger; a forerunner.

Came running in, much like a man dismay'd,
A messenger with letters, which his message said.

Spenser.

Yon grey lines,
That fret the clouds, are messengers of day. Shaks.

The earl dispatched messengers one after another to the king, with an account of what he heard and believed he saw, and yet thought not it to stay for an answer. Clerodant.

Joy touch'd the messenger of heav'n; he stay'd
Entranc'd, and all the blissful haunt survey'd.

Pope.

MESSIAH. n. s. [from the Hebrew.] The Anointed; the Christ; the Saviour of the world; the Prince of peace.

Great and publick opposition the magistrates made against Jesus, the son of Nazareth, when he appeared as the Messiah. Watts on the Mind.

MESSIAHSHIP. n. s. The office of the Messiah.

The Messiahship was pretended to by several impostors; but fallacy and falsehood being naturally weak, they still sunk and came to nothing.

Christ—gave as strong a proof of his Messiah- ship, as infinite power, joined with equal vascity, could give. South, Sermon, iii. 286.
South, Sermon, iii. 392.

MESSIAEUS. n. s. [French, plural of messie.] Sire; gentlemen.

MESMATE. n. s. [mess and mate.] One who eats at the same table.

MES'SUAGE. n. s. [messuagium, law Latin; formed perhaps from message by mistake of the n in court-hand for s, they being written alike, message from maison, French.] The house and ground set apart for household uses.

MET. the preterite and part of meed.

A set of well-measuring gentlemen in England, not to be met with in other countries, take it for granted they can never be wrong so long as they oppose ministers of state. Addison, Freeholder.

MET. n. s. [perhaps from mede.] A measure. A northern word. Grose, and Craven Dialect.

METABASIS. n. s. [Greek.] In rhetoric, a figure by which the orator passes from one thing to another. Dict.

METABOLA. n. s. [μεταβολή.] In medicine, a change of time, air, or disease.

METACARPAL. adj. [from metacarpus.] Belonging to the metacarpus. Dict.

It will facilitate the separation in the joint,
when you cut the finger from the metacarpal bone.
Shop, Surgery.

METACARPUS. n. s. [μετακαρπός.] In anatomy, a bone of the arm made up of four bones, which are joined to the fingers. Dict.

The conjunction is called synsarthrosis; as in the joining of the carpus to the metacarpus.

Wicman, Surgery.

METACHRONISM. n. s. [μετά and χρόνος, Gr.] A mistake in the computation of time; placing an event after the time when it really happened.

Capillus labourer to prove that it is a metachronism of six years. Keppler of five.
Gregory, Posthum. (1650), p. 165.

An error committed herein (the designation of time) is called anachronism; and either with too much, and that is a prochronism, or too little, and that is a metachronism. Ibid. p. 174.

METAGE. * n. s. [from to mete.] Measurement of coals.

METAGRAMMATISM. * n. s. [μετάγραμματισμός.]

Anagrammatism, or metagrammatism, is a dissolution of a name into its letters, as its elements, and a new connexion of it by artificial transposition, without addition, subtraction, or change of any letter into different words, making some perfect sense applicable to the person named. Camden.

METAL. * n. s. [metal, French; metallum, Lat.]

1. The metals are characterized as a class, by a peculiar degree of brilliancy and opacity; they are conductors of electricity and of heat; they include the heaviest and lightest solids, and differ extremely in fusibility: some are brittle; others, malleable and ductile. All the metals unite to oxygen, producing metallic oxides, which, combined with acids, form metallic salts. Journ. of Science, &c. No. 20, p. 286.

Metallics use a kind of terrace in their vessels for fusing metals; that the cooled metal run not out. Mason.

2. Courage; spirit. In this sense it is more frequently written mettle.

Being glad to find their companions had so much mettle, after a long debate the major part carried it. Clarendon.

3. Upon this signification the following ambiguity is founded.

Both kinds of metal he prepar'd,
Either to give blows or to ward;
Courage and steel both of great force,
Prepar'd for better or for worse. Hudibras.

METALLED. * See METTLED.

METALLESIS. * n. s. [μετάλησις.] A continuation of a trope in one word through a succession of significations. Bailey.

METALEPTICALLY. * adv. [from metalepsis.] By transposition.

The name of pronouns may metaleptically be extended to communications.

Bp. Sanderson, on Promiss. Oath, i. § 9.

METALLICAL. * adj. [from metallum, Lat.]

METALLICK. * adj. [metallique, Fr.] Partaking of metal; containing metal; consisting of metal.

The authors observing in that material a kind of metallized nature, or fusibility, seem to have resolved it to nobler use; an art now utterly lost. Watson, Architecture.

The lofty lines abound with metalline store,
Of metalline treasure, and metalline ore. Blackmore.

METALLIFEROUS. * adj. [metalliferus and fero, Latin.] Producing metals. Dict.

METALLINE. * adj. [from metall.]

1. Impregnated with metal.

Metalline waters have virtual cold in them; put therefore wood or clay into smith's water, and try whether it will not bear heat. Bacon.

2. Consisting of metal.

Though the quicksilver were brought to a very close and lovely metalline cylinder, not interrupted by interspersed bubbles, yet having caused the air to be again drawn out of the receiver, several little bubbles disclosed themselves. Boyle.

METALLIST. * n. s. [from metal; metalliste, Fr.] A worker in metals; skilled in metals.

Metallists use a kind of terrace in their vessels for fusing metals, that the melted metal run not out; it is made of quick time and ox blood. Mason, Mech. Exercitia.

METALLOGRAPHY. * n. s. [metallum and γραφία.] An account or description of metals. Dict.

METALLURGIST. * n. s. [metallurgiste, Fr.] A worker in metals.

METALLURGY. * n. s. [metallurgie, French; metallum and γραφία.] The art of working metals, or separating them from their ore.

Drayton personifies the Peak in Derbyshire, which he makes a witch skilful in metallurgy.

Watson, Notes on Milton's Sm. Poems.

METALLUM. * n. s. [metall and min.] A coppersmith; a tinsman.

A smith, or a metallum, the pot's never from his nose. Hurton, Anst. of Med. p. 110.

TO METAMORPHOSE. * v. a. [metamorphoseo, Fr. μεταμορφίζω.] To change the form or shape of any thing.

Thou, Julia, thou hast metamorphos'd me;
Made me neglect my studies, lose my time. Shakspeare.

They became degenerate and metamorphos'd like Nebuchadnezzar, who, though he had the face of a man, had the heart of a beast.

Dryden, on Ireland.

The impossibility to conceive so great a prince and favourite so suddenly metamorphos'd into travellers, with no train, was enough to make any man unbelieve his five senses. Watson.

From such rude principles our form began;
And earth was metamorphos'd into man. Dryden, Ovid.

METAMORPHOSER. * n. s. [from to metamorphose.] One who changes the shape.

What shall I name this man but a beastly metamorphoser both of himself, and of others?
Gauguin, Delic. Diet. for Drunkards (1576).

METAMORPHOSICK. * adj. [from metamorphosis.] Transforming; changing the shape.

All the metamorphosick fables of the ancients, turning politics and commercial people into horrid and savage monsters, will, like clouds before the sun, dissipate and evaporate before the light of truth. Formal on Anst. p. 68.

METAMORPHOSIS. * n. s. [metamorphosis, Fr. μεταμορφωσις.]

1. Transformation; change of shape.

His whole oration stood upon a short narration, what was the cause of this metamorphosis. Sidney.

Obscene talk is grown so common, that one would think we were fallen into an age of metamorphosis, and that the brutes did not only poetically but really speak. Gro. of the Tongue.

What! my noble colonel in metamorphosis?
On what occasion are you transformed? Dryden, Span. Friar.

There are probable machines in quick poems, where the gods are no less actors than the men; but the less credible sort, such as metamorphoses, are far more rare. Bacon.

2. It is applied by Harvey to the changes an animal undergoes, both in its formation and growth; and by several to the various shapes some insects in particular pass through, as the silk-worm and the like. Quincy.

METAPHOR. * n. s. [metaphore, Fr. μετάφορα.] The application of a word to an use to which, in its original import, it cannot be put; as, he brides his anger; he deadens the sound; the spring moothes the flowers. A metaphor is a simile compressed in a word; the spring putting in action the powers of vegetation, which were torpid in the winter, as the powers of a sleeping animal are excited by awaking him.

The work of tragedy is on the passions, and in a dialogue; both of them abound strong metaphors, in which the epopœa delights. Dryden, Ded. to Virg. Æn.

One died in metaphor, and one in song. Page.

METAPHORICAL. * adj. [metaphorique, Fr.] METAPHORICK. * adj. [from metaphor.] Not literal; not according to the primitive meaning of the word; figurative.

The words which were do continue; the only difference is, that whereas before they had a literal, they now have a metaphorical use. Hecker.

METAPHORICALLY. * adv. [from metaphorical.] Figuratively; not literally.

Such as are improperly melancholy, or metaphorically mean highly mean. Burton, Anst. of Med. To the Reader.

If strictly taken, it is not true; if metaphorically taken, though it be true, yet it is not precise. Pearson on the Creed, Art. 5.

METAPHORIST. * n. s. [from metaphor.] A maker of metaphors.

Let the poet send to the metaphorist for his allegorical and metaphorical words. Pepp. Mar. Scribner.

METAPHRASE. * n. s. [μετάφρασις.] A mere verbal translation from one language into another; a close interpretation.

Where the English metaphrase readeth, Thou shalt accept, &c. the Hebrew saith, Thou shalt consume. Gregory, Posthum. (1650), p. 254.

This translation is not so loose as paraphrase, nor so close as metaphrase. Dryden.

METAPHRASET. * n. s. [metaphrasie, Fr. μετάφρασις.] A literal translator; one who translates word for word from one language into another; an interpreter.

He (Symeon) obtained the distinguishing appellation of the metaphraset, because, at the command and under the auspices of Constantine Porphyrogenitus, he modernized the more ancient narrative of the miracles and martyrdoms of the most eminent eastern and western saints for the use of the Greek church; or rather digested from detached, imperfect, or obsolete books on the subject, a new and more commodious body of the sacred biography. Watson, Hist. E. P. ii. 190.

METAPHRASETICK. * adj. [from metaphraset.] Close in interpretation; literal.

Maximus Planudes has the merit of having familiarized to his countrymen many Latin classics of the lower empire, by metaphrasetick versions. Barton, Hist. E. P. ii. 169.

METAPHYSICAL. * adj.

METAPHYSICK.

1. Versed in metaphysics; relating to metaphysics.

He knew what's what, and that's as high as metaphysics will fly. Hudibras, i. l.

His ideas on that subject were much more Platonic and metaphysical.

Watson, Hist. E. P. i. 383.

2. In Shakspeare it means supernatural or preternatural. So metaphysically are called "supernatural arts." Engl. Dict. by H. C. 1655.

His thee blither,
That I may pour my spirits in thine ear;
And chaste with the valour of my tongue
All that impedes thee from the golden round,
Which fate, and metaphysical aid, doth seem
To have crown'd thee withal. Shakspeare, Measure for Measure

METAPHYSICALLY, adv. [from metaphysical.] In a metaphysical manner; with metaphysical distinction.

This argument seems metaphysically to conclude.
South, Sermon, viii. 261.

Supposing it were philosophically or metaphysically possible or conceivable.

METAPHYSICIAN, n. s. [metaphysicien, Fr.] One versed in metaphysics.

The pathetic or sublime states of Virgil would be but little relished by theologians and metaphysicians.
Warren, Hist. E. P. i. 340.

METAPHYSICK, n. s. [metaphysique, Gr. μετα φυσικα, the opening of Aristotle's chapter after that on physics.] Ontology; the doctrine of the general affections of substances existing.

The mathematicians and the metaphysicks,
Fall to them as you find your stomach serves you.
Shakspeare, Twelfth Night

Call her the metaphysicks of her sex,
And say she tortures wit as quartsens vex Physicians.
Cloveland.

If sight be caused by intromission, or receiving in the form of causes, it seems should be received consciously together, while how absurd it is, Aristotle shews in his metaphysics.

Prochan on Drawing.
See physics be the Sanguine's desire!
See metaphysick call for all on sense!

The topics of ontology or metaphysics, are cause, effect, action, passion, identity, opposition, subject, adjunct, and sign.
Watts, Logic.

METAPLASM, n. s. [μεταπλασμα, Gr.] A figure in rhetoric, wherein words or letters are transposed contrary to their natural order.
Dict.

METASTASIS, n. s. [μεταστασις, Gr.] Translation or removal.

His disease was a dangerous asthma; the cause a metastasis, or translation of tartarous humours from his joints to his lungs.
Harvey on Consumption.

METATARSAL, adj. [from metatarsus.] Belonging to the metatarsus.

The bones of the toes, and part as one of the metatarsal bones may be curious; in which case cut off only so much of the foot as is disordered.
Sharp, Surgery.

METATARSUS, n. s. [μετα ταρσος, Gr.] The middle of the foot, which is composed of five small bones connected to those of the first part of the foot.
Dict.

The conjunction is called synarthrosis, as in the joining the tarsus to the metatarsus.
Wiceman, Surgery.

METATHESIS, n. s. [μεταθεσις, Gr.] A transposition.

What a metathesis is this, that he who perhaps was born of royal blood, and kept company with kings and princes, shall now cry out with Job "to corruption, to rot, to dust my sister;" to the worm, thou art my mother and sister!"
Greenhill, Art of Embalming, p. 105.

TO METE, v. a. [metior, Latin.] To measure; to reduce to measure.

I will divide Shechem, and mete the valley of Succoth.
Proverbs.

To measure any distance by a line, apply some known measure wherewith to mete it. Holder.

Though you many ways pursue
To find their length, you'll never mete the true,
But thou; take all that space the sun
Meets out, when every daily round is run. Cowley.

METERY, adv. [probably from metre.] Moderately. Westmoreland Dialect. Tolerably well; within bounds. Craven Dialect, and Brockett. In the older northern glossaries, the word is defined indifferently.

METEWAND, n. s. [mete and yard, or METEHAND.] wand.] A staff of a certain length wherewith measures are taken.

A true touchstone, a sure metewand lieth before their eyes.
Acklam, Schoolmaster.
Ye shall do no unrighteousness in metery, weight, or measure. Lev. xxi. 35.

TO METEMPYCHOSE, v. a. [from metempsychosis.] To translate from body to body. A word not received.

The souls of men after their death, Lucian affirms to be metempsychosed, or translated into the bodies of asses, and there remain certain years, for poor men to take their pennyworth out of their bones.
Peasman on Blazing.

METEMPSYCHOSIS, n. s. [μετεμψυχοσις, Gr.] The transmigration of souls from body to body.

From the opinion of metempsychosis, or transmigration of the souls of men into the bodies of beasts, most suitable unto their human condition, after his death Orpheus the musician became a swan.
Brown, Vulg. Err.

Here, Philonius, at parting with the subject of the sacred animals, I may observe to you, that the doctrine of the metempsychosis, supposed by the Greek writers a native of Egypt, is by many people believed to owe its birth to this article of her theology.
Coveney, Phil. to Hyd. Con. 4.

METEOR, n. s. [meteore, Fr. μετεωρα.] Any bodies in the air or sky that are of a flux and transitory nature.

Look'd he or red, or pale, or sad, or merrily?
What observation mete's this in this fair,
Of his heart's meteors tilting in his face?
Shakspeare.

She began to cast with herself from what coast this blazing star must rise upon the horizon of Ireland; for there had the like meteor strong influence before.
Bacon, Hen. VII.

These burning fits but meteors be,
Whose matter in three soon is spent:

The beauty, and all parts which are in thee,
Are an undissoluble firmament. Shakspeare.
Then flaming meteors, hung in air, were seen,
And thunders rattled through a sky serene.
Dryden, Æn.

Why was I rais'd the meteor of the world,
Hung in the skies, and blazing as I travel'd?
Till all my fire were spent; and then cast downward.

To be trod out by Cæsar? Dryden, All for Love.
O poet, thou hadst been disreputer,
Hanging the monarch's hat so high.

If thou hadst dubb'd thy star a meteor,
Which did but blaze, and rattle, and die. Prior.

TO METEORIZE, v. n. [from meteor.] To ascend in evaporation.

To the end the dewy meteors, and emit their finer spirits.
 Evelyn, Pomona, ch. 1.

METEOROLOGICAL, adj. [from meteorology.] Relating to the doctrine of meteors.

Others are considerable in meteorological divinity.
Brown.

Make disquisition whether these unusual lights, be new-come guests, or old inhabitants in heavens or meteorological impressions not transcending the upper region, or whether to be ranked among celestial bodies.
Howell, Voc. Forest.

METEOROLOGIST, n. s. [from meteorology.] A man skilled in meteors, or studious of them.

The meteorologists observe, that amongst the four elements which are the ingredients of all sublimary creatures, there is a notable correspondence.
Howell, Voc. Forest.

METEOROLGY, n. s. [meteorologia and μετεωρολογια.] The doctrine of meteors.

In animals we deny not a natural meteorology, or innate presentation of wind and weather.
Brown, Vulg. Err.

METEOROUS, adj. [from meteor.] Having the nature of a meteor.

From the o'er hill
To their fix station, all in bright array,
The cherubim descended, on the ground
Gliding meteorous, at evening mist,
It's a war from a river. Milton, P. L.

METER, n. s. [from metre.] A measurer; as, a coal-meter, a land-meter.

METHEGGIN, n. s. [meddgygin, Welsh, from medd and gyn, to glue, Minshew, or meddy, a physician, and glyn, drink, because it is a medicinal drink. See MEAD, and MEATH.] Drink made of honey boiled with water and fermented.

White-banded mistress, one sweet wort with thee,
—Honey, and milk, and sugar, there is three,
—Nay then two treys; and if you grow so nice,
Methgyn, wort, and malmsey. Shakspeare.

To ally the strength and hardness of the wine,
And with old Bacchus new methgyn join.
Dryden.

Beneath its aspect warm
O'er well-rang'd hives the bees shall swarm,
From which, ere long, of golden gleam
Methgyn's luscious juice shall stream.

Warren, Progress of Discontent.

METHINKS, verb impersonal. [me and thinks.] This is imagined to be a Norman corruption, the French being apt to confound me and I. Dr. Johnson.—Here is no French corruption; it is the same as me seems, that is, it seems to me; so me is here the dative case, and the whole phrase means, it appears to me; as Lye repeatedly translates the Saxon me þync, miki videtur, whence, he says, our methinks, methinks. Our old language has also him thinketh, or thought; that is, he thinks or thought, it so appeared to him on consideration. I think; it seems to me; me seems. See MESEMS, which is more strictly grammatical, though less in use. Methinks was used even by those who used likewise me seems.

In all ages poets have been had in special reputation, and, methinks, not without great cause; for, besides their sweet inventions, and most witty lays, they have always used to set forth the praises of the good and virtuous. Spenser on Ireland.

If he choose out some expression which does not offend the sense, I suppose he may stretch his chain to such a latitude; but by innovation of thoughts, methinks, he breaks it. Dryden.

There is another circumstance, which, methinks, gives us a very high idea of the nature of the soul,

In regard to what passes in dreams, that innumerable multitudes and variety of which arise in her.

Methods already I your tears survey. Pope.

METHOD, n. s. [methode, French μῆθoδoς.] Method, taken in the largest sense, implies the placing of several things, or performing several operations in such an order as is most convenient to attain some end.

Watts.

To see wherein the larn which they feel consisteth, the seeds from which it sprang, and the method of curing it, belongeth to a skill the study whereof is full of toil, and the practice beset with difficulties. Hooker.

If you will just with me know my aspect, And fashion your demeanor to my looks, Or I will beat this method in your sense. Shaks.

It will be in vain to talk to you concerning the method I think best to be observed in schools.

Locke on Education.

Notwithstanding a faculty be born with us, there are several methods for cultivating and improving it, and without which it will be very uncertain. Addison, Spect.

METHODOICAL, adj. [methodeique, French from method.] Ranged or proceeding in due or just order.

The observations follow one another without that methodical regularity requisite in a prose author. Addison, Spect.

Let me appear, great sir, I pray, Methodical in what I say. Addison, Rosamond.

He can take a body to pieces, and dispose of them where he pleases; to us, perhaps, not without the appearance of irrefragable confusion; but, with respect to his own knowledge, into the most regular and methodical repositories. Bryce.

METHODOICALLY, adv. [from methodical.] According to method and order.

To begin methodically, I should enjoin you travel; for absence does remove the cause, removing the object. Buchting.

All the rules of painting are methodically, concisely, and clearly defined in this treatise. Dryden, Degeneration.

METHODICK,* adj. [methodeique, Fr.]

1. Ranged or proceeding in just and due order.

Some native and methodick powers, and springs of motion in things. Symonds on Poet. (1665), p. 137.

Aristotle strict, methodick, and orderly. Harris, Hermes, li. ch. 5.

2. Denoting those who follow the method of the ancient school of physicians, known by the name of methodists.

Thessalus, head of the methodist sect in the reign of Nero, [said to] brag, that he could make physicians without the help either astrology or music. Greece, Constant, Succ.

Every animal body, according to the methodist physicians, is, by the predominance of some exuberant quality, continually declining towards disease and death. Johnson, Hamlet, No. 156.

METHODISM,* n. s. The religious opinions of those who are called methodists. See the last sense of METHODIST.

Nor is this pedigree, which makes methodism of the younger house to independence, invented, like heraldic fictions, to ennoble my subject. Warburton, Dict. of Grace, ii. 186.

METHODIST, n. s. [from method.]

1. An observer of method, generally speaking, without reference either to physics or religion. Not noticed by Dr. Johnson.

He teacheth us how we should fear method; he teacheth us to be perfect methodists in fear, and that we misplace not our fear. Forindon's Sermon (1647), p. 191.

I dance little after method, because no methodist. Hermetical Banquet, &c. (1652).

2. A physician who practises by theory.

As many more.

As methodist Musas hiff'd with bellshores In autumn last. Marton, Scourge of Vill. (1599.)

[The old sect of methodists resolved, that the laxum and strictum, the immoderate dissolution or convection, were the principals and originals of all diseases in the world.

Hammond, Works, iv. 577.

Our warriest physicians, not only chemists, but methodists, give it inwardly in several constitutions and disorders. Blythe.

3. One of a new kind of puritans lately arisen, so called from their profession to live by rules and in constant method. Dr. Johnson. — Dr. Johnson's lately arisen must be referred to the year 1729, when the term was applied to certain young men at Oxford of very methodical conduct; of whom it was said, in allusion to the ancient school of physicians, "there is a new sect of methodists sprung up;" and of which appellation it has since been with an absurd air of consequence pretended, that the word "being new and quaint, it took immediately, and the methodists were known all over the university." But we see that the word is at least nearly a century and a half older in our language, in the medical sense; and nearly a century, in a general sense.

Mr. Wesley and Mr. Whitfield are those of this remarkable association, who are best known to fame; and who afterwards had their respective followers; those of Mr. Wesley being Arminians, those of Mr. Whitfield, Calvinists. The word is often vaguely and unjustly used of persons, who are no sectaries.

Mr. John Wesley, one among the present methodists, having already freed himself from the folly of Calvinism.

Whiston, Memoirs of himself, (1745), p. 138. They, who go under the name of methodists, were, in the days of our forefathers, called precisians. Warburton, Dict. of Grace, ii. 184.

When West's book was published, it was bought by some who did not know his change of opinion, in expectation of new objections against Christianity; and as infants do not want malignity, they revenged the disappointment by calling him a methodist. Johnson, Life of West.

METHODISTICAL,* adj. [from methodist.] Relating to the religious sect of methodists.

The precise number of methodistical marks you know best.

Dry. Traveller, Epith. of Meth. to Mr. Wesley, p. xii. To METHODIZE, v. a. [from method.] To regulate; to dispose in order.

Resolv'd his native vengeance to defer, The royal spy retir'd again unseen,

To brood in secret on his gather'd spleen, And audit his revenge. Trojan, Boccaccio.

The man who does not know how to methodize his thoughts, has always a barren superfluity of words; the fruit is lost amidst the exuberance of leaves. Spectator.

Who brings with him any observations which he has made in his reading of the poets, will find his own reflections methodized and explained, in the works of a good critic. Addison, Spect.

Those rules of old discover'd, not devis'd,

Are nature's gifts, but nature's gifts, Pope.

METHOUGHT,* n. the pretense of method. See METHINKS and MESKERS. I thought; it appeared to me. I know not that any author has methooped, though it is more grammatical, and deduced analogically from methinks. Dr. Johnson. — Dr. Johnson had forgotten methooped in an example from Spenser, which he himself has cited under methinks. Addison has once used, improperly, methoughts. "Methoughts I returned to the great hall." Spect. No. 3.

Methought, a serpent eat my heart away, And you sat smiling at his cruel prey. Shakespeare.

Since I sought

By prayer the offended Deity to appease; Kneel'd, and before him humbled all my heart, Methought, I saw him placable, and mild, Bending his ear: perdition in me grew That I was heard with favour; peace return'd Home to my breast; and to my memory His promise, 'That thy seed shall bruise our foe.' Milton, P. L.

Methought I stood on a wide river's bank, Which I must cross o'er camp, but knew not how. Dryden.

METICULOUS,* adj. [meticulous, Lat.] Fearful; timid. Not in use. Coler.

METICULOUSLY,* adv. [from meticulous.] Timidly.

More circumspectly, not meticulously. Brown, Chr. Mor. l. 53.

METONYMICAL,* adj. [from metonymy.] Put by metonymy for something else.

The verbal signification of these words being metonymical, it will be best to leave them to their own place.

DuRoi, Deaf and Dumb Men's Tutor, p. 61.

METONYMICALLY,* adv. [from metonymical.] By metonymy; not literally.

The disposition of the coloured body, as that modifies the light, may be called by the name of a colour metonymically, or efficiently; that is, in regard of its turning the light that rebounds from it, or passes through it, into this or that particular colour. Boyle on Colours.

METONYMY, n. s. [metonymie, French; μετωνυμία.] A rhetorical figure, by which one word is put for another, as the matter for the materiate; he died by steel, that is, by a sword.

They differ only as cause and effect, which by a metonymy usual in all sorts of authors, are frequently put for another. Tillotson.

METOPÆ,* n. s. [metopæ, French.] A square space between triglyphs in the frieze of the Doric order. Sherwood.

The entablature and all its parts and ornaments, architrave, frieze, cornice, triglyphs, metopæ, modillions, and the rest, have each an use, or appearance of use, in giving firmness and union to the building, in protecting it from the weather, in causing air to pass, in representing the order of the beams with their intervals, the production of the rafters, and so forth. Dr. Warton, Ess. on Pope.

METOPÆOSCOPY,* n. s. [metopæoscopy.] One versed in the study of physiognomy.

Among the whole tribe of metopæoscopy, there is not so much as one who goes about to prove his assertions.

Philosophy, Letters on Physiognomy, [1751], p. 306.

METOPÆOSCOPY,† n. s. [metopæoscopy, French; μετωνυμία and μετεωρα.] The study of physiognomy: the art of knowing the characters of men by the countenance.

Signs of melancholy from physiognomy, metaphysic, chronometry. Barrow, Disc. of Met. p. 66.
 Fac. Doctor, how canst thou know this so soon?
 I am anus'd at that!

Sub. By a rule, captain,
 In metaphysic, which I do work by;
 A certain star I like foretold, which you see not.

There was a seam in the middle of his [K. Ch. I.] forehead, downwards; which is a very ill sign in metaphysic.
Aubrey's Miscellaneous, p. 38.

METRE. n. s. [metrum, Latin; μέτρον, Greek.]
 Speech confined to a certain number and harmonic disposition of syllables; verse; measure; numbers.

For the metre sake, some words be driven away which require a straighter placing in plain prose.

Juchin, Schoolmaster.
 Above the city's best good men in metre,
 To laugh at lords.
METRICAL. † adj. [metricus, Latin; μετρικός, French.]

1. Pertaining to metre or numbers.
 Let any the best position of them all compose a hymn in metrical form, and sing it to a new tune with perfect and true music.

Bp. Taylor on Extemp. Prayer, § 29.
 2. Consisting of verses: as, metrical precepts.

A voluminous metrical translation of Guido de Colonna.
Barrow, Hist. Eccl. p. 119.

Most of the old metrical romances are, from their nature, supposed to be incoherent rhapsodies.
Ibid. p. 162.
METRICIAN. n. s. [from metric.] A METRICIST. n. s. [from metric.] A writer of verses. Two old and significant words.

Ye, that be metricians, be excuse.
Chaucer, Court of Love.
 Blind popish poets, and dirty metraters.
Bate on the Revels, p. ii. (1550), sign. c. ii.

METROPOLIS. † n. s. [metropolis, Latin; μετρόπολις, French; μέτρος and πόλις, Gr.]
 Very rarely found with a plural. Dr. Johnson has given no example. The learned Hammond affords one.]
 The mother city; the chief city of any country or district.

His eye discovers unaware
 The godly prospect of some foreign land,
 First seen; or some renew'd metropolis,
 With glittering spires and pinnacles adorn'd.

Milton, P. R.
 Reduc'd in careful watch
 Round their metropolis.
Milton, P. R.
 Many cities became metropoles, which formerly were not. Hammond on the Ep. to the Philips l. 1.
 We stopped at Pavia, that was once the metropolis of a kingdom, but at present a poor town.

Adrian on Italy.
METROPOLITAN. n. s. [metropolitānus, Latin.]
 A bishop of the mother church; an archbishop.

Gregory — admitted him for the first metropolitan of all the whole realm, appointing his seats from thence forth at Canterbury.

Bate, Acts of Exg. Vol. P. l. (1550), p. 31.
 He was promoted to Canterbury upon the death of Dr. Bancroft, that metropolitan, who understood the church excellently, and countenanced men of the greatest parts in learning. Clarendon.

METROPOLITAN. † adj. Belonging to a metropolis.
 Their patriarchs, of a covetous desire to enrich himself, had foreborn to institute metropolitan bishops.

Still to acknowledge God's ancient people their betters, and that language the metropolitan language. Milton, Tetrachordon.

METROPOLITE. n. s. [from metropolis.]
 A metropolitan; an archbishop; a bishop of the mother church.
 Other ancient troops style him metropolit; and to the *metropolit*s of the principal cities they gave the title of archbishop.

The patriarch of Constantinople is elected by the *metropolit*s, or bishops, according to the plurality of voices.

Borrow on the Pope's Supremacy.
 The patriarch of Constantinople is elected by the *metropolit*s, or bishops, according to the plurality of voices. Ibid., p. 250.

METROPOLITICAL. † adj. [from metropolis.]
 1. Chief or principal as applied to cities.

He fearing the power of the Christians was gone as far as Gratia, the metropolitan city of Stria. Annot.

2. Denoting archiepiscopal dignity or power.

Having at that time a lawful archbishop of honor, legally established in the metropolitan chair.
Bp. Hall, Hon. of the Morn. Cher. p. 91.

The erection of a power in the person of Titus, a metropolitan power over the whole island of Crete. Ahp. Bancroft, Serm. p. 4.

METROPOLITIC. † adj. Archiepiscopal.
 Not in use.

Kent — had the first English king; in it was the first Christianity among the English, and Canterbury then honoured with the metropolit
 see. Selden on Drayton's Polygl. S. 18.

METTLE. n. s. [Corrupted from metal, but commonly written so when the metaphorical sense is used.]

1. Spirit; spiritliness; courage.
 What a blunt fellow is this grove to be?
 He was quick mettle when he went to school.

Shakespeare.
 I had rather go with sir priest than sir knight:
 I care not who knows so much of my mettle.

Shakespeare, Tw. Night.
 Upon this heaviness of the king's forces, interpreted to be fear and want of mettle, divers resorted to the seditious. Hayward, Edw. VI.

He had given so frequent testimony of signal courage in several actions, that his mettle was ever suspected. Clarendon.

His more to guide than spur the steed's steel,
 Restrain his fury, than provoke his speed;
 The wriggl'd courier, like a gent'le horse,
 Shows more true mettle when you check his course.

Pope.
 2. Substance: this at least should be metal.

Oh thou! whose self-same mettle,
 Whereof thy proud child, arrogant man, is puffed,
 Engenders the black toad, and adder blue. Shaks.

METTL'D. † adj. [from mettle.] Spiritly; courageous; full of ardour; full of fire.

Such a light and mettled dance
 Saw you never. B. Jonson.

An ineffectual laziness is the seminary both of vice and idleness: it clouds the mettled mind, it mists the wit, and chokes up all the sciences.

Fletcher, Rev. ii. 49.
 Nor would you find it easy to compose
 The mettled steeds, when from their nostrils flows
 The scorching fire that in their entrails glows.

Addison.
METTESOME. adj. [from mettle.] Spiritly; lively; gay; brisk; airy; fiery; courageous.

Their force differs from true spirit, as much as a victor from a mettlesome horse. Taylor, No. 61.
METTESOMELY. adv. [From mettlesome.]
 With spiritliness.

METWAND. n. s. See METWEAND.
 The golden metwand of the law.

Darby, Speech on the Middlesex Elect.
MEW. † n. s. [mue, French. Dr. Johnson.
 — The word mue denotes a change;
 "hence any casting of the coat or skin,
 as the muing of a hawk." Cotgrave.
 Then it came to denote a cage, in which the hawk was kept till he had moulted;
 and lastly a cage in general.]

1. A cage for hawks. The king's mens at Charing Cross is the place where formerly the king's hawks were kept.
 By far too soon had she made a mew: —
 Thus late I Canace her hawk kept.

Chaucer, Syn. Tale.
 2. A cage; an inclosure; a place where any thing is confined.

Forth-coming from her darksome mew,
 Where she all day did hide her hated hue.

Spenser, F. Q.
 There then she does transform to monstrous
 hues,
 And horribly mis-shapes with ugly sights,
 Captiv'd eternally in iron mesh.

And darksome dens, where Tifan his face never shows.
 Her lofty hand would of itself refuse
 To touch the dainty needle or sinew thread;
 She had chambers, closets, secret mews,
 And in broad fields preser'd her maidenhead.

Spenser, F. Q.
 3. [Meep, Saxon.] A sea-fowl.

Among the first sort we reckon coots, sande-lings, and mewes. Carew.

The vessel sticks, and shows her open'd side,
 And on her shatter'd mast the mew in triumph rides. Dryden.

TO MEW. † v. a. [from the noun.]
 1. To shut up; to confine; to imprison; to inclose.

He in dark corners mew'd,
 Mutter'd of matters as their books then shew'd.

Spenser, Habb. Tale.
 Why should your fears, which, as they say, attend
 The steps of wrong, then move you to mew up Your tender kinsman? Shakespeare, A. John.

Fair Hemia, question your desires;
 Know of your youth, examine well your blood,
 Whether if you yield not to your father's choice,
 You can endure the liver of a suitor;
 For eye to be in shady cloister mew'd,
 To live a barren sister all your life,
 Chanting faint hymns to the cold fruitless moon.

Shakespeare.
 More pity that the eagle should be mew'd,
 While kites and buzzards prey at liberty.

Shakespeare.
 Feign them sick,
 Close mew'd in their sedans for fear of air.

Dryden, Jur.
 It is not possible to keep a young gentleman from vice by a total ignorance of it, unless you will all his life mew him up in a closet, and never let him go into company. Locke.

2. To shed the feathers. It is, I believe, used in this sense, because birds are,
 by close confinement, brought to shed their feathers. Dr. Johnson. — It is rather,
 I should suppose, from the original meaning of muer, to change, from the Latin mutare; thence to change or cast
 the skin or feathers.

Stand forth, transform'd Antonio, fully new'd
From brown nor fardlers of dull yeamour,
To the glorious bound of gentry.

Albansar, (1614.)

The sun hath new'd his beams from off his lamps,
And majesty defac'd the royal stamp.

Cleveland.

Nine times the moon had new'd her horns, at length
With travel weary, unsuppl'd with strength,
And with the burden of her womb oppress'd,
Soliman fields afford her needful rest.

Dryden.

3. [Miauler, French; miaua, Icel.] To cry
as a cat.

Let Hercules himself do what he may,
The cat will mew, the dog will have his day.

Shakespeare.

They are not imposable beyond their own genius; a dog will never learn to mew, nor a cat to bark.

Greco.

To MEW. v. n. [muer, Fr.] To change;
to put on a new appearance.

The fowles about the held do syng; now every thing dith newe,
And shifts his rustic winter robe.

Turberville, Ecl.

ME'WING. n. s. [from mew.] The act of moulting.

Cotgrave.

I should discourse of hawks, then treat of their syrres, merrings, casing and renovation of their feathers.

Walton.

To MEWL v. n. [mianler, French.] To squall
as a child.

The infant

Mewing and piking in the nurse's arms.

Shakespeare.

ME'WLER. n. s. [from mew; Fr. miauleur.]

One who squalls or mewls.

Cotgrave.

MEZERON. n. s. A species of spurge laurel.

Mezeron is common in our gardens, and on the Alps and Pyrenean mountains: every part of this shrub is acrid and pungent, and inflames the mouth and throat.

Hill.

MEZZO-RELIEVO. n. s. [Italian.]
Projection of figures between the proportion of those in alto and basso-relievo;
called also demi-relievo.

We saw antique figures of men, carved in the natural rock, in mezzo-relievo, and in highness equal to the life.

Muondrelli, Trav. p. 37.

MEZZOTINTO. n. s. [Italian.] A kind of graving so named as nearly resembling paint, the word importing half-painted:
It is done by beating the whole into asperity with a hammer, and then rubbing it down with a stone to the resemblance intended.

MEYNT. adj. Mingled. See To MEINE.
Obsolete.

MI'ASM. n. s. [from μῆλα, inquis, to infect.] Such particles or atoms as are supposed to arise from distempers, putrefying, or poisonous bodies, and to affect people at a distance.

The plague is a malignant fever, caused through pestilential miasms insinuating into the humoral and consistent parts of the body.

Harvey on Consumptions.

MICA. n. s. [Latin.] A mineral substance capable of being divided into thin, flexible, and elastic leaves.

Coloured mica generally contains some metallic matters, chiefly iron; and are much more fusible than those which are pure and colourless.

Chemists.

MICA'EROUS. adj. [from mica.] Of the nature of mica; easily separable.

A reddish earth filled with friable micaceous nodules.

Pennant.

MICE, the plural of mouse.

Mice that mar the land. 1 Sam. vi. 5.

MICHAELMAS. [Michael and mass.] The feast of the archangel Michael, celebrated on the twenty-ninth of September.

They compounded to furnish ten oxen after Michaelmas for thirty pounds price.

Gower.

To MICHE.† v. n. [a word of great age in our language; perhaps from the old French mucier, mucier, to conceal, to lurk, Cotgrave; mucha, concealed, Kel- ham.]

1. To piffer; to commit secret theft.
"Mychyn or pryvely steyln smale things." Prompt. Parv.

What he may get of his mychynge.
Gower, Conf. Am. B. 5.

Miching or mightie thieves.

Lambard, Etenarch, (1616); p. 186.

2. To be secret or covered; to lie hid;
to lurk out of sight; to play truant.
See MICHER.

Less any of them should straggle up and down the country, or mich in corners amongst their friends idly.

Spenser on Ireland.

Wherefore thus vainly in land Lybte witche
you?

Shamshat, Verg. (1582.)

Marry, this is miching mallecho; it means mischief.

Shakespeare, Hamlet.

MICHER.† n. s. [from miche.]

1. A thief; a pilferer. So used in Norfolk. See also MICHERY.

A wanton wench, and also michers.

With many other of the devil's officers.

Old Morality of Hycko-Scorner.

2. A lazy loiterer, who skulks about in corners and by-places, and keeps out of sight; a hedge-creeper.

Mich or mick is still retained in the cant language for an indolent, lazy fellow. It is used in the western counties for a truant boy.

How tenderly her tender hand between

In ivory case she hid the mickler kind.

Sidney.

How like a mickler he stands, as though he had trusted from honesty.

Lily, Moth. Bombe, (1594.)

Shall the blessed sun of heaven prove a mickler,
Which eat blackberries? a question not to be asked.
Shall the son of England prove a thief, and take purse? a question to be asked.

Shakespeare, Hen. IV.

MICHERY. n. s. [from miche.] Theft;
cheating.

With covetise yet I finde

A servant of the same kinde,

Which eateth his host; and mickerie

With him is ever in companie.

Gower, Conf. Am. B. 5.

MICKLE.† adj. [michel, Saxon; mikil, old Teut. mikel, Icel. mykall, Greek.
"Vox antiquissima," Serenius observes.]

Much; great. Still used in our northern counties.

This rede is rife, that oftentimes Great chymbers fall unsoft:

In humble dales is footing fast,

The trode is not so tickle.

And though one fall through heedless haste,

Yet is his misse not tickle.

Spenser, Shep. Cal. July.

Many a little makes a mickle. Commen, Hen.

If I to-day die don't with Frenchmen's rage,

To-morrow I shall die with mickle age.

Shakespeare, Henry V.

O, mickle is the pow'ful grace, that lies

In plants, herbs, stones, and their true qualities.

Shakespeare.

All this tract that fronts the falling sun,

A noble peer, of mickle trust and power,

Has in his charge.

Milton, Comus.

MICROCOSM. n. s. [μικρος and κόσμος.]

The little world. Man is so called as being imagined, by some fanciful philosophers, to have in him something analogous to the four elements.

You see this in the map of my microcosm.

Shakespeare, Coriol.

She to whom this world must itself refer,

As suburbs, or the microcosm of her;

She, she is dead; she's dead, when thou know'st
this.

Donne.

Thou know'st it how lame a creature this world is.

Donne.

As in this our microcosm, the heart

Hear, spirit, motions gives to every part:

So Rome's a microcosm, in discourse did discourse

All her own virtues through the universe.

Druidian.

Philosophers say, that man is a microcosm, or little world, recombining in miniature every part of the great; and the body natural may be compared to the body politic.

Saunders.

MICROCOSMICAL. adj. [from microcosm.]

Pertaining to the microcosm.

Calculate thyself within; seek not thyself in the moon, but in thine own orb or microcosmical circumference.

Brown, Chr. Mor.

MICROGRAPHY. n. s. [μικρος and γραφω.]

The description of the parts of such very small objects as are discernible only with a microscope.

The honey-bag is the stomach, which they always fill to satisfy and to spare, vomiting up the greater part of the honey to be kept against winter: a curious description and figure of the sting see in Mr. Hook's micrography.

Greco, Mus.

MICROSCOPE. n. s. [μικρος and σκοπος.]

microscope, French.] An optick instrument, contrived various ways to give to the eye a large appearance of many objects which could not otherwise be seen.

If the eye were so acute as to rival the finest microscope, and to discern the smallest hair upon the leg of a gnat, it would be a curse, and not a blessing, to us; it would make all things appear rugged and deformed; the most finely polished crystal would be uneven and rough; the sight of our own selves would affront us; the smoothest skin would be beset all over with ragged scales and livid hairs.

Bruce.

The critical eye, that microscope of wit,

Sees hairs and pores, examines bit by bit.

Pope, Dunciad.

MICROMETER. n. s. [μικρος and μετρος.]

micrometer, French.] An instrument contrived to measure small spaces.

Microscopical. adj. [from microscope.]

MICROSCOPICK. adj. [from microscope.]

1. Made by a microscope.

Make microscopical observations of the figure and bulk of the constituent parts of all fluids.

Arbutnot and Pope.

2. Assisted by a microscope.

Erading even the microscopic eye!
Full nature swarms with life. Thomson, Summer.
3. Resembling a microscope.
Why has not man a microscopic eye?
For this plain reason, Man is not a fly.
Say what the use, were finer optics given,
To inspect a mite, not comprehend the heaven?

MID-† adj. [contracted from middle, or derived from mid, Dutch. Dr. Johnson.—It is the Saxon mitb.]

1. Middle; equally between two extremes.
No more the mountain larks, while Daphne sings,
Shall, lifting in mid air, suspend their wings.

Ere the mid hour of night, from tent to tent,
Uowery'd, through th' outh' rous host he part.
Rowe.

2. It is much used in composition.

MID-AGE.* n. s. [mid and age.]

1. The middle age of life.

2. Persons in that state.

Virgins and boys, mid-age, and wrinkled old.

MID-COURSE. n. s. [mid and course.] Middle of the way.

Why in the east
Darkness ere day's mid-course? And moroling lights,
More orient in you western cloud, that draws O'er the blue firmament a radiant white?

MID-DAY. adj. [mid and day.] Meridional, being at noon.

Who shoots at the mid-day sun, though he be sure he shall never hit the mark, yet as mid-day he shall shoot higher than he who aims at a bush.

His sparkling eyes, replete with awful fire,
More dazzled and drove back his enemies,
Than mid-day sun force bent against their faces.

Did he not lead you through the mid-day sun,
And clouds of dust? Did not his temples glow
In the same sultry winds and scorching heats?

MID-DAY. n. s. Noon; meridian.
Who have before, or shall write after thee,
Their works, though toughly labour'd, will be Like infancy or age to man's firm way,
Or early or late twilights to mid-day.

MID-HEAVEN. n. s. [mid and heaven.] The middle of the sky.

But she bot held that always in him burns,
Though in mid-heaven, soon ended his delight.

MID-SEA. n. s. [mid and sea.] The Mediterranean sea.

Our Tyrrhene Pharoas, that the mid-sea meets
With its embrace, and leaves the land bebled.

MID-WOOD.* adj. [mid and wood.] In the middle of the wood.

Hence let me haste into the mid-wood shade.

MID-DA.* n. s. [midas, Fr. midas, Greek.] A worm, or maggot, of which is produced the purple fly, found on bean-flowers, and thence called the bean-fly.

MID-DEN.* n. s. [mid and den.] A dunghill. Used in the north of England.

A very midden or muchheap of all the grossest errors and heresies of the Romish church.

MID-DEST. superl. of mid, middle, midst.
Yet the stout fairy 'mongst the midden crowd,
Thought all their glory vain in knightly view.

MIDDLE. adj. [mibbel, Saxon.]

1. Equally distant from the two extremes.

The lowest virtues draw praise from the common people; the middle virtues work in them asceticism; but of the highest virtues they have no sense.

A middle station of life, within reach of those conveniences which the lower orders of mankind most necessarily want, and yet without embarrassment of greatness.

To deliver all his fleet to the Romans, except ten middle-sized brigantines. Arbutnot on Cato.
I like people of middle understanding and middle rank.

2. Intermediate; intervening.
Will, seeking good, finds many middle ends.

3. Middle finger; the long finger.
You first introduce the middle finger of the left-hand.

1. Part equally distant from two extremes; the part remote from the two.

There come people down by the middle of the land.

With roof so low that under it
They never stand, but lie or sit;
And yet so foul, that who is in,
Is to the middle leg in prison.

2. The time that passes, or events that happen, between the beginning and end.

The causes and designs of an action are the beginning; the effects of these causes, and the difficulties met with in the execution of these designs, are the middle; and the unavailing and resolution of these difficulties are the end.

MIDDLE-AGED. adj. [middle and age.] Placed about the middle of life.

A middle-aged man, that was half grey, half brown, took a fancy to marry two wives.

The middle-aged support fasting the best, because of the oily parts abouting in the blood.

I found you a very young man, and left you a middle-aged one: you knew me a middle-aged man, and now I am so old one.

MIDDLE-EARTH.* n. s. [Sax. mibbal-earþ.] The world; the place between the ethereal and lower regions.

[Fairies.]—I smelt a man of middle-earth.

MIDDLE-WITTED.* adj. [middle and wit.] Of moderate abilities.

The women, the shopkeepers, and the middle-witted people. Is. Walton, Love and Truth, Lett. 2.

MIDDLEMOST. adj. [from middle.] Being in the middle.

Why have not some beasts more than four feet, suppose six, and the middlemost shorter than the rest.

The outmost fringe vanished first, and the middlemost next, and the innermost last.

The outward stars, with their systems of planets, must necessarily have descended toward the middlemost system of the universe, whither all would be most strongly attracted from all parts of a finite space.

MIDDLING. adj. [from middle.]

1. Of middle rank; of condition equally remote from high and low.

A middling sort of a man, left well enough to pun by his father, could never think he had more so long as any man had more.

2. Of moderate size; having moderate qualities of mind.

The bigness of a church ought to be no greater than that unto which the voice of a preacher of middling lungs will easily extend.

MIDDLINGLY.* adv. [from middling.] Passably; indifferently.

MIDGE.† n. s. [mietze, Saxon.] A gnat.

Where there is no place
For the glow-worm to lye,
Where there is no space
For receipt of a fly,
Where the midger dares not venture.

1. Remote from the coast.

The same name is given to the islanders or midland inhabitants of this island, by Cmsar.

The midland towns abounding in wealth, shews that her riches are intern and domestic.

The various dialects of the English in the North and West, render their expressions many times unintelligible to the other, and both scarce intelligible to the midland.

2. Surrounded by land; mediterranean.

There was the Plymouth squadron o'er come io,
Which twice o'er Biscay's working bay had been,
And on the midland sea the French had aw'd.

MIDLEN. n. s. [mid and leg.] Middle of the leg.

He had fifty attendants, young men all, in white satin, loose coats to the middle, and stockings of white silk.

MIDLENT.* n. s. [mib-lentcen, Sax.] The middle of the lent.

The fourth [Sunday in Lent] is with us generally called midlent Sunday.

MIDLENTING.* adj. Going about to visit parents at midlent. See MOTHERING.

A custom still retained in many parts of England, and well known by the name of midlencing or mothering.

MIDMOST-† adj. [from mid, or contracted from middlemost: this is one of the words which have not a comparative, though they seem to have a superlative degree. Dr. Johnson.—It is the Saxon miomeica.] The middle.

Now van to save the foremost squadrons meet,
The mid-mo'nt battles heaving up behind.

Hear himself rejoice
At fate's unequal laws, and at the clue,
Which, merciless in length, the midmost sister drew.

What dulness dropt among her sons impress,
Like motion, from one circle to the rest.
So from the midmost the notation spreads
Round some more round o'er all the sea of heads.

MIDNIGHT.† n. s. [mid and night; mibniet, Sax.] Milton seems to have accented the last syllable, Dr. Johnson observes; which indeed was not peculiar to him.

Shakespeare more than once has so accented it; and Malhet, in the first edition of his William and Margaret, thus gives it:

"When all was wrapt in dark midnight,
"And all were fast asleep:"

Which however he borrowed from elder poetry; and in a subsequent edition changed midnight and the two lines into the cold and quaint periphrasis of "the silent solemn hour, when night and morning meet." The noon of night; the depth of night; twelve at night. To be up after midnight, and to go to bed then, is early; so that to go to bed after midnight, is to go betimes. Suckwre.

By night he fled, and at midnight return'd.
From compassing the earth; cautious of day.

After this time came on the midnight of the church, wherein the very names of the councils were forgotten, and men did only dream of what had past.

In all that dark midnight of popery there were still some gleams of light, some witnesses that arose to give testimony to the truth, Atterbury.

They can tell what altitude the dog-star had at midnight or midnoon in Rome when Julius Cæsar was slain. Watts.

MIDNIGHT. adj. Being in the middle of the night.
How now, you secret, black, and midnight hags? What 'tis you do? Shakespeare, Macbeth.

I hope my midnight studies, to make our countries flourish in mysterious and beneficent arts, have not ungratefully affected your intellects. Bacon.

Some solitary cloister will I choose,
Corse my attire, and short shall be my sleep,
Brooks by the melancholy midnight bell. Dryden, Sen. Furi.

MIDRIFF. n. s. [mishpaze, Saxon.] The diaphragm.

The midriff divides the trunk of the body into two cavities; the thorax and abdomen; it is composed of two muscles; the first and superior of these arises from the sternum, and the ends of the last ribs on each side. The second and inferior muscle comes from the vertebrae of the loins by two productions, of which that on the right side comes from the first, second, and third vertebrae of the loins; that on the left side is somewhat shorter, and both these productions join and make the lower part of the midriff. Quincy.

Whereat he only rag'd, and as they talk'd
Smote him into the midriff with a stone, and so That best out life. Milton, P. L.

In the gullet, where it perforated the midriff, the carnosus fibres of that muscular part are inserted. Ray.

MIDSHIP. n. s. [mid and ship.] A term of distinction, applied by shipwrights to several pieces of timber which lie in the broadest part of the vessel. Chambers.

MIDSHIPMAN. n. s. [from mid, ship, and man.]

Midshipmen are officers aboard a ship, whose station is some on the quarter-deck, others on the poop. Their business is to mind the braces, to look out, and to give about the word of command from the captain, and other superior officers; they also assist, on all occasions, both in sailing the ship, and in storing and rummaging the hold. Harris.

MIDST. n. s. Middle.
All is well when nothing pleases but God, being thankful in the midst of his afflictions.

Bp. Taylor, Guide to Devotion.

Arise, ye subtle spirits that can spy
When love is enter'd in a female's eye;
You that can read it in the midst of doubt,
And in the midst of frowns can find it out. Dryden.

MIDST. adj. [contracted from middest, the superlative of mid.] Midmost; being in the middle.

On earth join all ye creatures to extol
Him first, Him last, Him midst, and without end.

In the Slighted Maid, there is nothing in the first set but what might have been said or done in the fifth; nor any thing in the midst which might not have been placed in the beginning. Dryden, DuFrenoy.

MIDST. prep. Sometimes poetically used for amidst, in all its senses.

MIDSTRE. AM. n. s. [mid and stream.] Middle of the stream.

The midstream's lins, I creeping by the side,
And shoulder'd off by his impetuous tide. Dryden.

MIDSUMMER. n. s. [mid and summer; Sax. mysumum.] The summer solstice, reckoned to fall on June the twenty-first.

However orthodox my sentiments relating to public affairs may be while I am now writing, they may become criminal enough to bring me into trouble before Midsommer. Gay, Post.

At eve last Midsommer no sleep I sought.

MIDWARD. adj. [mishpaze, Saxon.] Midst; being in the middle.

Prompt.

MIDWAY. n. s. [mid and way.] The part of the way equally distant from the beginning and end.

No midway 'twixt these extremes at all. Shakespeare.

He were an excellent man that were made in the midway between him and Benedick; the one is too like an image, and says nothing; and the other too like my lady's eldest son, evermore tattling. Shakespeare, Much Ado.

Pity and shame! that they, who to live well
Stand so fair, should turn aside to tread Paths indirect, or in the midway faint! Milton, P. L.

The hare laid himself down about midway, and took a nap; for I can fetch up the tortoise when I please. L'Estrange.

How didst thou arrive at this place of darkness, when so many rivers of the ocean lie in the midway. Broom.

MIDWAY. adj. Being in the middle between two places.

How fearful
And dizzy 'tis, to cast one's eyes so low!
The crows and choughs that wing the midway air,
Shew scarce so gross as beetles. Shakespeare.

MIDWAY. adv. In the middle of the passage.

With dry eyes, and with an open look,
She met his glance midway. Dryden, Boccaccio.

MIDWIFE. f. n. s. [This is derived, both by Skinner and Junius, from mub or meed, a reward, and pis, Saxon. Dr. Johnson. — The interpretation of this etymology, which Versteegan also gives, is, "a woman of meed, deserving recompence." But this seems a forced meaning. May not the word be more naturally derived from the Saxon proposition mub, with, and pis, wife; implying the wife or woman who is attendant upon, that is, with the woman in childbirth?] A woman who assists women in childbirth.

When man doth die, our body, as the womb,
And as a midwife, death directs it home. DeWitt.
Without a midwife these their throes sustain,
And, bowing, bring their issue forth with pain. Jonson.

There saw I how the secret felon wrought,
And treason lab'ring in the traitor's thought,
And midwife time the ripest plot to murder brought. Dryden, Kn. Tole.

I had as clear a notion of the relation of brothers between them, as if I had all the skill of a midwife. Locke.

But not man, were I'er left his house
And addled lab' with thoughts so wild,
To bring a midwife to his spouse,
Before he knew she was with child. Prior.

To MIDWIFE. v. a. [from the noun.]

1. To assist in childbirth.

Without this ubiquity, how could she be seen at harvest, visiting the faces of rapping monks, whilst she is elsewhere burning villages, or in a rich ably midwifery an abbess, whom her steward had unfortunately gotten with child? Brevint, Soul and Sin, at Ender, (1674), p. 66.

2. To produce.

This child of yours, born without spurious blot,
And fairly midwife'd, as it was begot,
Doth so much of the parents' goodness bear,
You may be proud to own it for your heir. Sp. It. May France refer, to Sonday's Pr. (1648).

The soul, by the same strength, so opportunities do midwife them out, brings forth christian spiritual actions. Hammond, Works, iv. 672.

Two severe fits of sickness did midwife them [two occurrences] into the world.

Dunbar, David's Dumb Man's Tutor, (1680), Intr.

Having been before only as an embryo, ready to be midwife'd into the world.

Chancellor Goddes, Tracts, iv. 180.

To MIDWIFE. v. n. To perform the office of a midwife.

Where was the "genius loci" when this disaster happened? Perhaps in the office of Diana, when her temple was burning, gave a midwifery. Warburton to Harw, Let. 21.

MIDWIFERY. f. n. s. [from midwife.]

1. Assistance given at childbirth.

2. Trade of a midwife.

3. Act of production; help to production; co-operation in production.

Sharp inventions — begotten, or at least brought forth, by the midwifery of a pipe of good tobacco? Sp. Taylor, Art of Handson, p. 119.

As to mental midwifery, and communication of our notions. Whitlock, Memoirs of the Eng. p. 478.

So hasty fruits, and too ambitious flowers,
Scorning the midwifery of ripening showers,
In sight of frosts spring from the unwilling earth. Shakespeare.

There was never any thing propounded for public good, that did not meet with opposition; arising from the humour of such as would have nothing brought into the world but by their own midwifery. Child, Disc. on Trade.

MIDWINTER. f. n. s. [mid and winter; Saxon, myntum.] "Christmas-day is frequently called, in our old monuments, myntum-pæres, midwinter-day, and myntum-pæres, myntum-pæres — from whence, I suppose, it may reasonably be concluded, that, when that name was first applied to that day, the day whereon Christmas fell was in the calendar either coincident with, or not far removed from, the winter solstice." Hammond,

Works, i. 651.] The winter solstice; December the twenty-first.

Begin when the slow waggone descends,
Nor cease your sowing till midwinter ceases.

MIEN.† n. s. [mine, French. Dr. Johnson. — Mynd, Goth. the countenance. Serenius.] air; look; manner.
[He] mark'd her rare demeanour, which him seemed
So farre the meane of shepherds to excell.

In her alone that owns this look is seen Clorinda's spirit, and her lofty mien.

What can have more the figure and mien of a rain, then craggs, rocks, and cliffs.

One, in whom an outward mien appear'd,
And turo superior to the vulgar herd.

What winning graces, what majestic mien,
She moves a goddess, and she looks a queen.

MIFF.† n. s. Displeasure; ill-humour: "He left me in a miff;" a colloquial expression in many places; and a word well authorized.

They take a miff at him, they pique up themselves, and come boldly and melodiously to him.

MIGHT.† the preterite of may. [what the A. Saxons wrote mægeð or mæge, i. e. what one mayeth; the third person singular of the indicative of magan, valere, posse. Mr. H. Tooke, Div. of Purl. ii. 421.]

1. To have had power to; to have been possible.

Matters of such consequence should be in plain words, as little liable as might to doubt.

2. Used by Spencer for should.
The thing that might not be, and yet was done.

MIGHT.† n. s. [might, Saxon.] Power; strength; force.

But wanting rest, will also want of might? Spencer.
Quoth she, great grief will not be sold;
And can more easily be thought then said;
Right so, quoth he, but he that never would,
Could never; will to might gives greatest aid.

An oath of mickle might. Skakpeare, Hen. F.
Wherefore should not strength and might
There fall, where virtue fails.

MIGHT and main. Utmost force; highest degree of strength.

With might and main they chae'd the murderous fox,
With brazen trumpets and inflated horn.

This privilege the clergy in England formerly contended for with all might and main.

MIGHTILY.† adv. [mightliche, Saxon.] 1. With great power; powerfully; efficaciously; forcibly.

With whom ordinary means will prevail, surely the power of the word of God, even without the help of interpreters, in God's church worketh mightily, not unto their confirmation alone which are converted, but also to their conversion which are not.

So mightily grew the word of God, and prevailed.
Acts, iii. 50.

2. Vehemently; vigorously; violently.
Do as adversaries do in law,
Strive mightily, but eat and drink as friends.

Let man and beast be covered with sackcloth,
and cry mightily unto God.

3. In a great degree; very much. This is a sense scarcely to be admitted but in low language.

Therein thou wrong'st thy children mightily.

There's ne'er a one of you but trusts a knave.
That mightily deceives you.

An ass and an ape conferring grievances: the ass complained mightily for want of horns, and the ape for want of a tail.

These happenings nearer home made so lasting impressions upon their minds, that the tradition of the old deluge was mightily obscured, and the circumstances of it interwoven and confounded with those of these later deluges.

I was mightily pleased with a story applicable to this piece of philosophy.

MIGHTINESS.† n. s. [michteighe, Saxon.] Power; greatness; height of dignity.

Think you see them great,
And followed with general throng and sweat
Of thousand friends; then in a moment see,
How soon this mightiness meets misery.

Will I please your mightiness to wash your hands?

MIGHTY.† adj. [michteig, Saxon.] 1. Strong; valiant.

The shield of the mighty is vilely cast away.
He is wise in heart, and mighty in strength.

The rebel thrones, but greater rage to see
Thus foil'd their mightiest.

2. Powerful; having great command.
Nimrod began to be a mighty one in the earth.

The Creator, calling forth by name
His mighty angels, gave them several charge.

3. Powerful by influence.
Jove left the blissful realms above,
Scarcely the power of mighty love.

4. Great in number.
He from him will raise
A mighty nation.

Hath lost us heaven, and all this mighty host
In horrible destruction laid thus low.

5. Strong in corporeal or intellectual power.
We to them that are mighty to drink wine.

6. Impetuous; violent.
A rushing like the rushing of mighty waters.

7. Vast; enormous; bulky.
They sunk as lead in the mighty waters.

8. Excellent; of superior eminence.
Lydiate excell'd the mighty Scalliger and Selden.

9. Forcible; efficacious.
Great is truth, and mighty above all things.

10. Expressing or implying power.
If the mighty works which have been done in thee had been done in Sodom, it would have remained.

11. Important; momentous.
I'll sing of heroes and of kings,
In mighty numbers mighty things.

12. It is often used to express power, bulk, or extent, in a sense of terror or censure.

There arose a mighty famine in the land.

The enemies of religion are but brass and iron,
their mischiefs mighty, but their materials mean.

MIGHTY.† adv. In a great degree. Not to be used but in very low language.

Lord of his new hypothesis he reigns:
He reigns; How long? Till some usurper rise,
And be thou mightily thoughtful, mighty wise:

MIGNARD.† adj. [mignard, Fr.] Soft;
dainty; pretty. See TO MINIARDIZE.

Those soft mignard handlings.
B. Jonson, Dr. an. Aus.

MIGNONETTE.† n. s. [French; a species of reseda.] An annual flower, with a strong sweet scent like that of raspberries.

To M'GRATE.* v. n. [m'gro, Lat.] To remove from one place to another; to change residence.

M. de Buffon says, that the swallow is not torpid in winter, and must therefore migrate to the coast of Scogelo.

This territory was — newly peopled in the fourth century by a colony or army of the Welsh, who migrated thither.

If I grew better, I should not be willing, if much worse, not able to migrate.

J. Johnson, Lett. to Ed. Thorow, Bunce's Life of J.

MIGRATION.* n. s. [migratio, m'gro, Lat.]

1. Act of changing residence; removal from one habitation to another.

Aristotle distinguisheth their times of generation,
latency, and migration, manly, and venation.

2. Change of place; removal.

Although such alterations, transitions, migrations of the centre of gravity, and elevations of new islands, had actually happened, yet these shells could never have been reposed thereby in the manner we find them.

MIGRATORY.* adj. [from migrate.] Disposed to remove from one place to another; changing residence.

This purpose is sometimes carried on by a sort of migratory instinct; sometimes by the spirit of conquest; at one time warlike drives men from their homes, at another they are actuated by a thirst of knowledge.

MILCH.† adj. [melce, Saxon; milky.]

1. Giving milk.

Herne doth, at still of midnight,
Walk round about an oak, with ragged horns;
And then he blows the tree, and takes the cattle,
And makes milk kine yield blood.

The best mixtures of water in ponds for cattle, to make them more milk, fatten, or keep them from murrain, may be chalk and nitre.

Not above fifty-one have been starved, excepting infants at nurse, caused rather by carelessness and infirmity of the milk.

With the turneps they feed cows, milk cows,
or fatten cattle.

2. Soft; tender; merciful: ["milk-hearted," Huloet. Obsolete.

The instant burst of clamour that she made, —
Would have made such the burning eye of heaven,
And passion in the gods.

MILD. adj. [mild, Saxon.]

- Kind; tender; good; indulgent; merciful; compassionate; clement; soft; not severe; not cruel.

The execution of justice is committed to his judges, which is the severer part; but the milder part, which is mercy, is wisely left in the king.

If that mild and gentle god thou be,
Who dost mankind below with pity we.
It teaches us to adore him as a mild and merciful being, of infinite love to his creatures.

Rogers, Serv.

- Soft; gentle; not violent.

The rosy morn renews her light,
And milder glory to the noon was we,
Nothing reserv'd or sullen was to we,
But sweet regards, and pleasing sanctity;
Mild was his accent, and his action free.
Sylvia's like autumn ripe, yet mild as May,
More bright than noon, yet fresh as early day.

Pope.

The folding goss diffus'd a silver light,
And with a milder gleam refresh'd the night.

Addison.

- Not acrid; not corrosive; not acrimonious; demulcent; assuasive; mollifying; lenitive.

Their qualities are changed by rendering them acrimonious or mild. Arbutus on Almonds.

- Not sharp; mellow; sweet; having no mixture of acidity.

The Irish were transplanted from the woods and mountains into the plains, that, like fruit trees, they might grow the milder, and bear the better and sweeter fruit.

Lucas.

Suppose your eyes sent equal rays
Upon two distant spots of air,
Not knowing which was mild or stone.

Prior.

MILD'EW. n. s. [mulbeape, Saxon.]

Mildew is a disease in plants, caused by a dewy moisture which falls on them, and continuing, for want of the sun's heat to draw it up, by its acrimony corrodes, gnaws, and spoils the plant: or, mildew is rather a concrete substance, which exudes through the pores of the leaves. What the gardeners commonly call mildew is an insect, found in great plenty, preying upon this exsudation. Others say, that mildew is a thick, clammy vapour, exhaled in the spring and summer from the plants, blossoms, and even the earth itself, in close, still weather, where there is neither sun nor wind. Miller thinks the true cause of the mildew appearing most upon plants which are exposed to the east, is a dry temperature in the air when the wind blows from that point, which stops the pores of the plants, and prevents their perspiration; whereby the juices of the plants are concreted upon the surface of their leaves, which being of a sweetish nature, insects are inticed thereto. Hill.

Down fell the mildew of his sugared words.

Swift.

The mildew cometh by closeness of air; and therefore in hills, or champaign grounds, it seldom cometh.

Bacon.

Soon blasting mildews black'ned all the grain.

Dryden.

To MILD'EW. v. a. To taint with mildew.

Here is your husband, like a mildew'd ear,

Blasting his wholesome brother.

Shakespeare, Hamlet.

He mildews the white wheat, and hurts the poor creatures of the earth. Shakespeare, K. Lear.
Morals snatch from Plutarch's tatter'd page, Mildew'd Bacon, or Stagyras's sage.

Guy, Tricia.

MILDLY. adv. [mihelice, Saxon.]

- Tenderly; not severely.

Princes, too mildly reigning,
Cease thy sorrow and complaining.

Dryden.

- Gently; not violently.

The air once heated maketh the flame burn more mildly, and so helpeth the continuance.

Bacon, Nat. Hist.

MILDNESS. n. s. [from mild.]

Gentleness; tenderness; mercy; clemency.

This milky gentleness and course of yours;
You are much more at task for want of wisdom,
Than praise'd for harmless mildness.

Shakespeare, K. Lear.

The same majestic mildness held its place,
Nor lost the mousers in his dying face.

Dryden.

I saw with what a brow you brav'd your fate;
Yet with what mildness bore your father's hate.

Dryden.

His probity and mildness shows
His care of friends and scorn of foes.

Addison.

MILTRARIETY. n. s. [mil, mils, Saxon; mille passus, Latin.]

The usual measure of roads in England, one thousand seven hundred and sixty yards, or five thousand two hundred and eighty feet.

We must measure twenty miles to-day. Shaks.

Within this three mile may you see it coming.

A moving grove. Shakespeare, Macbeth.

When the enemy appeared, the foot and artillery was four miles behind.

Clarendon.

Millions of miles, so rapid is their race,

To cheer the earth they in few moments pass.

Blackmore.

MILSTONE. n. s. [mile and stone.] Stone set to mark the miles.

MILLEFOLI. n. s. [millefolium, Latin.] A plant, the same with yarrow.

Milful and honey-suckles pound,

With these alluring savours strew the ground.

Dryden.

The scarf-skin is composed of small scales, between which the excretory ducts of the milary glands open.

Clegh.

MILIARY fever. A fever that produces small eruptions.

MIL'ICE. n. s. [Fr.] Standing force.

A word innovated by Temple, but unworthy of reception.

The two-and-twentieth of the prince's age is the time assigned by their constitutions for his entering upon the publick charges of their milice.

Temple.

MILITANCY. n. s. [from militans.] Warfare. A word worthy of revival.

All human life, especially the active part, is constituted in a state of continual militancy.

W. Montague, Dev. Ess. P. I. (1648), p. 122.

MILITANT. adj. [militans, Latin; militante, French.]

- Fighting; prosecuting the business of a soldier.

Against foul fiends they aid us militant;

They for us fight: they watch and daily ward,

And their bright squadrons round about us plant.

Symonds.

- Engaged in warfare with hell and the world. A term applied to the church of Christ on earth, as opposed to the church triumphant.

Then are the public duties of religion best ordered, when the militant church doth resemble, by sensible means, that hidden dignity and glory wherewith the church triumphant in heaven is beautified.

The state of a Christian in this world is frequently compared to a warfare; and this allusion has appeared so just, that the character of militant has obtained as the common distinction of that part of Christ's church sojourning here in this world from that part of the family at rest. Rogers.

MILITARY. adj. [militaris, Latin; militaire, French. Militar is now wholly out of use.]

- Engaged in the life of a soldier; soldierly.

He will maintain his argument as well as any military man in the world. Shakespeare, Hen. V.

- Suited a soldier; pertaining to a soldier; warlike.

In the time of Severus and Antoninus, many, being soldiers, had been converted unto Christ, and notwithstanding continued still in that military course of life.

Although he were a prince in military virtue approved, yet his cruelties weighed down his virtues.

Numbers numberless
The city gates out-poor'd, light-armed troops
In coats of mail and military pride. Milton, P. N.

The wreaths his grandeur knew to reap
By active toil, and military sweat,
Plying incline their sickly leaves.

Effectuated by soldiers.

He was with general applause, and great cries of joy, in a kind of military election or recognition, saluted king.

MILITARY. n. s. pl. The soldiery.

MILITARILY. adv. [from military.] In a soldierly manner.

We were militarily affected.

Tryal of the Reveries, (1660.), p. 155.

To MILITATE. v. n. [milito, Latin.] Of modern use in our language. In 1673 the Latin word (printed in Italicks) is given instead of it; as in the Pref. to the learned Dr. Jackson's works, published in that year. "It is expected, that two objections will militate against the labours of this great author, &c."

To oppose; to operate against.

This consideration would militate with more effect against his hypothesis, than a thousand syllogisms.

MILITIA. n. s. [Latin.] The trainbands; the standing force of a nation.

Let us prize think soberly of his forces, except his militia be good and valiant soldiers.

The militia was so settled by law, that a sudden army could be drawn together.

Unnumbered spirits round thee fly,
The light militia of the lower sky.

Pope, Rape of the Lock.

MILK. n. s. [mela, Sax.; melch, Dutch; melk, German; μῆλα, Greek; from μῆλον, to milk; mulgeo, Latin; melcon, melcan, Saxon. We had formerly emulc for milked. See Cockeran's Vocab.]

- The liquor with which animals feed their young from the breast.

Come to my woman's breasts,
And take my milk for gall. Shakespeare, Macbeth.

I fear thy nature,

It is too full o' the milk of human kindness
To catch the nearest way. Shakespeare, K. Lear.
Milk is the occasion of tumours of divers kinds.
Wierman.

Illustrious robes of satin and of silk,
And wanton lawns more soft and white than milk.
Bonavent, Pyghe.

When milk is dry'd with heat,
In vain the milkmaid tugs an empty pail. Dryden.
I concluded, if the goat continued, to confine myself wholly to the milk diet. Temple, Misc.
Broths and milk-meats are windy to stomachs troubled with acid ferments.

Floyer on the Humours.

2. Emulsion made by contusion of seeds.
Pistachio, so they be good and not musty, joined with almonds in almost all, or made into a salt of themselves, like unto almond milk, are an excellent nourisher. Bacon.

TO MILK, v. a. [from milk.]
1. To draw milk from the breast by the hand.

Capacious chargers all around were laid,
Full pails, and vessels of the milking trade.
Pope, Odyssey.

2. To suck.
I have given suck, and know
How tender 'tis to love the babe that smits me.
Shakespeare.

MIL'KEN, adj. [from milk.] Consisting of milk.

The remedies are to be proposed from a constant course of the milk diet, continued at least a year. Temple.

MIL'KER, † n. s. [from milk.]
1. One that milks animals.
His knee with swelling udders ready stand,
And lowering for the pail invite the milkier's hand.
Dryden.

2. A cow that gives milk. A northern expression. Craven Dial. and Brockett.
MIL'KINESS, n. s. [from milk.] Softness like that of milk; approach to the nature of milk.

Would I could share thy balmy, even temper,
And milkiness of blood. Dryden, Cymon.
The subtlety and clytiness of the blood absorbing
the acid of the chyle, it loses its milkiness.

Floyer on the Humours.

MIL'KLIVERED, adj. [milk and liver.]
Cowardly; timorous; faint-hearted.

Milkivered man,
That bear'st a cheek for blows, a head for wrongs.
Shakespeare.

MIL'KMAID, n. s. [milk and maid.] Woman employed in the dairy.

When milk is dry'd with heat,
In vain the milkmaid tugs an empty pail.
Dryden, Fug.

A lovely milkmaid began to regard with an eye of mercy.
MIL'KMAN, n. s. [milk and man.] A man who sells milk.

MIL'KPAIL, n. s. [milk and pail.] Vessel into which cows are milked.
That very substance which last week was grazing in the field, waving in the milk-pail, or growing in the garden, is now become part of the man.

Watts, Signs of the Mind.

MIL'KPAN, n. s. [milk and pan.] Vessel in which milk is kept in the dairy.
Sir Fulke Grevill had much and private access to Queen Elizabeth, and did many men good; yet he would say merrily of himself, that he was like Robin Goodfellow, for when the milkmaid milks the milk-pans, or what any racket, they would lay it upon Robin; so kept tales the ladies about the queen told her, or other bad offices that they did, they would put it upon him. Bacon, Apophthegms.

MILK'POTAGE, n. s. [milk and pottage.]

Food made by boiling milk with water and oatmeal.

For breakfast and supper, milk and milk-pottage, are very fit for children. Locke.

MIL'KSCORE, n. s. [milk and score.] Account of milk owed for, scored on a board.

He is better acquainted with the milk-score than his steward's accounts. Addison.

MIL'KSOAP, † n. s. [milk and soap.] A soft,
mild, effeminate, feeble-minded man.
This word of contempt is very old in our language.

Alas, she saith, that ever I was yehape
To wed a milksoap, or a coward ape.

Of a most notorious thief, which lived all his life-time of spoils, one of their barbs will say, that he was none of the idle milksoaps that was brought up by the fire-side, but that most of his days he spent in arms, and that he did never eat his meat before he had won it with his sword. Spenser.

A milksoap, one that never in his life
Felt so much cold as over shoes in snow.

Shakespeare, Rich. III.

We have as good passions as yourself; and a woman was never designed to be a milksoap.

Addison, Spect.

But give him port and potent sack;
From milksoap he starts up mopeack. Prior.

MIL'KTOOTH, n. s. [milk and tooth.]

Milkteeth are those small teeth which come forth before when a foal is about three months old, and which he begins to cast about two years and a half after,
in the same order as they grow.

Farrier's Dict.

MIL'KTHISTLE, n. s. [milk and thistle:] plants that have a white juice are named milkly. An herb.

MIL'KTREFOIL, n. s. [cystius.] An herb.

MIL'KVETCH, n. s. [astragalus, Latin.] A plant. Miller.

MIL'KWEED, n. s. [milk and weed.] A plant.

MIL'KWHITE, adj. [milk and white.] White as milk.

She a black silk cap on him began
To set, for foil of his milkwhite ruse. Sidney.

Then will I raise aloft the milkwhite rose,
With whose sweet smell the air shall be perfum'd.
Shakespeare.

The bolt of Cupid fell,

It fell upon a little western flower;
Before milkwhite, now purple with love's wound;
And milkiness call I love in idleness. Shakespeare.

A milkwhite goat for I did provide;
Two milkwhite kids run frisking by her side.
Dryden.

MIL'KWORT, n. s. [milk and wort.] A bell-shaped flower.

MIL'KWOMAN, n. s. [milk and woman.] A woman whose business is to serve families with milk.

Even your milkwoman and your nursery-maid have a fellow-feeling.

Arbuthnot, Hist. of J. Bull.

MIL'KLY, adj. [from milk.]
1. Made of milk.

2. Resembling milk.
Not useful herbs that in these gardens rise,
Which the kind soil with milkly sap supplies.

Can move the god. Pope.
Some plants upon breaking their vessels yield a milkly juice. Arbuthnot on Aliacetus.

3. Yielding milk.

Perhaps my passion he disdain,
And courts the milky mothers of the plains.

Recommen.

4. Soft; gentle; tender; timorous.
Has friendship such a faint and milky heart,
It turns in less than two nights. Shakespeare.

This milky gentleness and course of yours,
You are much more at task for want of wisdom,
Than praise'd for harmful mildness.

Shakespeare, K. Lear.

MILKY-WAY, n. s. [milky and way.] The galaxy.

The milky-way, or via lactea, is a broad white path or track encompassing the whole heavens, and extending itself in some places with a double path, but for the most part with a single one. Some of the ancients, as Aristotle, imagined that this path consisted only of a certain exhalation hanging in the air; but, by the tele-scopical observations of this age, it hath been discovered to consist of an innumerable quantity of fixed stars, different in situation and magnitude, from the confused mixture of whose light its whole colour is supposed to be accomplished. Harris.

Nor need we with a prying eye survey
The distant skies to find the milky-way:
It forcibly intrudes upon our sight.

Creech, Medius.

How many stars there must be, a naked eye may give us some faint glimpse, but much more a good telescope, directed towards that region of the sky called the milky-way. Cheyne.

MILL, † n. s. [molin, Gr. mola, Lat. mola, Welsh; mylin, mola, Saxon; moulin, Fr.
molen, Dutch. Dr. Johnson.—Thus our word was formerly written milne or mylne, like the Saxon; and, in some parts of England, a miller is still called milner. Chaucer, "these milnestones," Tr. and Cress. ii. 1385. Serenius calls mill "vox antiquissima, multaque lin-guis communis;" and he deduces it from the Goth. malan, to grind.] An engine or of fabric in which corn is ground to meal, or any other body is comminuted. In general an engine in which any operation is performed by means of wind or water; sometimes it is used of engines turned by the hand, or by animal force.

The table, and we about it, did all turn round by water which ran under, and carried it about as a mill. Sidney.

Olives ground in mills their fatness lose.

Dryden.

A miller had his arm and scapula torn from his body by a rope twisted round his wrist, and suddenly drawn up by the mill. Sharp, Surgery.

TO MILL, † v. a. [from the noun; μύλειν,
Greek; melia, to beat, mala, to grind, Icelandic.]

1. To grind; to comminute.

2. To beat up chocolate.

3. To stamp coin in the mints.

It would be better for your minted medals, if they carried the whole legend on their edges; but at the same time that they are lettered on the edges, they have other inscriptions on the face and the reverse. Addison.

Wood's halfpence are not milled, and therefore more easily counterfeited. Swift.

MILL-COG. n. s. [mill and cog.] The denotations on the circumference of wheels, by which they lock into other wheels.

The timber is useful for mill-cogs.

MILL-DAM. n. s. [mill and dam.] The mound by which the water is kept up to raise it for the mill.

A layer of lime and of earth is a great advantage in the making heads of ponds and mill-dams.

MILL-HORSE. n. s. Horse that turns a mill.

A mill-horse, still bound to go in one circle.

MILL-MOUNTAINS. n. s. An herb.

MILL-SIXPENCE. n. s. One of the first milld pieces of money used in England, and coined in 1561.

Seven grains in mill-sixpences, and two Edward shewd-board that cost me two shillings and two pence apiece.

MILL-TEETH. n. s. [mill and teeth.] The grinders; dentes molares, double teeth.

The best instruments for cracking bones and nuts are grinders or mill-teeth.

MILLENA'RIAN. n. s. [from millenarius, Lat. millenarius, Fr.] One who expects the millennium.

MILLENNARY. n. s. [millene, Fr.]

1. The space of a thousand years.

After the last accomplishment of this millenary of years.

Bate, Acts of Eng. Vol. P. II. (1550), sign. B. 5.

In the sixth millenary of the world.

Gregory, Pothum. (1650), p. 87.

2. One who expects the millennium.

The error of the millenarians was very vile.

Halewell on Providence, p. 499.

MILLENNARY. adj. [millenarius, Fr. millenarius, Latin.] Consisting of a thousand.

The millenary testament, in good manuscripts, is marked with a line cross the top thus H.

Arbuthnot on Chron.

MILLENNIST. n. s. [from mille, Lat.] One that holds the millennium.

MILLE'NNIAL. adj. [from millennium, Lat.] Pertaining to the millennium.

To be kings and priests unto God, is the characteristic of those that are to enjoy the millennial happiness.

Barnet.

MILLENNIUM. n. s. [Latin.] A thousand years generally taken for the thousand years during which, according to an ancient tradition in the church, grounded on a doubtful text in the Apocalypse, our blessed Saviour shall reign with the faithful upon earth after the resurrection, before the final completion of beatitude.

We must give a full account of that state called the millennium.

Burnet, The. of the Earth.

MILLEPIED. n. s. [millipieds, French; mille and pes, Latin.] This word is not commonly used in the singular number.

Dr. Johnson has not even so noticed it. Other dictionaries have it. A species of the wood-louse, so called from its numerous feet; the palmer-worm also has this name.

If pheasants and partridge are sick, give them millipodes and carwigs, which will cure them.

Mortimer, Herb.

MILLER. n. s. [from mill.] One who attends a mill.

More water glideth by the mill Than was the miller of.

Shakespeare.

Gilius, who made enquiry of millers who dwelt upon the shore, received answer, that the Euripus ebbed and flowed four times a day.

Brown, Vulg. Err.

MILLER. n. s. A fly.

MILLER'S-THUMB. n. s. [millier and thumb.] A small fish found in brooks, called likewise a bullhead.

MILL'SIMAL. adj. [millisimus, Lat.] Thousandth; consisting of thousandth parts.

To give the square root of the number two, he laboured long in mill'simal fractions, till he confessed there was no end.

Watts on the Mend.

MILLET. n. s. [milium, Lat. mil and millet, Fr.]

1. A plant.

The millet hath a loose divided panicle, and each single flower hath a calyx, consisting of two leaves, which are instead of petals, to protect the stamina and pistillum of the flower, which afterwards becomes an oval, shining seed.

This plant was originally brought from the eastern countries, where it is still greatly cultivated, from whence we are annually furnished with this grain, which is by many persons much esteemed for puddings.

Millet.

In two ranks of cavities is placed a roundish seed, about the bigness of a grain of millet.

Wainman on Foods.

Millet is diuretic, cleansing, and useful, in diseases of the kidneys.

Arbuthnot on Minerals.

2. A kind of fish; unless it be misprinted for mullet.

Some fish are gutted, split, and kept in pickle; as whiting, mackerel, mullet.

Curtis, Surv. of Cornwall.

MILLINE. n. s. [Dr. Johnson believes it to be Milaine, an inhabitant of Milan; others, Maliniere from Malines, as the French called Mechlin. Our lexicography defines the word, "a haberdasher of small wares." One who sells ribbands and dresses for women.

He was perfumed like a milliner.

And, 'twixt his finger and his thumb, he held A pouncet box, which ever and anon He gave his nose.

Shakespeare, Hen. IV.

Ask from your courtier to your inn-of-court man,

To your meek milliner.

B. Jonson, Alchemick.

The mevers and milliners complain of her want of publick spirit.

The milliner must be thoroughly versed in physiognomy: in the choice of ribbons she must have a particular regard to the complexion.

If any one sells Pavia to do something in charity, she will toss him half a crown, or a crown, and tell him, if he knew what a long milliner's bill she had just received, he would think it a great deal for her to give.

Lav.

MILLION. n. s. [million, Fr. milliogue, Italian.]

1. The number of an hundred myriads, or ten hundred thousand.

Within three eyes, at twenty thousand deaths, In thy hands should'st as many millions, in Thy lying tongue both numbers.

Shakespeare.

2. A proverbial name for any very great number.

That the three angles of a triangle are equal to two right ones, is a truth more evident than many of those propositions that go for principles; and yet there are millions who know not this at all.

Locke.

There are millions of truths that a man is not concerned to know.

Locke.

She found the polish'd glass, whose small conveniences

Enlarges to ten millions of degrees

The mite, invisible else.

Philips.

Mildst thy own flock, great shepherd, be received all heaven with millions thou hast us'd.

Psalm.

MILLIONED. n. adj. [from million.] Multiplied by millions.

Time, whose million'd accidents Creep in 'twixt rows, and change degrees of kings.

Shakespeare, Sonnet 115.

MILLIONTH. adj. [from million.] The ten hundred thousandth.

The first edition of an act is supposed to be as big as that of an elephant; which nevertheless can never arrive to the millionth part of the other's bulk.

Bentley.

MILLESTONE. n. s. [mill and stone.] The stone by which corn is comminuted.

No man shall take the netter or the upper mill-stones to pledge.

Dent. xxiv. 6.

Knop's beasts saw further into a millstone than our mobile.

L'Estrange.

MILT. n. s. [mildt, Dutch.]

1. The sperm of the male fish.

You shall scarce take a carp without a melt, or a female without a roe or spawn.

Walton, Angler.

2. The spleen. [mit, Saxon; mit, Dan. milte, Icel.]

To MILT. v. a. [from the noun.] To impregnate the roe or spawn of the female fish.

MILTER. n. s. [from milte.] The he of any fish, she being called spawner.

The spawner and milter labour to cover their spawn with sand.

Walton, Angler.

MILTWORK. n. s. [asplenon.] An herb.

Ainsworth.

MIME. n. s. [mime, French; mime; mimus, Lat.]

1. A buffoon who practises gesticulations, either representative of some action, or merely contrived to raise mirth.

Think't thou, mime, this is great.

B. Jonson.

Let him go now, and brand another man injuriously with the name of mime; being himself the foulest and most extravagant mime that hath been bred, of whom no less than almost half the world could serve for stage-room to play the mime in.

Philips, Apol. for Swoetym.

2. A ludicrous composition; a farce.

Scaliger defines a mime to be a poem intimating any action to stir up laughter.

Milton, Apol. for Swoetym.

Our farces are really what the Romans called mimes; — the interceded end and effect of which was excessive laughter.

Warton, Hist. Eng. Poet. iii. 351.

To MINE. v. n. To play the mime.

Acts old iniquity; and in the fit

Of mining, gets the opinion of a wit.

B. Jonson, Epigr. 115.

In an ill hour hath this unfortunate rashness stumbled upon the mention of mining.

Milton, Apol. for Swoetym.

MIM'ER.† n.s. [from mimē.] A mimick; a buffoon. Dr. Johnson here cites, for an example, a line from Milton's Samson Agonistes, in which the word is not mimer, but mimick. By an error of the press, in the first edition of Milton's poem, the word was printed mimira; but the table of errata directs us to read mimics; which, however, few editions have regarded, and which Dr. Johnson overlooked.

Jugglers, and dancers, antics, mummers, mimicks. S. A. rev. 1925.

MIME'TICAL.† adj. [μυμητικός, Greek.] Imitative.

If I were composing a dialogue in the old mimical or poetic form, I should tell you, perhaps, the occasion that led us into this track of conversation. Hurd.

MIM'ICAL.† adj. [mimicus, Latin.] Imitative; befitting a mimick; acting the mimick.

Man is of all creatures the most mimical in gestures, style, speech, fashion, or accoutrements. Written on Education.

A mimical word would needs try the same experiment; but his claws were shackled.

Singers and dancers entertained the people with light songs and mimical gestures, that they might not go away melancholy from serious pieces of the theatre. Dryden, Jew.

MIM'ICALLY.† adv. [from mimical.] In imitation; in a mimical manner.

As the sacrificers offered up to the true God of Israel were federal rites, and those that did partake of them did thereby enter into a covenant with God to become his servants, and obey his laws; so the airy principalities had mimically observed the same thing; and those that offered sacrifices to demons were supposed, by partaking of those sacrifices, to enter into a stricter league and familiarity with those evil spirits. Hall's Works, Melampus, (1681.) p. 58.

MIM'ICK.† n.s. [mimicus, Latin.]

1. A ludicrous imitator; a buffoon who copies another's act or manner so as to excite laughter: in fact, simply an actor; a player.

No matter whether the scenes be good or no; the better they are, the worse do you dislike them: and, being on your feet, and away like a coward, but salute all your gentle acquaintance that are spread either on the rusies, or on stools about you, and draw what troop you can from the stage after you: the mimicks are beholden to you, for allowing them a stricter league and poe ties perhaps, a pot go with you; but care not you for that; 'ere's no music without frets. Dekker, Guls Hornebooke, (1609.) p. 31.

Jugglers, and dancers, antics, mummers, mimicks. Milton, P. L.

Like poor Andrew I advance,
False mimic of my master's dance:
Around the cord awhile I sprawl,
And thence, though slow, in earnest fall. Prior.

2. A mean or servile imitator.
Cunning is only the mimick of discretion; and may pass upon weak men, in the same manner as vivacity is often mistaken for wit, and gravity for wisdom. Addison, Spect. No. 225.

MIM'ICK.† adj. [mimicus, Latin.] Imitative.

To reason's absence mimick Fancy wakes
To imitate her; but, misapplying shapes,
Wild work produces off, and most in dreams. Milton, P. L.

The busy head with mimick airs runs o'er
The scenes and actions of the day before. Swift.

To MIM'ICK.† v.a. [from the noun.] To imitate as a buffoon; to ridicule by a burlesque imitation.

Morpheus express'd
The shape of man, and imitated best;
The walk, the words, the gesture, could supply,
The habit mimick, and the mien betray. Dryden.
Who would'st with care some happy action frame;
So mimicks truth, it looks the very same. Granville.

MIM'ICKRY.† n.s. [from mimick.] Burlesque imitation.

By an excellent faculty in mimickry, my correspondent tells me he can assume my air, and give my actuality a slyness which diverts more than any thing I could say. Spectator.

MIMO'GRAPHY.† n.s. [mimicus and γράφω.] A writer of farces.

Some are poetsasters or mimographers.
Sir T. Herbert, Tron. p. 351.

MIM'ACER.† n.s. A threatener. See MIMACY.

MINA'CIOUS.† adj. [minax, Latin.] Full of threats.

Whether the face of heaven smile upon us with a cheerful bright azure, or look upon us with a more and minacious countenance, dark pitchy clouds being charged with thunder and lightning to let fly against the earth. Moore, Myst. of Godliness, (1680.) p. 63.

MINA'CITY.† n.s. [from minax, Latin.] Disposition to use threats.

MIM'ACY.† n.s. [minacitas, Lat.] Menace; threat. Not now in use.

I was well taught into mimacy; and the minacer, for aught I know, left to his course against me. Hacker's Life of Alp. Williams, P. ii. p. 17.

MIM'ARET.† n.s. [from mimare, to mimic.] The Mahometans term high slender minarets, i. e. towers. Sir T. Herbert's Trav. p. 142.

A kind of spire in Saracen architecture. There are likewise the ruins of a mosque, which must have been built by the Saracens, because the inscriptions on the minaret and tombstones are in their character. Diamond, Trav. (Lett. dat. 1747.) p. 211.

The mosques and other buildings of the Arabians are rounded into domes, and covered roofs, with now and then a slender square minaret terminating in a ball or pine-apple. Swainson, Trav. through Spain, L. 44.

MIM'ATORILY.† adv. [from minatory.] With threats.

His works being prohibited so strictly and minatorily, that bishops might not read them. Hacker's Life of Alp. Williams, p. 103.

MIM'ATORY.† adj. [minor, Latin.] Threatening.

The king made a statute minatory and minatory, towards justlers of peace, that they should duly execute their office, inviting complaints against them. Bacon, Hen. VII.

There is another way of taking the words as plainly minatory or threatening. Pococke on Hoes, p. 309.

To MINCE.† v.a. [contracted, as it seems, from minish; or from mincer, Fr.; mince, French, small. Dr. Johnson.—lcel. minka, diminutive, a minna, minus. Serenius.]

1. To cut into very small parts.

The mince Pyrrhus making malicious sport,
In mincing with his sword her husband's limbs. Shakespeare.

With a good chopping-knife mince the two capons as small as ordinary minced meat. Bacon, Nat. Hist.

What means the service of the church so imperfectly, and by halves, read over? What makes them mince and mangle that in their practice, which they could swallow whole in their subscription? South, Sermon.

Revive the wits;
But murder first, and mince them all to bits. Pope, Dunciad.

2. To mention any thing scrupulously, by a little at a time; to palliate; to extenuate.

I know no ways to mince it in love, but directly to say I love you. Shakespeare, Hen. V.

Iago,
Thy honesty and love doth mince this matter,
Making it light to Cassio. Shakespeare, Othello.

These gifts,
Savouring your mincing, the capacity
Of your soft cervicil condescence would receive,
If you might please to stretch it. Shakespeare, Hen. VIII.

I'll try to force you to your duty;
For so it is, however you mince it,
Ere we part. I shall ever be your matter. Hudibras.

Siren; now mince the sin,
And mollify damnation with a phrase.
Say you concocted out to Sancho's death,
But barely not forbade it. Dryden, Span. Friar.
If, to mince his meaning, I had either couched some part of what he said, or taken from the strength of his expression, I certainly had wronged him. Dryden.

Thou, seeing no where water enough to effect a general deluge, were forced to mince the matter, and make only a partial one of it, restraining it to Asia. Woodward.

3. To speak with affected softness; to clip the words.

Behold you sleeping dame,
Whose face between her forks preatness now;
That minces virtue, and does shake the head
To hear of pleasure's ozone. Shakespeare, A. Lear.

To MINCE.† v.n.

1. To walk nicely by scrupulousness; to act with appearance of short steps; of delicacy; to affect nicety.

Fast by her side did sit the bold Sansloy,
Fit mate for such a mincing ruinion,
Who in her loquacious took exceeding joy. Spenser, F. Q.

I'll turn two mincing steps
Into a manly stride. Shakespeare, As You Like It.
The daughters of Zion are laughing, and walk with stretched forth necks, and wantoo eyes, walking, and mincing [to the margin, stripping oicely] as they go. Isaiah, lii. 16.

A barlot form soft sliding by,
With mincing step, small voice, and languid eye. Pope, Dunciad.

2. To speak small and imperfectly.

The reeve, miller, and cook, are as much distinguished from each other as the mincing lady prioress and the broad speaking wife of Bath. Dryden, Fab.

MINCE-PIE.*† n.s. A pie made of meat MINCED-PIE. MINCED or cut into very small pieces, with other ingredients; called also a Christmas-pie, as being mostly in use about the time of Christmas.

Your petitioner is remarkable in his county for having dared to treat Sir P. P. a cursed squatter, and three members of the assembly of divines, with bravo and minced-pies upon New Year's day. Spectator, No. 629.
We have never been witnesses of antinomies excited by the use of mince-pies and plumb-porridge. Johnson, Life of Butler.

MIM'ICHOLO.† adv. [from mince.]

1. In small parts; not fully.

Justice requir'eth nothing mincingly, but all with pressed and husped, and even over-enclosed, measure. Hooker.

2. Affectedly.

Carols, in his theses, more mincingly terming their new pope, Paul the fifth, vice-deus, vice-god. Stedon, Mir. of Antichrist, p. 278.

MIND† n. s. [xəˈmɪnd, Saxon; minde, Danish; from the Goth. ga-munan, to remember.]

1. The intelligent power.

I am a very foolish, fond old man;
I fear I am not in my perfect mind.

Shakespeare, K. Lear.

This word being often used for the soul giving life, is attributed absolutely to madness, when we say that they are of a distracted mind; instead of a broken understanding: which word, mind, we use also for opinion; as, I am of this or that mind; and sometimes for men's conditions or virtues; as, he is of an honest mind, or a man of a just mind; sometimes for affection; as, I do this for my mind's sake: sometimes for the knowledge of principles, which we have without discourse: oftentimes for spirits, angels, and intelligences: but as it is used in the proper signification, including both the understanding agent and passive, it is described to be a pure, simple, substantial act, not depending upon matter, but having relation to that which is intelligible, as to its first object: or more at large thus; a part or particle of the soul, whereby it doth understand, not depending upon matter, nor needing any organ, free from passion coming from without, and apt to be disordered as eternal from that which is mortal.

Ralegh.

I thought th' eternal Mind
Had made us masters.

Dryden.

2. Intellectual capacity.

We say that learning's endless, and blame fate
For not allowing life a longer date.
He did the utmost bounds of knowledge find,
He found them not so large as was his mind.

Conyng.

3. Liking: choice; inclination; propensity; affection.

Our question is, Whether all be sin which is done without direction by Scripture, and not whether the Israelites did at any time amiss, by following their own minds without asking counsel of God.

Hooker.

We will consider of your suit,
And come some other time to know our mind.

Shakespeare.

Being so hard to me that brought your mind,
I fear she'll prove as hard to you in telling her mind.

Shakespeare.

I will have nothing else but only this;

And now methinks I have a mind to it.

Shakespeare.

Be of the same mind one towards another.

Rom. xii. 16.

Hast thou a wife after thy mind? forsake her not.

Eccl. x.

They had a mind to French Britain; but they have left fall their bit.

Bacon, War with Spain.

Sudden mind arose

In Adam, not to let the occasion pass,

Given him by this great conference, to know

Of things above this world.

Milton, P. L.

Waller counted on the other side of the river, but at such a distance that he had no mind to be engaged.

Cheridan.

He had a great mind to do it.
All the arguments to a good life will be very insignificant to a man that hath a mind to be wicked, when remission of sins may be had upon such easy terms.

Twickenham.

Suppose that after eight years' peace he hath a mind to infringe any of his treaties, or invade a neighbouring state, what opposition can we make?

Addison.

4. Quality; disposition. Not usual.

These trees receiving grafts of other kind,
Or thence transplanted, change their savage mind.

Dryden, Georg. ii. 71.

Of vegetable woods are various kinds,
And the same species are of several minds.

Dryden, Georg. ii. 190.

5. Thoughts; sentiments.

The ambiguous god,
In these mysterious words, his mind express.
Some truths reveal'd, in terms involv'd the rest.

Dryden.

6. Opinion.

The earth was not of my mind.

If you suppose as forcing you, it shook.

Shakespeare.

These men are of the mind, that they have clearer ideas of infinite duration than of infinite space, because God has existed from all eternity; but there is no real matter coeternal with infinite space.

Locke.

The gods permitting traitors to succeed
Become not parties in an impious deed;
And, by the tyrant's murder we may find,
That Cato and the gods were of a mind.

Graville.

7. Memory; remembrance.

"In all the proofs Johnson gives, a preposition is prefixed; in mind, to mind, out of mind. I question much if in English it is used, as with us." Dr. Jamieson. That is, in Scotland, without the preposition. But it appears to have been so used in old English; "As the bokes maken minde," i. e. remembrance. Gower. Conf. Am. See Tyrrwhitt's Gloss. in V. MIND. The king knows their disposition; a small touch will put him in mind of them.

Bacon, Adv. to Villiers.

When he brings
Over the earth a cloud, will therein set
His triple-coloured bow, whereon to look,
And call to mind his covenant.

Milton, P. L.

These, and more than I to mind can bring;

Mennas has not yet forgot to sing.

Dryden.

The cavern's mouth alone was hard to find,
Because the path dissolv'd was out of mind.

Dryden.

They will put him in mind of his own waking thoughts, ere these dreams had as yet made their impressions on his fancy.

Atterbury, Sermon.

A wholesome law, time out of mind;

Had been confirm'd by fate's decree.

Swift.

TO MIND† v. a. [from the noun.]

1. To mark; to attend.

His mournful plight is swallow'd up unware,
Forgetful of his own that minds another's cares.

Symonds, P. Q.

Not then mistrust, but tender love enjoin.

That I should mind thee oft; and mind thou me!

Milton, P. L.

If, in the raving of a frantic truce,

And minding more his verities than his way,

Any of these should drop into a well. Reason may.

Cease to request me; let us mind our way;

Another song requires another day.

Dryden.

He is daily called upon by the word, the ministers and inward suggestions of the Holy Spirit, to attend to those prospects, and mind the things that belong to his peace.

Rogers.

2. To put in mind; to remind.

Let me be punish'd, that have minded you

Of what you should forget.

Shakespeare, Wint. Tale.

I desire to mind those persons of St. Austin.

Belike she minds to play the Amazon.

Shakespeare, Hen. VI. P. III.

MIND'ED. adj. [from mind.]

1. Disposed; inclined; affected.

How you stand minded in the weighty difference Between the king and you. Shakespeare, Hen. VIII.

Whose fellowship therefore unmeet for this,
Good reason was thou freely should'st dislike.

Milton, P. L.

And be so minded still. Milton, P. L.

If men were minded to live virtuously, to believe a God would be no hindrance to any such design, but very much for its advancement.

Tillotson.

Pyrrhus is nobly minded; and I fain

Would live to thank him.

Philips.

2. Minded is used in compounds: as, high-minded.

I am not high-minded, I have no proud looks.

Sherwood.

We say likewise low-minded.

Psalmist.

MINDFUL.

adj. [mind and full.] Attentive; heedful; having memory.

I acknowledge the usefulness of your directions,
and I promise you to be mindful of your admonitions.

Hammond.

MINDFULLY.

adv. [from mindful.] Attentively; heedfully.

MINDFULNESS.

n. s. [from mindful.] Attention; regard.

Sherwood.

MINDLESS.

adj. [from mind.] Inattentive; regardless.

Cursed Athens, mindless of thy worth,

Forget not thy great deeds, when neighbour states,
But for thy sword and fortune, trust upon them.

Shakespeare.

As the strong eagle in the silent wood,
Mindless of watchful rage, and hostile care,
Plays round the rocky cliff, or craggy fold.

Prose.

2. Not endued with a mind; having no intellectual powers.

God first made angels, bodiless pure minds;
Then other things which mindless bodies be.

Devia.

Least he made man

3. Stupid; unthinking.

Pronounce thee a gross low, a mindless slave,
Or else a hovering temporizer.

Shakespeare, Wint. Tale.

MIND-STRIKEN.

adj. [mind and stricken.] Moved; affected in his mind.

He had been so mind-stricken by the beauty of virtue in that noble king, though not born his subject, he ever professed himself his servant.

Symonds.

MINE.

pronoun possessive. [myn, Saxon; meyn, German; mien, French; meus, Latin.] It was anciently the practice to use my before a consonant, and mine before a vowel; which euphony still requires to be observed. Mine is always used when the substantive precedes: as, this is my cat; this cat is mine.]

Belonging to me.

Thou art a soul in bliss, but I am bound

Upon a wheel of fire; that mine own tears,

Do scald like molten lead.

Shakespeare, K. Lear.

When a wise man gives thee better counsel, give me mine again.

Shakespeare, K. Lear.

If thou be't slain, and with no stroke of mine,
My wife and children's ghosts will haunt me still.

Shakespeare, K. Lear.

My wife and children's ghosts will haunt me still.

Shakespeare, K. Lear.

A friend of mine is come to me, and I have nothing to set before him. St. Luke.
 That palm is mine. Dryden.

MINE. n. s. [mine, French; myne, or mun, Welsh, from maen, lapis, in the plural meini.]

1. A place or cavern in the earth, which contains metals or minerals.

Though straighter bounds your fortune did confine,
 In your large heart was found a wealthy mine. Waller.

A workman, in avoid idleness, worked in a groove or mine-pit; therefore, which was little esteemed. Boyle.

A mine-digger may meet with a gem, which he knows not what to make of. Boyle.

The heedless mine-man aims only at the obtaining a quantity of such a metal as may be vendible.

2. A cavern dug under any fortification that it may sink for want of support; or, in modern war, that powder may be lodged in it, which being fired at a proper time, whatever is over it may be blown up and destroyed.

By what eclipse shall that sun be defaced?
 What mine hath erst thrown down so fair a tower?
 What sacrifice hath such a saint disgraced? Sidney.

Build up the walls of Jerusalem, which you have broken down, and fill up the mines that you have digged. Whitgift.

Others to a city strong Lay siege, encamp'd; by battery, scale, and mine, Assaulting. Milton, P. L.

TO MINE. v. n. [from the noun.]

1. To dig mines or burrows; to form any hollows under ground.

The ranging stock in mossy branches dwells;
 The climbing goats on hills securely dwell;
 The mining conies shroud in rocky cells. Wotton, Rem. p. 386.

Of this various matter the terrestrial globe consists from its surface to the greatest depth we ever dig or mine. Woodward, Nat. Hist.

2. To practise secret means of injury.

Mining fraud shall find no way to creep
 Into their fenced ears with grave advice. Buckville, Corboduac.

TO MINE. v. a. To sap; to ruin by mines; to destroy by slow degrees, or secret means.

If an housewife man waste in what hour the theft would come, soethil he schulde waite, and not suffre his house to be myned. Wicliffe, St. Luke, xii.

It will but skin and film the ulcerous place,
 While rank corruption, mining all within,
 Infects unseen. Shakespeare, Hamlet.

They mined the walls, laid the powder, and rammed the mouth; but the citizens made a countermine. Hagyard.

MINE. n. s. [mineur, Fr.; from mine.]

1. One that digs for metals.

By use kings' palaces are push'd to ground,
 And miners crush'd beneath their mines are found. Dryden.

2. One who makes military mines.

As the bombarder levels his mischief at cities,
 The miner bustles himself in ruining private houses. Tatler.

MINERAL. n. s. [mineral, Lat.] Fossile body; matter dug out of mines. All metals are minerals, but all minerals are not metals. Minerals in the restrained sense are bodies that may be melted, but not malleated.

She did confess, she had
 For you a mortal mineral; which, being took,
 Should by the minute feed on life, and ling'ring
 By inches waste you. Shakespeare, Cymb.
 The minerals of the kingdom, of lead, iron,
 Copper, and tin, are of great value. Bacon, Adv. to Villiers.

Part hidden veins digg'd up, nor hath this earth
 Extrails unlike, of mineral and stone. Milton, P. L.

Minerals: nitre with vitriol; common salt with alum; and sulphur with vitriol. Woodward, Nat. Hist.

MINERAL. adj. Consisting of fossile bodies.

By experience upon bodies in any mine, a man may conjecture at the metallic or mineral ingredients of any mass found there.

MINERALIST. n. s. [from mineral.] One skilled or employed in minerals.

A mine-digger may meet with a gem or a mineral, which he knows not what to make of till he shews it a jeweller or a mineralist. Boyle.

The metals and minerals which are lodged in the perpendicular intervals do still grow, to speak in the mineralist's phrase, or receive additional increase. Woodward.

MINERALOGIST. n. s. [mineralogie, Fr. from mineral, and λόγος.] One who discourses on minerals.

Many authors deny it, and the exactest mineralogists have rejected it. Brown, Vulg. Err.

MINERALOGY. n. s. [from mineral and λόγος.] The doctrine of minerals.

MINEVER. v. s. [the orthography seems to be miner. See MINER.] Some write it miniver. The skin of the miniver; white fur with specks of black.

To win some patched shreds of miniver.

TO MING. v. a. [menzan, mynzian, Sax.]

1. To mingle; to mix. Still a provincial expression. Chaucer uses meng in this sense.

2. To remind; to mention; to call to remembrance. A northern word, according to Grose; and certainly used, in this sense, by bishop Hall.

Could never man work thee a warmer shame
 Than once to mingy thy father's odious name Bp. Hall, Sat. B. iv. S. 2.

TO MINGLE. v. a. [menzan, mynzian, Sax. meng, Germ. menga, Su. Goth. from Chaucer use mingy for mingle.]

1. To mix; to join; to compound; to unite with something so as to make one mass.

Sulphurous and nitrous foam
 They found, they mingled, and with subtle heat, Concocted and adusted, they reduc'd Milton, P. L.

To blackest grain.
 Lament with me! with me your sorrows join,
 And mingle your united tears with mine! Wicks.

Our sex, our kindred, our houses, and our very names, we are ready to mingle with ourselves, and cannot bear to have others think meanly of them. Watts, Logick.

2. To contaminate; to make of dissimilar parts.

To confound the race
 Of mankind in one root, and Earth with Hell Milton, P. L.

To mingle and involve.
 The use of us appear contented with a mingled,
 Imperfect virtue. Rogers, Bismarck.

3. To confuse.

These mingle broils. Milton, P. L.

TO MINGLE. v. n. To be mixed; to be united with.

Ourself will mingle with society,
 And play the humble host. Shakespeare, Macbeth.
 Alcimus had defiled himself wilfully in the times of their mingling with the Gætilion. 2 Mac. xiv. 13.

Nor priests, nor statesmen,
 Could have completed such an ill as that,
 If women had not mingled in the mischief. Rower.

She, when she saw her sister nymphs, suppress'd
 Her rising fears, and mingled with the train. Shakespeare.

MINGLE. n. s. [from the verb.] Mixture; medley; confused mass.

Trumpeters,
 With brazen din blast you the city's ear,
 Make mingle with our rattling tabourines. Shakespeare.

Neither can I defend my Spanish Friar; though the comical parts are diverting, and the serious moving, yet they are of an unnatural mingle. Dryden, DuFrenoy.

MINGLE-MANGLE. n. s. A medley; a hotch-potch.

He cannot love the Lord Jesus with his heart, which lendeth one ear to his apostles, and another to false apostles, which can brook to see a mingle-mangle of religion and superstition, ministers and masses priests, light and darkness, truth and error, traditions and scriptures. Hooker, Ser. p. On St. Jude.

Publishing some botchery mingle-mangle of collections out of others.

Herdib, Ref. of Schools, (1642), p. 80.

MINGLEDLY. adv. [from the part. mingled.] Here and there; confusedly.

MINGLER. v. n. [from the verb.] He who mingles.

Such brewers, and minglers of this wine.

Harmer, Tr. of Deas, (1567), p. 250.

MINIARD. adj. Soft; dainty. See MINIARD.

TO MINIARDISE. v. a. [miniardiser, French.] To render soft, delicate, or dainty.

Choice of words, and softness of pronunciation, proceeding from such wanton spirits that did miniardise and make the language more dainty and feminine. Howell, Lett. iv. 19.

TO MINIATE. v. a. [miniare, Ital. from minium.] To paint or tinge with vermilion.

The initials are written or flourished in red and blue, and all the capitals in the body of the text are miniated with a pen. Warton, Hist. E. P. iii. p. v.

MINIATURE. n. s. [miniature, French; from minimum, Latin. Dr. Johnson. — It is the Italian miniatura, from miniare; Lat. miniatum, from minium. See TO MINIATE.]

1. Painting by powders mixed with gum and water. A mode of painting almost appropriated to small figures.

2. Representation in a small compass; representation less than the reality.

The water, with twenty bubbles, not content to have the picture of their face in large, would in each of these bubbles set forth the miniature of them. Sidney.

If the ladies should once take a liking to such a diminutive race, we should see mankind epitomized, and the whole species in miniature; in order to keep our posterity from dwindling, we have instituted a tall club. Addison, Guardian.

The hidden ways
Of nature would'st thou know? how first she frames
All things in miniature? thy specular orb
Apply to well dissected kernels: lo!
Strange forms arise, in such a little plant
Unfold its boughs; observe the slender threads
Of first beginning trees, their roots, their leaves,
In narrow needs describ'd. Philop.

3. Red letter: rubric distinction.

If the names of other saints are distinguished with miniature, her's [the blessed Virgin's] ought to shine in gold. Hicks, Ser. ii. 72.

MINIKIN. n. s. [diminutive.] Used in slight contempt. Dr. Johnson.—In this case, the word may be our old lexico-grapher finds minikin to elegant. Barrett's Alv. 1580. And, under elegant, combines "neat, pretty, minikin, trim, handsome, &c." It thus seems to have been adopted from the Fr. minion.

Sleepest, or wakest thou, jolly shepherd,
Thy sheep be in the cote?
And for our blast of thy minikin mouth.
Thy sheep shall take no harm. Shaks., P. Lear.

MINIKIN. n. s.

1. A darling; a favourite. Cotgrave.
Minikin, now min, is a nice trifling girl;
minnick is apparently a word of contempt.

Johnson, Note on Min. N. Drem.

2. A small sort of pins.

MINIM. n. s. [from minimus, Lat.]

1. A small being; a dwarf.

Not all

Minims of nature; some of serpent-kind, Wonderous in length, and corpulence, involv'd
Their snaky folds, and addled wings. Mil. P. L.

2. This word is applied, in the northern counties, to a small sort of fish, which they pronounce minim. See MINNOW.

3. One of an order of friars, called minimi, or the least of all, from affected humility.

4. Anciently, the shortest note in music;
now, equal to two crotchets. Dr. Johnson gives minim for this, and for the typographical sense. But minim is correct; though minim was not a false or non-existing word, as Mr. Mason insinuates in his hasty correction of Dr.
Johnson. Cotgrave writes it minum.

He fights as you sing prick-song, keeps time, distance, and proportion; rest he his minim
rest, one, two, and the third in your bosom.

Shakspeare, Rom. and Jul.

5. A little song or poem.

Pardon thy shepherd, mongst so many layes
As he hath sung of thee in all his dayes
To make one minim of thy poore handmayd.

Spenner, F. Q. vi. s. 28.

6. A small sort of printing letter.

MINIMENT. n. s. [from minuere.]

1. Miniments are the evidences or writings, whereby a man is enabled to defend the title of his estate. This word miniment includes all manner of evidences. Cowel.

2. Proof; testimony.

By chance he certain miniments forth drew,
Which yet with him as tickles did abide,
Of all the bounty which Helphulose threw
On him, whilst goodly grace she did him give.

Spenner, F. Q. iv. viii. 6.

MINIMUM. n. s. [Latin.] The smallest quantity possible. See MAXIMUM.

MINIMUS. n. s. [Latin.] A being of the least size.

Get you gone, you dwarf!

You minims of blinding knot grass made!

You beard, you accorn. Shakspeare.

MINION. n. s. [mignon, French; Goth.
minna; Germ. minnen, to love. Our word was formerly written both mignon, and mignion.] A favourite; a darling;
a low dependant; one who pleases rather than benefits. A word of contempt, or of slight and familiar kindness.

Minion, said old: indeed I was a pretty one in those days.

I see a number of lads that love you. Sidney.

They were made great courtiers, and in the way of minions when advancement, the most mortal offence to envy, stirred up their former friend to overdo them. Sidney.

One, who had been a special minion of Andromarus, hated us for having dispossessed him of her heart. Sidney.

Past by her side did sit the bold Sallow,

Fit mate for such a mincing minion. Spenner, F. Q.

Go rate thy minions;

Becomes it thee to be thus bold in terms

Before thy sovereign. Shakspeare, Hen. VI.

His company must do his minions grace,

Whilst I at home starve for a merry look. Shakspeare.

Edward sent one army into Ireland; not for conquest, but to guard the person of his minion Fido. Sidney.

The ruling corruption of his mind, the peculiar minion of his affections, was worldliness.

South, Ser. viii. 167.

If a man should launch into the history of human nature, we should find the very minions of princes linked in conspiracies against their master.

L'Estrange.

The drowsy tyrant by his minions led.

To regal rage devotes some patriot's hand. Swift.

MINION. adj. [mignon, Fr.] Trim; neat; dainty; fine; elegant; also, pleasing;
gentle. Hudnot, and Cotgrave.

On his minion harpe full well plays he can.

Pleasant, Pathoway, &c. s. d. sign. C. iii.

MINION. n. s. [minium, Latin.] Ver-million.

Let them paint their faces with minion and ceruse. Burton, Anat. of Mel. p. 482.

MINIONING. n. s. [from minion.] Kind treatment.

Scotter had steel well melt with southern winds,
With sweet behaviour and soft minioning.

Will turn from that where appetite is fixed.

Marton, Malmesbury.

MINIONLIKE. adj. [minion and like.]

MINIONLY. adj. Finely; daintily; affectedly. Not in use. Sherwood.

Hiberto will our sparkling youth laugh at their great grandfathers' English, who had more care to do well, than to speak minionlike.

Canale, Rom. Language.

MINIONSHIP. n. s. [from minion.] State of a favourite. Not in use.

The favourite Luines strengthened himself more and more in his minionship; but he is much murmured at, in regard the access of suitors to him is so difficult.

Huvel, Lett. i. s. 17.

MINIOUS. adj. [from minium, Lat.] Of the colour of red lead or vermilion.

Some conceive, that the Red Sea receiveth a red and minious tincture from springs that fall into it. Brown.

To MINISH. v. a. [from diminish; Lat.
minuo, from minus; old Fr. menuser, to diminish.] To lessen; to lop; to impair.

Ye shall not minish aught from your bricks of your daily task. End. v. 19.

They are minished and brought low through oppression. Psal. cxxi. 39.

Another law was to bring in the silver of the realm to the mint, in making all clipp, minished, or impaired coins of silver, not to be current in payments. Bacon, Hen. VII.

MINISTER. n. s. [minister, Latin; ministre, French.]

1. An agent; one who is employed to any end; one who acts not by any inherent authority, but under another.

You, whom virtue hath made the princeps of felicity, be not the minister of ruin. Sidney.

Rumble thy belly full; spit fire, spout ruin,
Nor ruin, wind, thunder, fire, are my daughters;

I tax not you, ye elements, with unkindness;

But yet I call you servile ministers,
That have with two pernicious daughters join'd
Your high-engender'd battles, 'gainst a head
So old and white as this. Shakspeare, C. Lear.

Th' infernal minister advance'd,
Seiz'd the due victim. Dryden, Thral. and Hon.

Other spirits govern'd by the will,
Shout through their tracts, ad distant muscles
all;

This sovereign, by his arbitrary nod,
Restrains or seeds his ministers abroad. Blackmore.

2. One who is employed in the administration of government.

Kings must be answerable to God, but the ministers to kings, whose eyes, ears, and hands they are, must be answerable to God and man.

Bacon.

3. One who serves at the altar; one who performs sacerdotal functions.

Ephraim, a faithful minister of Christ.

1 Cor. i. 7.

The ministers are always preaching, and the governors putting forth edicts against dancing and gaming. Addison.

The ministers of the gospel are especially required to shine as lights in the world, because the distinction of their station renders their conduct more observable; and the presumption of their knowledge, and the dignity of their office, gives a peculiar force and authority to their example.

Reper.

Calidus contents himself with thinking, that he never was a friend to heretics and infidels; that he has always been civil to the minister of his parish, and very often given something to the charity-schools. Lain.

4. A delegate; an official.

Let God revenge; for I may never lift
An angry arm against his minister.

Shakspeare, Rich. II.

5. An agent from a foreign power without the dignity of an ambassador.

To MINISTER. v. a. [ministrare, Lat.] To give; to supply; to afford.

All the customs of the Irish would minister occasion of a most ample discourse of the original and antiquity of that people. Spenner on Ireland.

Now he that ministrat need to the sower, both minister bread for your food and multiply your seed sown. 1 Cor. ii.

The wounded patient hears

The artist's hand that ministers the cure.

Truog, Orphan.

To MINISTER. v. n.

1. To attend; to serve in any office.

At table Eve

Minister'd naked, and their flowing cups

With pleasant liquors crown'd. Milton, P. L.

2. To give medicines.

Can'st thou not minister to a mind diseas'd,
Pluck from the memory a rooted sorrow,
Raze out the written troubles of the brain?

Shakespeare, Macbeth.

3. To give supplies of things needful; to give assistance; to contribute; to afford. Others ministered unto him of their substance.

Luke.

He who has a soul wholly void of gratitude, should set his soul to learn of his body; for all the parts of that minister to one another. South.
There is no truth which a man may more evidently make out than the existence of a God; yet he that shall content himself with things as they minister to our pleasures and passions, and not make enquire a little farther into their causes and ends, may live long without any notion of such a being.

Locke.

Those good men, who take such pleasure in relieving the miserable for Christ's sake, would not have been less forward to minister unto Christ himself.

Athenry.

Fasting is not absolutely good, but relatively, and as it ministers to other virtues.

Smalridge, Sermon.

4. To attend on the surface of God.

Whether prophesy, let us prophesy according to the proportion of faith; or ministry, let us wait on our ministering.

Rom. xii. 7.

MINISTERIAL.† adj. [from minister.]

1. Attendant; acting at command.
Understanding is in a man; courage and vivacity in the lion; service, and ministerial officiousness, in the ox.

Brown.

From censures unseen, celestial names,
Enlightening spirits, and ministerial flames,
Lift us our reason to that sovereign cause,
Who bleeds the whole with life.

Prior.

2. Acting under superior authority.

For the ministerial officers in court there must be an eye unto them.

Bacon, Adv. to Villiers.

I but your recorder am in this,
Or mouth, and speaker of the universe,
A ministerial notary; for 'tis
Not I, but you and fate that make this verse.

Flower, Poems, p. 167.

Absentness, the apostle determines, is of no other real value in religion, than as a ministerial cause of moral effects; as it recalls us from the world, and gives a serious turn to our thoughts.

Hogers, Sermon.

3. Sacerdotal; belonging to the ecclesiastical office or their office.

These speeches of Jerome and Chrysostom plainly allude unto such ministerial garments as were then in use.

Hosker.

4. Pertaining to ministers of state, or persons in subordinate authority.

Very solid and very brilliant talents distinguish the ministerial benches.

Darke.

The whole ministerial cant is quickly got by heart.

Burke.

- MINISTERIALLY. adv. In a ministerial manner.

Supremacy of office, by mutual agreement and voluntary economy, belongs to the father; while the son, out of voluntary condescension, submits to act ministerially, or in capacity of mediator.

Waterland.

MINISTRY. n. s. [ministerium, Latin.]

Office; service. This word is now contracted to ministry, but used by Milton as four syllables.

They that will have their chamber filled with a good scent, make some odoriferous water be blown about it by their servants' mouths that are detestous in that ministry.

Digby.

This high temple to frequent
With ministeries due, and solemn rites.

Milton, P. L.

MINISTRAL. adj. [from minister.] Pertaining to a minister.

MINISTRANT. adj. [from minister.] Attendant; acting at command. Pope accents it, not according to analogy, on the second syllable.

His thrones, and powers,
Princedom, and dominations ministrant, Accompany'd to heaven-gate. Milton, P. L.
Ministrant to their queen with busy care,
Four faithful handmaids the soft rites prepare.

Pope.

MINISTRATION.† n. s. [old French ministrat[i]on; from ministro, Latin.]

1. Agency; intervention; office of an agent delegated or commissioned by another.

God made him the instrument of his providence to me, as he hath made his own hand to him, with this difference, that God, by his ministrat[i]on to me, intends to do him a favour.

Dr. Taylor, Living Holy.

Though sometimes effected by the immediate fiat of the divine will, yet I think they are most ordinarily done by the ministrat[i]on of angels.

Hale, Orig. of Manikind.

2. Service; office; ecclesiastical function.

The profession of a clergyman is an holy profession, because it is a ministrat[i]on in holy things, an attendance at the altar.

Low.

If the present ministrat[i]on be more glorious than the former the minister is more holy.

Athenry.

MINISTRESS. * n. s. [from minister.] She who supplies or dispenses.

This was beauty sent from heaven,
The lovely ministrat[i]on of truth and good.

In this dark world. Alexander, Pleas of Imag. B. 1.

MINISTRY. n. s. [contracted from ministerium; ministerium, Latin.]

1. Office; service.

So far is an indistinction of all persons, and by consequence, an anarchy of all things, so far from being agreeable to the will of God, declared in his great household, the world, and especially in all the ministries of his proper household the church, that there was never yet any time, I believe, since it was a number, when some of its members were not more sacred than others.

Spratt, Sermon.

2. Office of one set apart to preach; ecclesiastical function.

Their ministry perform'd, and race well run,
Their doctrine and their story written left.

Milton, P. L.

Saint Paul was miraculously called to the ministry of the gospel, and had the whole doctrine of the gospel from God by immediate revelation; and was appointed the apostle of the Gentiles for propagating it in the barbarous world.

Locke.

3. Agency; interposition.

The natural world be made after a miraculous manner; but directs the affairs of it ever since by standing rules, and the ordinary ministry of second causes.

Athenry.

To all but thee in this be seem'd to go
And 'twixt my ministry to lead the blow.

The poets introduced the ministry of the gods, and taught the separate existence of human souls.

Benjey.

4. Business.

He safe from loud alarms,
Abhor'd the wicked ministry of arms.

Dryden, Zen.

5. Persons employed in the publick affairs of a state.

I converse in full freedom with many considerable men of both parties; and if not in equal number, it is purely accidental, as happening to have made acquaintance at court more under one ministry than another.

Swift.

MINIUM. n. s. [Latin.] Red lead.

Melt lead in a broad earthen vessel unglazed, and stir it continually till it be calcined into a grey powder; this is called the calx of lead; continue the fire, stirring it in the same manner, and it becomes yellow; in this state it is used in painting, and is called masticot or mastic; after this put it into a reverberatory furnace, and it will calcine further, and become of a fine red, which is the common minium or red lead; among the ancients minium was the name for cinnabar; the modern minium is used externally, and is excellent in cleansing and healing old ulcers. Hill, Mat. Med.

MINISKEIN. * n. s. See MINIKIN.

MIN'NOCK.† n. s. Of this word I know not the precise meaning. It is not unlikely that minnock and minz are originally the same word. Dr. Johnson.

This word is justly supposed by Mr. Malone to be an error of the press; and that minnick is the true word. One of the old quarto editions of the comedy reads minnick; another minnock; and the folio mimick. A player was called a minnick, in the poet's time. See MINICK.

An am's now! I fixed on his head;
Anoo, his Thibie must be answered,
And forth my minnock comes.

Shakespeare.

MINNOW.† n. s. [menius, small fish, Fr. from menu, small; min, Goth. small; and Dr. Jamieson says, he has been informed that the Gaelic name of the fish, weanann, is traced to meand, little.] A very small fish; a pink. See the second sense of MINN.

Here you this Triton of the minnows?

Shakespeare, Coriol.

The minnow, when he is in perfect season, and not sick, which is only presently after spawning, hath a kind of dappled or variegated colour, like a panther, on his sides, inclining to a greenish and sky colour, his belly being milk-white, and his back almost black or blackish; he is a sharp biter at a small worm in hot weather, and in the spring he make excellent minnow tannies; for being washed well in salt, and their heads and tails cut off, and their guts taken out, being fried with yolks of eggs, primroses, and tansy. Walton, Angler.

The nimble turning of the minnow is the perfection of minnow-fishing.

Walton, Angler.

MINNOR.† adj. [Latin.]

1. Petty; inconsiderable.

If there are petty errors and minor lapses, not considerably injurious unto faith, yet it is not safe to censure inferior faults. Brown, Vulg. Err.

2. Inferiour.

He wishes to take on board the eight secondaries, or minor canons, of his college.

Warren, Hist. E. P. ii. 242.

3. Less; smaller.

They altered this custom from cases of high concernment to the most trivial debates, the minor part ordinarily entering their protest. Clarendon.

The difference of a third part is so large and collective an account is not serious, if we consider how differently they are set in minor and less mistakes numbers.

Brown, Vulg. Err.

MINOR.† n. s.

1. One under age; one whose youth cannot yet allow him to manage his own affairs.

King Richard the Second, the first ten years of his reign, was a minor. Dances on Ireland.

He and his muse might be minors, but the libertines are full grown. Gallier, Fines of the Stage.
Long as the year's dull circle seems to run,
When the brisk minor pants for twenty-one. Pope.

The noblest blood of England having been shed in the grand rebellion, many great families became extinct, or supported only by minors. Seyff.

A minor or infant cannot be said to be conscious, because he cannot appear as a defendant in court, but by his guardian. Ayliffe, Parergon.

2. The second or particular proposition in the syllogism.

The second or minor proposition was, that this kingdom hath cause of just fear of overthrow from Spain. Bacon.

He supposed that a philosopher's brain was like several kinds; that the major is the male, the minor the female, which copulate by the middle term, and engender the conclusion. Arbuthnot.

3. A Franciscan friar. [fratres minores, Lat. fratricelli, Ital.] A name adopted by the Franciscans to express their extraordinary humility. Minorite is another English term for these persons.

To MINORATE. v. a. [from minor, Latin.] To lessen; to diminish. A word not yet admitted into the language, Dr. Johnson says; citing only the example from Glanville. The use of the word by others prior to, or contemporary with, Glanville, and those of no mean fame, may perhaps be allowed to establish it.

I could not in any charity believe, that he, who had been so often vice-chancellor, would any way seem to betray or minorate the authority and power of that place.

Idli, Lett. to Bp. Laud, (1631), Ap. Laud's Rem. p. 48.
Forget not how amercement into a thing minorates the passion from it.

Brown, Chr. Mor. iii. 10.
Imagination puts a double fallacy upon ancient men; first, it makes them undervalue themselves, and minorate their own abilities; and then it makes them overvalue the objects of fear, and make them far greater than they are.

This it doth not only by the advantageous assistance of a rule, but by showing in what degree distance minorates the object.

MINORATION. n. s. [from minorate.] The act of lessening; diminution; decrease. A word not in use.

His good pleasure was, by this willing minoration and examination of himself, to show his greater condescension.

Walsley, Life of Christ, (1615) sign. B. 7.
Bodies emit virtue without abatement of weight, as is most evident in the loadstone, whose effluences are communicable without a minoration of gravity.

Brown, Vulg. Err.
We hope the mercies of God will consist our degenerated integrity into some minoration of our offences.

MINORITE. n. s. A Franciscan friar. See the third sense of MINOR.

The staid Minorite, their chaplains.

MINORITY. n. s. [from minor, Lat.]

1. The state of being under age.

I mov'd the king, my master, to speak in the behalf of my daughter, in the minority of them both. Shakspeare.

He is young, and his minority is put into the trust of Richard Gloster. Shaks.

These changes in religion should be staid, until the king were of years to govern by himself: this the people supplanting worse than it was, a question was raised, whether, during the king's minority, such alterations might be made or no.

Hayward, Edu. VI.
Henry the Eighth, doubting he might die in the minority of his son, procured an act to pass, that no statute made during the minority of the king should bind him or his successors, except it were confirmed by the king at his full age.

But the first act that passed in king Edward the Sixth's time, was a repeal of that former act; at which time nevertheless the king was minor.

Bacon, Hen. VII.
If there be evidence, that it is not many ages since nature was in her minority, this may be taken for a good proof that she is not eternal.

Burnet, The. of the Earth.
Their counsels are warlike and ambitious, though something tempered by the minority of their king.

2. The state of being less.

From this narrow line of generation may ensue a minority, or smallness in the conclusion.

3. The smaller number; as, the minority held for that question in opposition to the majority.

MINOTAUR. n. s. [minotaure, French; minos and taurus.] A monster invented by the poets, half man and half bull, kept in Dardalus's labyrinth.

Thou may'st not wander in that labyrinth, These minotaurs, and ugly treasours lurk. Shaks.

MINSTER. n. s. [mynstre, Saxon.] A monastery: an ecclesiastical fraternity; a cathedral church. The word is yet retained at York and Lichfield.

Synt Above
Of that myntre leyde the first stone.

Egerton, Life of St. Alban.
MINSTREL. n. s. [The word minstrel does not appear to have been in use here before the Norman conquest; but at what particular period it was taken up I have not discovered, nor yet whether it was coined in England or France: though I am inclined to think the latter, where this character was called menestrier, menestrier, &c. which was Latinized by the monks, &c. miniatellus, miniatellus, miniatellus, &c. Vid. Gloss. Du Cange, et Suppl. Menage derives the French words from ministerialis or ministeriaris, barbarous Latin terms, used in the middle ages to express a workman or artificer, still called in Languedoc minstral; as if these men were styled artificers or performers by way of excellence. But the origin of the name is given perhaps more truly by Du Cange: "Ministrelli — quos vulgo menestreux vel menestriers appellamus, quod minoribus vel ministris accenserentur." Accordingly, he says, the word minstrel is sometimes used for miniatellus. Although one of these I take to be the true etymology, yet Junius's conjecture deserves mention, who supposes the word minstrel to be of English origin, and deduces it from our old English or Saxon name for a cathedral, minster. Bp. Percy, Rel. of Anc. Poetry, Ess. on the Minstrels, Note A. Another writer thus subscribes to the conjecture of Junius. Minstrel was indiscriminately applied to the harper, the fiddler, or the player on the bagpipe. It appears to be derived from minster; and those, called minstrels, were employed in the public worship of the cathedrals as singers; in the same way the Welsh called musicians cler, as employed in the same manner. V. Junius in voce. Those minstrels, during the middle ages, united the arts of poetry, instrumental and vocal music, their songs being always accompanied with the harp. They seem to have been the genuine successors of the ancient bards, Callander, Two Anc. Scot. Poems, p. 118. A musician; one who plays upon instruments; a singer.

Hark how the minstrels join to shrill aloud
Their merry music that sounds from far,
The pipe, the tabour, and the trembling croud,
That well agree withouten breach or jar. Spenser.

Whether any minstrel, or any other person, do use to sing any songs or ditties that be vile and unclean.

Q. Elizabeth's Injunct. & Articles, (1559.) Art. 54.
I will give you the minstrel.

— Then I will give you the serving creature.

I to the vulgar am become a jest;
Esteemed as a minstrel at a feast. Sandy, Paraph.

Jesus came into the ruler's house, and saw the minstrels, and the people making a noise.

These fellows
Were once the minstrels of a country show;
Follow'd the priests through each pearly tower,
By trumpet-chunks and blasted fairs known. Dryden.

Often out cheeks and poets have confess'd,
That music's force can tame the furious beast;
Can make the wolf, or foaming boar restrain
His rage; the lion dross his created mane,
Attentive to the song; the lynx forget
His wrath to man, and lick the minstrel's feet. Fraser.

MINSTRELSY. n. s. [from minstrel.]

1. Music; instrumental harmony. Apollo's self will envy at his play,
And all the world applaud his minstrelsy. Dryden.

That loving wretch that swears,
'Tis not the bodies matter, but the minds,
Which be in her angelic folds,
Would swear as justly, that he hears,
In that day's drear loar minstrelsy, the spheres. Donne.

I began —
Wrote in a pleasing fit of melancholy,
To meditate my rural minstrelsy.
Till fancy had her fill. Milton, Comus.

2. A number of musicians. Minstrelsy spirit train'd up in feast, and song!
Such lust thou arm'd the minstrelsy of heav'n. Milton, P. L.

MINST. n. s. [mince, Saxon; menthe, Fr. mentha, Lat.] A plant.

Then rubb'd it o'er with newly-gather'd mint,
A wholesome herb, that leaseth a grateful scent. Dryden.

MINST. n. s. [moneta, Lat. monet, Sax. money; myncian, to coin.]

1. The place where money is coined.

What is a person's name or face, that receives all his reputation from the mint, and would never have been known had there not been medals.

Addition on Medals.

2. Any place of invention.

A man in all the world's new fashion planted,
That bath a mint of plumes in his brain. Shakspeare.
As the mints of currency are at work, a great number of curious inventions are issued out, which grow current among the party.

Addition, Freeholder.

TO MINT.† v. a. [mynctian, Saxon.]

1. To coin; to stamp money.

Another law was, to bring in the silver of the realm to the mint, in making all clipped coins of silver not to be current in payments, without giving any remedy of weight; and so to set the mint on work, and to give way to new coins of silver which should be then minted.

Bacon, Hen. VII.

2. To invent; to forge.

Look into the titles wherby they hold these new portions of the crown, and you will find them of such nature as may be easily minted.

Bacon, War with Spain.

3. To aim at; to wish for; to have a mint to.

Used in the north of England.
[gemyntian, zemynt, Sax.]

MINTAGE. n. s. [from mint.]

2. The duty paid for coining. Ainsworth.

MINTERS. n. s. [from mint.]

1. A coiner.

Sterling ought to be of pure silver called leaf silver, the mint must add other weight, if the silver be not pure. Cumden.

2. An inventor.

They say — that Apollo, when he is an archer, is not president of the company. O generations of fictitious minters! who knows not that Apollo is a deity errant? Gayton on D. Quin. p. 242.

MINTMAN. n. s. [mint and man.] One skilled in coining.

He that thinketh Spain to be some great overmatch for this estate, is a good mintman; but takes greatness of kingdoms according to their bulk and currency, and not to their intrinsic value. Bacon, War with Spain.

MINTMASTER. n. s. [mint and master.]

1. One who presides in coining.

That which is coined, as mintmasters confessed, is alloyed with about a twelfth part of copper. Boyle.

2. One who invents.

The great mintmasters of these times, the schoolmen and metaphysicians, have wherewithal to content him. Locke.

MINTUET. n. s. [menuet, French.] A stately regular dance.

The tender creature could not see his face,

With whom she'd danc'd a minuet so late.

Spectator.

John has assurance to set up for a minuet dancer. Spectator.

MINTUM.† n. s. See MINIM. This way of spelling minim is found in Cotgrave's dictionary. But it is a corruption.

1. [With printers.] A small sort of printing letter; called also minion.

2. [With musicians.] A note of slow time, two of which make a semibreve, as two crotchets make a minim; two quavers a crotchet, and two semiquavers a quaver. Bailey.

MINUTE. adj. [minutus, Lat.] Small; little; slender; small in bulk; small in consequence.

Some minute philosophers pretend.

That with our days our pains and pleasures end. Dryden.

Such an universal superintendency has the eye and hand of providence over all, even the most minute and inconceivable things. South, Sermon.

Into small parts the wondrous stone divide,

Ten thousand of minutest size express

The same proportion which the large powers. Blackmore.

The serum is attracted by circulation, so as to pass into the minutest channels, and become fit nutriment for the body. Arbutnot on Aliments.

In all divisions we should consider the larger and more immediate parts of the subject, and not divide it at once into the more minute and remote parts. Watts, Logic.

MINUTE.† n. s. [minutus, Latin.]

1. The sixtieth part of an hour.

This man so compleat,
Who was enroll'd 'mongst wonders, and when he Almost with listening ravi'd, could not find
His hour of speech a minute. Shakspeare, Hen. VIII.

2. Any small space of time.

They walk'd about me every minute while;
And if I did but stir out of my bed,
Hendy they were to shoot me to the heart. Shakspeare.

The speed of Gods

Time counts not, though with swiftest minutes

Gods' that the world should turn

On minutes and on moments. Dryden, Sophy.

Experience does every minute prove the sad truth of this assertion. South, Sermon.

Tell her, that I some certainty may bring;

I go this minute to attend the king. Dryden, Aureng.

3. The first draught of any agreement in writing; this is common in the Scottish law; as, have you made a minute of that contract? Dr. Johnson. — Neither such practice, nor this sense of the word, are by any means confined to Scotland.

Its meaning, here recorded, is so general as to signify "a short note of any thing done or to be done." Mason. — It signifies "a minute detail of things singly enumerated;" and is old in this usage, though neither Dr. Johnson nor Mr. Mason could find any example.

His garments were parted, and lots cast upon his inward coat; they gave him vinegar and gall to drink; they brake not a bone of him, but they pierced his side with a spear, looking upon him whom they had pierced; according to the prophecies of him, which were so clear and descended to minuters and circumstances of his passion, that there was nothing left by which they could doubt whether this were he or no who was to come into the world.

Till then there is a very fit place and season for the exercise of the other part of the passion here, that of indignation, the last minute of my last particular. Hammond, Works, iv. 580.

TO MINUTE. v. a. [minuter, French.] To set down in short hints.

I no sooner heard this critick talk of my works, but I minuted what he had said, and resolv'd to enlarge the book of my speculations. Spectator.

MINUTE-BOOK. n. s. [minute and book.]

Book of short hints.

MINUTE-GLASS. n. s. [minute and glass.]

Glass of which the sand measures a minute.

MINUTE-HAND. n. s. [minute and hand.]

The hand that points to the minutes of a clock or watch.

We have no perception of the motion of the index or hour-hand of a clock; and yet this no perception, so many times repeated, becomes real perception, with respect to the minute-hand.

A. Haizer on the Soul, ii. 304.

MINUTE-JACK. n. s. Another name for Jack of the Clockhouse; which see.

Cop and knee-slaves, vapours, and minute-jacks!

Shakspeare, Timon.

MINUTE-WATCH. n. s. [minute and watch.]

A watch in which minutes are more distinctly marked than in common watches which reckon by the hour.

Counting our minutes and minutes, we found that from the beginning of the pumping, about two minutes after the coals had been put in glowing, to the total disappearing of the fire, there had passed but three minutes. Boyle.

MINUTELY. n. s. [minute.] Dr. Johnson, under the adverb minutely, has admitted that the following word in Shakespeare seems to be an adjective; as hourly is both the adverb and adjective. The adjective before us has good authority, besides that of Shakespeare. Happening every minute.

Now minutely reveal'd his faith-breach;

Those he commands, move only in command.

Nothing in love. Shakspeare, Macbeth.

His minutely dread and expectation, the dream that so haunts and bounds him.

Thomas, Towns, iv. 580.

Those minutely precautions, whereby we are by God's gracious providence kept from danger.

Wh. Duty of Man, Sunday, v. 10.

MINUTELY. adv. [from minute, the substantive.] Every minute; with very little time intervening.

What is it but a continued perpetuated voice from heaven, resounding for ever in our ears? As if we were minutely proclaimed in thunder from heaven, to give men rest in their sins, no quiet from Christ's importunity till they arise from so moribund a state. Hammond on Fund.

MINUTELY. adv. [from minûte.] To a small point; exactly; to the least part; nicely.

In this posture of mind it was impossible for him to keep that slow pace, and observe minutely that order of ranging all he said, from which results an obvious perspicuity. Locke.

Change of night and day,

And of the seasons ever stealing round,

Minutely faithful. Thomson, Summer.

MINUTENESS. n. s. [from minute.] Smallness; exility; inconsideableness.

The animal spirit and insensible particles never fall under our senses by reason of their minuteness. Brewster.

Many other such minutenesses, abundance of variations beyond number.

Stackford on the Creation, Prof. p. 122.

MINUTIE. n. s. pl. [Latin.] The smallest particulars. A word of modern usage.

I will venture to transmit to you some anecdotes concerning him, [Dr. Johnson,] which fell under my own observation. The very minutiae of such a character must be interesting, and may be compared to the flings of diamonds.

Dr. Macneil, in Burnet's Life of Johnson.

MIRK.† n. s. [contracted, I suppose, from miracul. Dr. Johnson.—That is, if there be such a word really existing as miracul. But in another place miracul. Dr. Johnson calls a miracul, “a miracul.” Now miracul, or miracul is probably from miracul, darling; and from that word miracul may have been formed, being at first a word of endearment. And thus Burton gives it, with a spelling which countenances this etymology: “Some pretty miracul.” Anatomy of Melancholy, p. 604. A young, pert, wanton girl.

Learned miracul!
Come, go with me apart. Shakespeare.
Some torches here, some links
Before the proud virgins mirror. Hudibras.
She, when but yet a tender nurse, began
To hold the door, but now sets up for man. Dryden.

MIRACULOUS.† adj. [from miracul.] Subterraneous; below the surface.
But Atlas, propping heaven, as poets feign,
His subterranean wonders spread! unveil
The tiny caverns, blazing on the cliff,
Of Abyssinia's cloud-compelling cliffs. Thomson, Autumn.

MIRACULOUS.† adj. [from miracul.] Wonderful; attracting admiration. Not in use.

Not Neoptolemus so miracul, Oo whose bright crest Fame with her loudst O
yes
Cries (This is he) could promise to himself
A thought of added honour torn from Hector. Shakespeare, Tr. and Crest.

MIRACULOUS.† n. s. [miracul, Saxon; miracul, Fr. miraculum, Latin.]
1. A wonder; something above human power.

Nothing almost sees miracul
But miracul. Shakespeare, A. Lear.
Virtuous and holy, chosen from above,
To work exceeding miracul on earth.

Be not offended, nature's miracul,
Thou art allotted to be ta'en by me. Shakespeare, Hen. VI.

2. [In theology.] An effect above human or natural power, performed in attestation of some truth.

The miracul of our Lord are peculiarly eminent above the lying wonders of demons, in that they were not made out of vain ostentation of power, and to raise unprofitable amusements; but for the real benefit and advantage of men by feeding the hungry, healing all sorts of diseases, ejecting of devils, and reviving the dead.

3. Anciently, a spectacle or sort of dramatic entertainment, representing the lives of saints and the most eminent scriptural stories; known in England, according to Mr. Warton, for more than two centuries before the reign of Edward the Second. So, in France: “Miracul, pièce de notre ancien théâtre, qui, par suite, fut appelée mystère, parce qu'on y traitoit des sujets de religion.” Roquefort, Gloss. Lang. Rom. See also Mystère.

Therefore made I my visitations
To vigils, and to processions,—
To plays of miracul, and miracles.
Chaucer, Wife of Bath's Prol.

We have no taverns, no holies about
At markets and miracul, we need only us never.
P. Pl. Creech.

To MIRACULOUS.† v. a. [from the noun.]
To make wonderful. Not in use.
Who this should be,
Doth miracul itself, lo'd before me. Shakespeare, Cymb.

To MIRACULOUS.† v. n. To work a miracul.
Not in use.

Their power of miracul, their infallibility did but add countenance and strength to their declarative Hales, (of Eton.) Power of the Kings, (1677), p. 169.

MIRACULOUS.† n. s. A pretender to the performance of miracul; an impostor.
Direct the intention of these laws only against Jugglers, miracul-mongers, or impostors.
Hallywell, Melompron, p. 52.

The two miracul-mongers had not been about a minute in the holy seclusion, when the glimmering of the holy fire was seen, or, imagined to appear, through some chinks of the door; and certainly Bedlam itself never saw such an unruly transport as was produced in the mob at this sight.
Mausdrell, Trav. p. 96.

MIRACULOUS.† adj. [from miracul, Fr. from miracul.] Done by miracul; produced by miracul; effected by power more than natural.

Arithmetical progression might easily demonstrate how fast mankind would increase, overpassing as miracul, though indeed natural, that example of the Israelites, who were multiplied in two hundred and fifteen years from seventy and six hundred thousand able men. Ralph, Egypt.
Restore this day, for thy great name,
Unto his ancient and miracul right. Herbert.

Why this strength
Miracul yet remaining in those locks?
His might continues in these not for naught.

At the first planting of the Christian religion, God was pleased to accompany it with a miracul power. Tillotson.

MIRACULOUSLY.† adv. [from miracul.] By miracul; by power above that of nature.

It was the singular providence of God, to draw these numerous heathen nations down to those Christian parts, where they might receive Christianity, and to mingle nations so remote miraculously to make one blood and kindred of all people, and each to have knowledge of him.
Spenser on Ireland.

Turnus was to be slain that very day;
and Æneas, wounded as he was, could not have engaged him in single combat, unless his hurt had been miraculously healed. Dryden.

MIRACULOUSNESS.† n. s. [from miracul.]
The state of being effected by miracul; superiority to natural power.
I understand not how any hasty conclusions, concerning the *miracul*ness of any strange event,
can reconcile themselves to counsel and sobriety.
Spenser on Prodiges, (1665), p. 242.

The *miracul*ness of such appearances will be no longer urged as an argument against their possibility.
Bret, on the Resurrection, § 15.

MIRADOR.† n. s. [Spanish, from mirar, to look.] A balcony; a gallery whence ladies see shows.

Mean time your valiant son, who had before
Gaid fame, rode round to every mirador;
Beneath each lady's stand a stop he made,
And bowing, took th' applauses which they paid.
Dryden.

MIRE.† n. s. [moer, Dutch.] Mud; dirt at the bottom of water.

He his ride from her lofty steed
Would have cast down and trod in dirty mire. Spenser.

Here's that which is too weak to be a sinner, honest water, which ne'er left man 'till he mire. Shakespeare, Timon.

I'm Ralph himself, your trusty squire,
Wh' has dragg'd your donkey out o' th' mire. Hudibras.

I appeal to any man's reason whether it be not better that there should be a distinction of land and sea, than that all should be mire and water.
More, against Atheism.

Now plung'd in mire, now by sharp brambles torn. Hoccommen.

To MIRE.† v. a. [from the noun.] To whelm in the mud; to soil with mud.

Why had I not, with charitable hand,
Took up a beggar's love in my game?
Who smere'd thus, and love'd with infamy,
I might have said no part of it to him. Shakspeare.

MIRE.† n. s. [myr, Welsh; myra, Saxon;
mier, Dutch.] An ant; a pismire.

MIRI.† n. s. [from miry.] Dirtiness;
fulness of mire.

MIRK.† adj. [myrk, Icel. moerk, Su.
Goth. moerk, Danish, dark, moerk, darkness; mupe, darkness, Saxon.] Dark; obscure. Used in the north of England.

The shadowe maketh her [the moon's] beams
moerk. Chaucer, Rom. R. 5339.
Dighton, I pray thee, speak not so dirke;
Such myster saying me seemeth moerk.

A shadow blacker than the moerk night,
Inviron'd all the place with darkness sad.
Pfaffers, Tass. xvi. 66.

MIRKISOME.† adj. [from myrk, Danish,
In the derivatives of this set, no regular orthography is observed: it is common to write murky, to which the rest ought to conform. Dr. Johnson.—It seems more correct to write mirky, mirk, and mirkisome, in conformity to the Saxon
mupe.] Dark; obscure.

Through mirkisome air her ready way she makes.
Spenser, F. G.

Into this mirkisome source.
Mary, Immortal. of the Soul, l. iv. 2.

MIRKISOMENESS.† n. s. [from mirkisome.]
Obscurity.

You can easily find over all the depths thereof,
and clearly comprehend all the darkest mirkisomeness thereof.
Monsieur, App. to Cens. (1685), p. 78.

MIRKY.† adj. [from mirk.] Dark; wanting light. Dr. Johnson prefers murky, perhaps not justly; though certainly it was formerly so written. See MURKY

MIRROIR.† n. s. [miroir, French; mirar, Spanish, to look.]

1. A looking glass; any thing which exhibits representations of objects by reflection. This sense is very old in our language.

This shall be likened to a man that beholdeth the chear of his birthe in a myrour. Wicliffe, St. James, l.

This myrour and this ring thy ye may see,
He hath sent to my lady myrour.
Chaucer, Squ. Tale.

And in his waters, which your mirror make,
Behold your faces as the crystal bright.

Spenser, Epithalam.

That power which gave me eyes the world to view,

To view myself infus'd an inward light,
Wiseerly my soul, as by a mirror true,
Of her own form may take a perfect sight.

Deviex.

Less bright the moon,
But opposite in level'd west was set
His mirror, with full face borrowing her light
From him.

Milton, P. L.

Mirror of poets, mirror of our age,
Which her whole face beholding on thy stage,
Pleas'd and displeas'd with her own faults endures
A remedy like those whom trusick cures. Waller.
By chance he sp'g'd a mirror while he spoke,
And gazing there beheld his alter'd look;
Wandering, he saw his features and his hue,
So much were chang'd, that scarce himself he knew.

Dryden.

Like as I rang'd the crystal wilds of air,
To the clear mirror of thy ruling star,
I saw, alas! some dread event impend.

Pope.

2. It is used for pattern; for that on which the eye ought to be fixed; as men look in a glass to adjust their mien or dress; an exemplar; an archetype. The works of nature are no less exact, than if she did both behold and study how to express some absolute shape or mirror always present before her.

O goodness, heavenly bright,
Mirror of grace and majesty divine.

Spenser, F. Q.

How far'st thou, mirror of all mortal men?

Shakespeare.

Mirror of ancient faith in early youth.

Dryd.

- MIR'RORE-STONE. n. s. [selenites, Lat.] A kind of transparent stone. Ainsworth.
MIRTH.† n. s. [mýrth, Sax. mýrth, merry.] Merriment; jollity; gaiety; laughter. To give a kingdom for a mirth, to sit, And keep the turn of tripping with a slave.

Shakespeare.

His eye bogets occasion for his wit;
For every object that the one doth catch,
The other turns to a mirth-mov'ing jest.

Shakespeare.

Most of the appearing mirth in the world is not mirth but art; the wounded spirit is not seen but walks under a disguise. South, Sermon.
I have always preferred cheerfulness to mirth. The latter I consider as an act, the former as an habit, of the mind. Mirth is short and transient, cheerfulness fixed and permanent.

Addison, Spect. No. 331.

With genial joy to warm the soul,
Bright Helen mix'd a north-inspiring bowl.

Pope, Odyssey.

- MIR'RTFUL. adj. [mirth and full.] Merry; gay; cheerful.

That shall be utter'd no simple word,
Shall make us and next morning. B. Jonson.
The feast was serv'd, the bowl was crown'd
To the king's pleasure went the mirthful round.

Prior.

- MIR'RTFULLY. adv. [from mirthful.] In a merry manner.

This septia is an oily or fat liquid substance, in colour not unlike soft white clay; of quality hot and dry, so as it is apt to inflame with the sun-beams, or heat that issues from fire; as was mirthfully experienced upon one of Alexander's pages, who, being anointed, with much ado escaped burning.

Sir T. Herbert, Trav. p. 185.

- MIR'RTLESS.† adj. [from mirth.] Joyless; cheerless.

Who can a reason finde or wit in that Daseineth he merry, that is mirthless?

Chaucer, Assembly of Foules.

Sion's doleful state,
Desolate;
Sack'd, burned, and enthral'd;
And the temple spoil'd, which we Ne'er should see,
To our mirthless minds we call'd.

Dennis, Ps. 137. Poems, p. 398.

- MI'RY. adj. [from mire.]
1. Deep in mud; muddy.

Thou should'st have heard how her love fell,
And under her horse; thou should'st have heard in how mury a place, how she was bemir'd.

Shakespeare, Tim. of the Shrove.

All men who lived lay live, and died natural death, by sickness or by age, went into vast gaves under ground, all dark and mury, full of noisome creatures, and there grovelled in endless stench and misery.

Temple.

Deep, through a mury lane she pick'd her way,
Above her snore rose the chaf'd clay. Gay, Trivia.

So have I seen ill-coupled boulders
Drag different ways in mury grounds.

Swift.

2. Consisting of mire.
Shall thou and I sit round about some fountain
Looking all downwards to behold our cheeks,
How they are stain'd like meadows, yet not dry,
With mury slime left on them by a flood? Shakspeare.

MIS.† An inseparable particle used in composition to mark an ill sense, or deprecation of the meaning; as chancer, luck; mischance, ill luck; computation, reckoning; miscumputation, false reckoning; to like, to be pleased; to mislike, to be offended; from mes in Teutonic and French, used in the same sense. Of this it is difficult to give all the examples; but those that follow will sufficiently explain it. Dr. Johnson.—It is the Saxon my, from the Gothic mis sa; both which are often found in composition, denoting error, defect, or dissimilitude.

MISACCEPT'ATION. n. s. [mis and acceptation.] The act of taking in a wrong sense.

MISADVENTURE. n. s. [mesaventure, Fr. mis and adventure.] Mischance; misfortune; ill luck; bad fortune.

Your looks are pale and wild, and do import Some misadventure. Shakespeare, Rom. and Jul.
When a commander, either upon necessity or misadventure, falls into danger, it much advances both his reputation and enterprise, if bravely he behave himself. Hayward.

The body consisted, after all the losses and misadventures, of no less than six thousand foot.

Clarendon.

Distinguish betwixt misadventure and design.

L'Estrange.

The trouble of a misadventure now and then, that reaches not his innocence or reputation, may not be an ill way to teach him more caution.

Locke on Education.

MISADVINTURED. adj. [from misadventure.] Unfortunate.

From forth the fatal loins of these two foes,
A pair of star-cross'd lovers take their life;
Whose misadventur'd piteous overthrows
Do with their death bury their parents' strife.

Shakespeare.

MISADVIS'ED. adj. [mis and advised.] Ill directed.

To MISAFECT' v. a. [mis and affect.] To dislike; not to be fond of.

That power which has his hideous so perversely misaffected. Milton, Animad. Rem. Defence.
MISAFECT'ED. v. adj. ill affected; ill disposed.

The whole body groans under such beads, and all the members must needs be misaffected.

Burton, Anal. of Mel. To the Reader.

To MISAFFIRM' v. a. [mis and affirm.] To state incorrectly; to affirm falsely.

I suppose it no injury to the dead, but a good deed rather to the living, if by better information given them, or which is enough, by only remembering them the truth of what they themselves know to be here misaffirmed, they may be kept from entering the third time so disadvantageously into war and bloodshed.

Milton, Eiconomus, Pref.
MISAIM'ED. adj. [mis and aim.] Not aimed rightly.

The idle stroke enforcing furious way,
Missing the mark of his misaimed sight.

Spenser, F. Q.

MISALLEGATION. n. s. [mis and allegation.] False statement.

You have compelled me, who have charged me so unjustly with misallegations.

Br. Morton, Discharge, &c. p. 277.

To MISALLEG' v. a. [mis and allege.] To cite falsely as a proof or argument.

[Thus] is all that Eusebius, by their misinterpretation and misalleged by him, [my refuter,] required.

Br. Hall, Hon. of the Merr. Clery, p. 155.

MISALLIANCE. n. s. [mis and alliance.] Improper association.

Their purpose was to ally two things, in nature incompatible, the Gothic and the classic unity; the effect of which misalliance was to discover and expose the mislikeness of the Gothic.

Hurd.

MISALLI'ED. adj. [mis and ally.] Ill associated.

They [the French revolutionists,] are a misallied and disparaged branch of the House of Nimrod.

Burke.

MIS'ANTHROPE.† n. s. [misanthrop, MISANTHROPOS.] French; mis anthropos, Gr. from an, to hate, and anthropos, man. Misanthropos, or misanthropous, "one that hates man's company," is in the old vocabulary of Cockerham. It is now usual to say misanthropist. A hater of mankind.

Alas, poor down! in only once

Was to be held a misanthrop;
This into general odium drew him.

Swift.

MISANTHROPICAL. adj. [from misanthropos.] thyropy.] Hating mankind.

The varieties of misanthropical covetousness.

Gongora on Eccl. (1691), p. 101.

MISA'NTHROPIST. n. s. [from misanthropy.] A hater of mankind.

MISA'NTHROPY.† n. s. [Misanthropie, Fr. from misanthropos.] Hatred of mankind.

In this last part of his imaginary travel, Swift has indulged a misanthropy that is intolerable.

Ld. Orrey on Swift, p. 166.

MISAPPLICATION. n. s. [mis and application.] Application to a wrong purpose.

The induction of many in the community of name, or the misapplication of the of one unto another, hath made some doubt thereof.

Brown, Vulg. Err.

The vigilance of those who preside over these charities is so exemplary, that persons disposed to do good can entertain no suspicions of the misapplication of their bounty.

Atterbury.

It is our duty to be provident for the future, and to guard against whatever may lead us into misapprehensions of it. Rogers.

TO MISAPPLY. v. a. [mis and apply.] To apply to wrong purposes.

Virtue itself turns vice, being misapplied, And vice sometime by action's dignified. Shakspeare.
The holy treasure was to be reserved, and issued for holy uses, and not misapplied to any other ends. Hovell.

He that knows, that whiteness is the name of that colour he has observed to snow, will not misapply that word so long as he retains that idea. Locke.

TO MISAPPREHEND. v. a. [mis and apprehend.] Not to understand rightly.

Thou's reasonings may lose none of their force by my misapprehending or misinterpreting them, I shall give the reader your arguments. Locke.

MISAPPREHENSION. n. s. [mis and apprehension.] Mistake; not right apprehension.

It is a degree of knowledge to be acquainted with the causes of our ignorance; what we have to say under this head, will equally concern our misapprehensions and errors. Glanville.

TO MISASCRIBE. v. a. [mis and ascribe.] To ascribe falsely.

That may be misascribed to art which is the bare production of nature. Boyle.

TO MISASSIGN. v. a. [mis and assign.] To assign erroneously.

We have not misassigned the cause of this phenomenon. Boyle.

TO MISATTEND. v. a. [mis and attend.] To attend slightly; to disregard.

They shall recover the mistaken words of Christ, to the advantage of their true sense, from manifold contrivances. Milton, Doct. and Disc. of Trin. ii. 22.

TO MISBEHAVE. v. a. [mis and become.] Not to become; to be unseemly; not to suit.

Either she has a possibility in that which I think impossible, or else impossible loves needs not misbecome me. Shelley.

What to the daughter from England? — Scorn and defiance, slight regard, contempt, And any thing that may not misbecome The mighty wender. Shakspeare, Hen. V.

That boldness which had got amongst play-fellows, has such a mixture of rudeness and ill-turn'd confidence, that those misbecoming and disagreeing ways of shifting in the world must be unlearned to make way for better principles. Locke.

Fortius, than may'st rely upon my conduct: Thy father will not act what misbecomes him. Addison.

MISBECOMINGNESS. n. s. [from misbecome.] Unbecomingness.

Moral failings, whose unfitness or misbecomingness makes all the guilt. Boyle against Custom. Swearing. p. 115.

MISBEGOTT. adj. [begot or begotten and mis.] Unlawfully or irregularly begotten.

Conaminated, leuc, And misbegotten blood, I spill of thee. Shakspeare, Hen. VI.

Your words have taken such pains, as if they labour'd

To bring man-slaughter into form, yet quarrelling Upon the head of valour; which, indeed, Is valour misbegot, and came into the world When sects and factions were but newly born. Shakspeare.

The misbegotten infant grows, And, ripe for birth, distends with deadly throes The swelling rind with unavailing strife, To leave the wooden womb, and pushes into life. Dryden.

TO MISBEHAVE. v. n. [mis and behave.] To act ill or improperly.

TO MISBEHAVE. v. a. To conduct ill or improperly.

Spirits who have misbehaved themselves. Jorin.

MISBEHAVE. adj. [mis and behave.] Untaught; ill-bred; uncivil.

Happiness courts thee in her best array; But, like a misbehaved and sullen wench, Thou pou'st't upon thy fortune and thy love. Shakspeare.

MISBEHAVIOUR. n. s. [mis and behaviour.] Ill conduct; bad practice.

The misbehaviour of particular persons does not at all affect their cause, since a man may act laudably in some respects, who does not so in others. Addison, Freshfield.

MISBELIEF. n. s. [mis and belief.] False religion; a wrong belief.

I, that have sold such as profane'd the faith That I was born in to captivity,

Will make their number equal that I shall Deliver from the ear; and win as many. By the clearness of my actions, to look on Their misbelief, and loath it. Massinger, Renegade.

TO MISBELIEVE. v. n. [mis and believe.] To hold a false religion; to believe wrongly.

Higher hate that misbelieving Moor. Trist. Andronicus.

MISBELIEVER. n. s. [mis and believe.] One that holds a false religion, or believes wrongly.

Yes, if I drew it with a curt intent To take a misbeliever to my bed, It must be so. Dryden, Don Sebastian.

TO MISBESEEM. v. a. [mis and become.] To suit ill; not to become.

One thinks it misbecoming the author, because a poem; another, unlawful in itself, because a satire. Ep. Hall, Preface to his Satires.

Neither can this action misbecome the worthiness of so glorious a piece. Hawell on Prov. p. 104.

TO MISBESTOW. v. a. [mis and bestow.] To bestow improperly.

There cannot be a better way than to take the misbestowed wealth, which they were choiced of. Milton, Annals. Item. Defence.

Remember, dear, how loath and slow I was to cast a look or smile,

Or one love-line to misbestow, Till thou hadst chang'd both face and stile. Carver's Poems. p. 165.

MISBORN. adj. [mis and born.] Born to misfortune; unluckily born.

Ah! misborn elf, In evil hour thy foes thou hidest sent. Spenser, F. Q. i. vi. 49.

TO MISCALULATE. v. a. [mis and calculate.] To reckon wrong.

After all the care I have taken, there may be, in such a multitude of passages, several misquoted, misinterpreted, and miscalculated. Arbutnot on Coins.

MISCALCULATION. n. s. [from miscalculate.] Wrong computation.

Their want of intercalations, and their miscalculations of eclipses. Nichols, Bibl. i. 73.

TO MISCALL. v. a. [mis and call.] To name improperly.

My heart will sigh when I miscall it so. Shakspeare, Rich. II.

The third act, which connects propositions and deduceth conclusions from them, the schools call discourse; and we shall not miscall it if we name it reason. Glanville, Scrym.

What you miscall their folly is their care. Dryden.

MISARRIAGE. n. s. [mis and carriage.] 1. Ill conduct.

Resolution of reforming do not always satisfy justice, our prevent vengeance for former misarrriages. King Charles.

How, alas! will be appear in that awful day, when even the failings and misarrriages of the righteous shall not be concealed, though the mercy of God be magnified in their pardon. Rogers, Sermon.

2. Unhappy event of our undertakings; failure.

When a counsellor, to save himself, Would lay misarrriages upon his prince, Exposing him to public rage and hate, O, 'tis an act as infamously base, As, should a common soldier seek behind, And thrust his general in the front of war. Dryden, Spens. Friar.

If the neglect or abuse of the liberty he had, to examine what would really make for his happiness, misleads him, the misarrriages that follow on it must be imputed to his own election. Locke.

A great part of that time which the inhabitants of the former earth had to spare, and whereby they made so ill use, was now employed in digging and plowing; and the excess of fertility which contributed so much to their misarrriages, was retracted and cut off. Woodward, Nat. Hist.

Your curses shall you tell, But wily your misarrriages conceal. Gerrit, Dispensary.

3. Abortion; act of bringing forth before the time.

There must be misarrriages and abortions; for there died many women with child. Grant.

TO MISARRY. v. n. [mis and carry.] 1. To fail; not to have the intended event; not to succeed; to be lost in an enterprise; not to reach the effect intended.

Have you not heard of Frederick, the great soldier who miscarried at sea? Shakspeare, Meas. for Meas.

Our sister's man is certainly miscarried. Shakspeare.

Is it concluded he shall be protector? — Is it determin'd and concluded yet?

But so it must me if the king miscarry. Shakspeare, Rich. III.

If you miscarry, Your business of the world hath so an end, And machinery too. Shakspeare, L. Lear.

Sweet Bassanio, my ships have all miscarried, my creditors grow cruel, my estate is very low. Shakspeare, Merch. of Ven.

I could mention some projects which I have brought to maturity, and others which have miscarried. Addison, Guardian.

No wonder that this expedient should so often miscarry, which requires so much art and genius to arrive at any perfection in it. Swift.

2. To have an abortion.

Give them a miscarrying worm and dry breasts. Hic. ix. 14.

So many politic conceptions so elaborately formed and wrought, and grown at length ripe for a delivery, do yet, in the issue, miscarry and prove abortive. South, Sermon.

His wife miscarried; but the abortion proved a female fetus. Pope and Arbuthnot.

You have proved yourself more tender of another's embryo, than the fondest mothers are of their own; for you have preserved every thing that I miscarried of. Pope.

TO MISCAST. v. a. [mis and cast.] To take a wrong account of.

Men misuse their days for in their age they deduct the account not from the day of their birth, but the year of our Lord wherein they were born.

Brown, Vulg. Err.

MISCELLANE. † n. s. [miscellaneus, Latin. This is corrupted into maslin or medlin. Dr. Johnson.—Maslin, or medlin, has been traced to a different origin. See MARTLIN.] Mixed corn; as, wheat and rye.

It is thought to be of use to make some miscellaneous in corn; as if you sow a few beans with wheat, your wheat will be the better.

Bacon, Nat. Hist. (ed. 1658), No. 670.

MISER. n. s. [miser, Latin.]

1. A wretched person; one overwhelmed with calamity.

Do not disdain to carry with you the woful words of a miser now despairing; neither be afraid to appear before her, bearing the base title of the sinner.

Sidney.

I wish that it may not prove some ominous fore-token of misfortune to have met with such a miser
as I am.

Sidney.

Fair son of Mars, that seek with warlike spoil
And great achievements, great your evil will be!
Vouchsafe to stay your steed for humble miser's sake.

Spenser, F. Q.

2. A wretch; a mean fellow.
Decrepit wretch! base ignoble wretch!
I am decapitated of a gentler blood.

Shakespeare, Hen. VI.

3. A wretch covetous to extremity; one who in wealth makes himself miserable
by the fear of poverty. This is the only sense now in use.

Though he be dearer to my soul than rest
To weary pilgrims, or to misers gold,
Rather than wrong Castilio I'd forget her.

Greene, Orlando.

No silver saints by dying misers given,
Here bid'd the rage of ill-regarded heaven;
But such plain roofs as piety could raise.

Page.

4. A wretch covetous to extremity; one who in wealth makes himself miserable
by the fear of poverty. This is the only sense now in use.

With an untitled tyrant, bloody scepter'd;
When shall thou see thy wholesome days again?

Shakespeare.

Most miserable is the desire that's glorious.
What's more miserable than discontent?

Shakespeare.

There will be a future state, and then how miserable is the voluptuous unbeliever left in the lazar-house.

South.

What hopes delude thee, miserable man?
Miserable comforters are ye all.

Job, vii. 2.

5. Culprity; parsimonious; stingy. In low language. Dr. Johnson.—South was of a different opinion from Dr. Johnson, and thus powerfully shews the propriety of the adjective in the present sense.

Reason tells me, that it is more misery to be covetous than to be poor, as our language, by a peculiar significance of dialect, calls the covetous man the miserable man.

South, Sermon, vii. 155.

6. Despicable; wretched; mean; as, a miserable person.

MISERABLENESS.† n. s. [from miserable.]

dus, or melts him into luxury.

Scott, Christian Life, P. ii. ch. 4.

MIS'ERABLY. adv. [from miserable.]
1. Unhappily; calamitously.

Of the five employed by him, two of them quarrelled, one of which was slain, and the other langued for it; the third drowned himself; the fourth, though rich, came to beg his bread; and the fifth was miserably subdued to death.

South.

2. Wretchedly; meanly.
As the love I bear you, makes me thus invite you, to the same love makes me ashamed to bring you to a place, where you shall be so, not spoken by ceremony but by truth, miserably entertained.

Sidney.

3. Covetously.
MIS'ERY. n. s. [miseria, Latin; misere,
French.]

1. Wretchedness; unhappiness.
My heart is drown'd with grief,
My body round engirt with misery.

Shakespeare, Hen. VI.

pleasure we are capable of, and misery the utmost pain.

Locke.

Perhaps it may be found more easy to forget the language than to part entirely with those tongues which we learn to use.

Locke.

2. Calamity; misfortune; cause of misery.
When we our better self leaving our woe,
We scarcely think our miseries our foes.

Shakespeare.

The gods from heav'n survey the fatal strife,
And mourn the miseries of human life.

Dryden, Zen.

3. [From misery.] Covetousness; avarice.
Not in use. Miser now signifies not an unhappy, but a covetous man; yet misery now signifies not covetousness but unhappiness.

He look'd upon things precious, as they were
The common mark o' th' world: he covets less Than misery itself would give.

Shakespeare, Coriol.

In a felicity of forty thousand pounds' charge,
I wish thirty pounds laid out before in an exact measure, for a little misery may easily breed some abundance of greater charge.

Watson.

The whole occasion of his late misfare.

Spenser, F. Q. v. vi. 48.

To MIS'YASH'ION. v. a. [mis and fashion.]
To form wrong.

A thing in reason impossible, through their misfashioned preconcept, appeared unto them no less certain, than if nature had written it in the very foreheads of all the creatures of God.

Hawesell on Providence.

To MIS'YIGN.* v. n. [mis and feign.] To feign with an ill design.

Who all this while Amazed stands herself so mock'd to see

5 p. 2

By him, who has the guerdon of his guile
For so misfiguring but true knight to be.
Spenser, F. Q. i. iii. 40.

To MISFO'RM. v. a. [mis and form.] To put in an ill form.

His monstrous sculp down to his teeth it ture,
And that misfigured shape misshaped more.

Spenser.

MISFO'RTUNE. n. s. [mis and fortune.]
Calamity; ill luck; want of good fortune.

Fortune thus gan say, misery and misfortune is all one,
And of misfortune, fortune hath only the gilt.

Sidney.

What world's delight, or joy of living speech,
Can heart so plung'd in sea of sorrows deep,
And hooped with so huge misfortune reach?

Spenser.

Consider why the change was wrought,
You'll find it his misfortune, not his fault.

Addison.

MISFO'RTUNED. adj. [from misfortune.]
Unfortunate; attended with misfortune.

Charity hath the judging of so many private Grievances in a misfortunate wretch.

Milton, Tetrachordon.

To MISFO'VELT v. a. [mis and give.]

1. To fill with doubt; to deprive of confidence. It is used always with the reciprocal pronoun.

As Henry's late promising prophesy
Did glad my heart with hope of this young Richmond;

So doth my heart misgive me in those conflicts
What may befall him, to his harm or ours.

This is strange! Who hath got the right Anne?
My heart misgives me.

Shakespeare, M. Wives of Windsor.

Yet ask his heart, divine of something ill,
Misgives him.

Milton, P. L.

His heart misgives him, that there were no more Meetings; but, upon communicating his suspicions, I soon made him easy.

Addison, Freeholder.

2. To grant or give improperly or amiss.

Not usual.

I knew nothing of any of their liberty misgiven or misused, till about a fortnight since.

Ap. Lawd, Hist. of his Chancery, of Or. rem. p. 192.

MISGIV'ING. n. s. [from misgive.] Doubt;
distrust.

As a conscience thus qualified and informed, be not the measure by which a man may take a true estimate of his abominable, the winner is left in the plunge of infinite doubts, suspicions, and misgivings, both as to the measures of his present duty,
and the final issues of his future reward.

South.

MISGO'TTEN. adj. [mis and gotten.] Unjustly obtained.

Leave, faylor, quickly that misgotten weft.

Spenser, F. Q. vi. l. 16.

The surreption of secretly misgotten dispositions.

By. Holl, Coven of Conscience.

To MISGO'VENT v. a. [mis and govern.]
To govern ill; to administer unfaithfully.

Misgovern'd both my kingdom and my life,
I gave my selfe to come, to sleepe, and since.

Mir. for Mag. p. 73.

Solyman charged him bitterly, that he had mis-governed the state, and inverted his treasures to his own use.

Knodia.

MISGO'VERNED. adj. [from misgovern.]
Rude; uncivilised.

Rude misgovern'd hands, from window tops,
Threw dust and rubbish on King Richard's head.

Shakespeare.

MISGOVERNANCE. n. s. [mis and governance.] Irregularity.

But misgovern too long slumbereth in sorrowing,
Lulled asleep through love's misgovernance.

Spenser.

MISGOVERNMENT. n. s. [mis and government.]

1. ill administration of publick affairs.
Men lay the blame of those evils whereof they know not the ground, upon publick misgovernment.

Raleigh, Ess.

2. ill management.
Men are miserable, if their education hath been so undisciplined, as to leave them unframed of skill to spend their time; but most miserable, if such misgovernment and unskillfulness make them fall into vicious company.

Rap. Taylor.

3. irregularity; inordinate behaviour.
There is not chastity enough in language
Without offence to utter them: thus, pretty lady,
I am sorry for thy much misgovernment.

Shaksp.

To MISGRAFF. v. a. [mis and graff.]
To graft amiss.

The course of true love never did run smooth;
But either it was different in blood,
Or else misgraffed, in respect of years.

Shakespeare, Mid. N. Dream.

To MISGR'UND. v. a. [mis and ground.]
To found falsely.

Otherwise this misgrounded conceit shall pass with us as a gloss of Bordeaux, that mars the text.

Ap. Hall, Hist. of the Mary, p. 104.

From me no pulpit, no misgrounded law
Nor scandal taught, shall this count withdraw.

Dennis, Poems, p. 925.

MISGUIDANCE. n. s. [mis and guidance.]
False direction.

The Nicene council found the equinox the twenty-first of March for the finding out of Easter, which has caused the misguidance from the sun which we lie under in respect of Easter, and the moveable feasts.

Holder on Time.

Whoever deceives a man, makes him ruin himself; and by causing an error in the great guide of his actions, his judgement, he causes an error in his choice, the misguidance of which must naturally engage him to his destruction.

South.

To MISGUIDE. v. a. [mis and guide.] To direct ill; to lead the wrong way.

Hunting after arguments to make good one side of a question, and wholly to neglect those which favour the other, is wilfully to misguide the understanding; and is so far from giving truth its true value, that it is really debases it.

Lache.

Misguid'd prince! no longer urge thy fate,
Nor tempt the hero to unequal war.

Prior.

Of all the causes which conspire to blind
Man's erring judgement, and misguide the mind,
That the weak head with strongest ideas rules,
Is pride, the never-failing vice of fools.

Pope.

MISIA'D. n. s. [mis and hap.] ill chance;
ill luck; calamity.

To tell you what miserable misiahs fell to the young prince of Macedon his cousin, I should too much fill your ears with strange horrors.

Sidney.

Since we are thus far entered into the consideration of our misiahs, tell me, have there been any more such tempests wherein she hath thus wretchedly been wrecked.

Spenser.

Sir knight, take to you wanted strength,
And master these misiahs with patient might.

Spenser.

Rome's resolute champions, repose you here,
Secure from worldly chances and misiahs.

Shaksp.

It cannot be
But that success attends him: if misiahs,
Ere this he had return'd; with fury driv'n
By his enemies; since no place like this
Can fit his punishment, or your revenge.

Milton, P. L.

If the worst of all misiahs hath fallen,
Speak; for he could not be unlike himself.

Shaksp.

To MISHA'PPEN. v. n. [mis and happen.]
To happen ill.

Affraid least to themselves the like misiahs might.

Spenser, F. Q. i. iii. 30.

To MISHA'AR. v. n. [mis and hear.] To hear imperfectly.

It is not so; there hath misiahs, misiahs' it
Be well advis'd, tell o'er thy tale again.

Shakespeare, K. John.

MISHMASH. n. s. A low word. A mingle or hotchpotch. Dr. Johnson from Ainsworth. It seems, however, not to have been so contemptible as is insinuated.

It is the Su. Goth misk-mask; Teut.
misch-masch, chaos; mischen, to mix.

Nor is our language without good examples of the word, though Dr. Johnson could find none.

Their language — [is] a mish-mash of Arabic and Portuguese.

Ap. T. Herbert, Truo, p. 9.

I know the ingredients just that make them up
All to loose grains, the subtlest volatile ston,
With the whole mish-mash of their composition.

Lex. Princeps of Claves.

To MISINFE' v. a. [mis and infer.] To infer wrong.

Nestorius teaching rightly, that God and man are distinct natures, did thereupon misinfer, that in Christ those natures can by no conjunction make one person.

Hooker.

To MISINFO'RM. v. a. [mis and inform.]
To deceive by false accounts.

Some belong to a man of great dignity, and not as that wicked Simon had misinformed.

2 Mac. iii. 11.

By no means trust to your servants, who mislead you, or misinform you; the reproach will lie upon yourself.

Isaac.

Bid her well beware,
Lost, by some fair-appearing good surpri'sd,
She dictate false; and misinform the world
To do what God expressly hath forbid.

Milton, P. L.

To MISINFO'RM. v. n. To make false information.

You misinform against him for concluding with the papists; yet find it not in him.

Montaigne, App. to Cos. p. 256.

MISINFORM'ATION. n. s. [from misinform.]
False intelligence; false accounts.

Let not such be discouraging as deserve well, by misinformation of others, perhaps out of envy or treachery.

Bacon.

The vengeance of God, and the indignation of men, will join forces against an insatiable business, when backed with greatness, and set on by misinformation.

South, Sermon.

MISINFORMER. n. s. [from misinform.]
One who spreads false information.

I plainly told the lord archbishop of Canterbury, that rather than I would be obnoxious to those slanderous tongues of his misinformers, I would cut up my throat.

Ap. Hall, Speculator of his Life.

To MISINSTRUC'T. v. a. [mis and instruct.] To instruct improperly; to teach to a wrong purpose.

Touching them for whom we crave that mercy which is not to be obtained, let us not think that our Saviour did misinstruct his disciples, willing them to pray for the peace even of such as should be uncapable of so great a blessing.

Hooker, Ecc. Pol. v. §. 49.

MISINSTRUCTION. n. s. [mis and instruction.] Instruction to an evil purpose.

They include the idolaters, and all other mis-carriages, which they know not themselves guilty of, by reason of the illud misinterpretations of their church. More, Antiq. against Idolatry, ch. 10.

MISINTERELLIGENCE.* n. s. [mis and intelligence.]

1. Misunderstanding; disagreement.

He lamented the misintelligence he observed to be between their majesties.

Ld. Chancery, Life, li. 529.

2. Misinformation; false accounts.

To MISINTERPRET.* v. a. [mis and interpret.] To explain to a wrong sense, or wrong intention.

The gentle reader rests happy to hear the worst words misinterpreted, the clearest actions obscured, and the innocent life traduced.

J. Jonson.

After all the care I have taken, there may be several passages misquoted and misinterpreted.

Arbutnot on Cains.

MISINTERPRETABLE.* adj. [from misinterpret.] That may be misinterpreted.

I can as ill endure a suspicious and misinterpretable case as a fault.

Dumas, Lett. in (1697), to Lady M. Herbert.

MISINTERPRETATION.* n. s. [mis and interpretation.] Wrong explanation.

Their misinterpretation of the law, alluded unto, argues no less. Sp. Hall, Cases of Consc. D. C. 2.

MISINTERPRETER.* n. s. [mis and interpreter.] One who explains to a wrong sense, or wrong intention.

Whom as a misinterpreter of Christ I openly protest against, and provoke him to the trial of this truth before all the world.

Milton, Doct. and Disc. of Divorce, Ded.

To MISJOIN.* v. a. [mis and join.] To join jointly or improperly.

In Reason's absence mimic Fancy wakes To imitate her; but misjoining shapes, Wild work produces oft, and most in dreams; Ill-matching words, and deeds, long part, or late.

Milton, P. L.

Luther, more mistaking what he read, Mistakes the sacred body with the bread. Dryden.

To MISJUDGE.* v. n. [mis and judge.] To form false opinions; to judge ill.

Jon. misjudge.

You see through love, and that deludes your sight: At what is straight, seems crooked through the water. Dryden, All for Love.

By allowing himself in what is innocent, he breeds offence at his weak and misjudging neighbours. Atterbury.

Inmate!

Too long misjudging have I thought thee wise, But sure relentless folly steals thy breast. Pope.

To MISJUDGE.* v. a. To mistake; to judge ill of.

Where we misjudge the matter, a miscarriage draws pity after it; but when we are transported by pride, our ruin lies at our own door.

L'Esrange.

MISJUDGEMENT.* n. s. [mis and judgement.] Unjust judgement; unjust determination.

His third reason, that the misjudgement in case of a pecuniary damage or bequestment, may be afterwards capable of being reversed.

Sp. Hall, Cases of Conscience.

Nobody will dare to censure that popular part of the tribunal, whose only restraint on misjudgement is the censure of the public.

Burke on a Bepicide Peace.

To MISKE.* v. a. [mis and ken.] To be ignorant of; to misunderstand; not to know. Used in some parts of the north of England.

M'KIN.* n. s. A little bagpipe. Obsolete. Bailey.

To MISKINDLE.* v. a. [mis and kindle.] To inflame rashly; to animate to an ill purpose.

Such is the misdressed heat of some unruly spirits. Sp. Hall, Ren. p. 70.

To MISKNOW.* v. a. [mis and know.] Not to know; to be ignorant of.

There is nothing in the world that they do more misknow than themselves.

Seavonable Sermon. (1644), p. 59.

To MISLAY.* v. a. [mis and lay.] To lay in a wrong place.

Mean time my worthy wife our arms mislay'd, And from beneath my beard my sword convey'd. Dryden.

The fault is generally mislay'd upon nature; and there is often a complaint of want of parts, when the fault lies in want of a due improvement. Locke.

If the butler be the tell-tale, mislay a spoon, so as he may never find it. Swift, Rules to Servants.

MISLAY.* n. s. [from mislay.] One that puts in the wrong place.

The mislayer of a mere-stone is to blame; but it is the unjust judge that is the capital remover of land-marks, when he defineth acres of lands and property. Bacon, Essays.

To MISLE.* v. n. [from mist.] To rain in imperceptible drops, like a thick mist; properly misle, Dr. Johnson says; but the Teut. miselen, as well as mislen, warrants this way of writing the word.

Yanough thou mourned hast,

Now ginnes to misle, his we household fast. Spenser.

The very small drops of a misling rain descending through a freezing air, do each of them shoot into one of those figured icicles. Grew, Cusum.

This cold precipitates the vapours either in dew, or if the vapours more copiously ascend, they are condensed into misting, or into showers of small rain, falling in numerous, thick, small drops. Darwin, Physico-Theol.

In misling days, when I my threshold beard, With happy beer I to the barn repair'd. Gey, Pastoral.

MISLE.* n. s. [from the verb.] Small, misty rain. In the Craven Dialect, mislin.

To MISLEAD.* v. a. preterite and part. passive, misled. [mis and lead.] To guide a wrong way; to betray to mischief or mistake.

Take, oh take those lips away, That so sweetly were forewarn:

And these eyes, the break of days,

Lights that do mislead the morn. Shakespeare.

Poor misled men: your states are yet worthy pity.

If you would hear, and change your savage minds,

Leave to be mad. J. Jonson, Cato.

Trust not servants who mislead or misinform you.

Oh thievish night,

Why shouldst thou, but for some felonious end,

In thy dark lantern thus close up the stars,

That nature hung in heaven, and fill'd their lamps

With everlasting oil, to give due light

To the misled and lonely traveller? Milton, Censur.

What can they teach and not mislead?

Ignorant of themselves, of God much more? Milton, P. R.

Thou who hast taught me to forgive the ill, And recompence, as friends, the good misled; To every be a precept of thy will, Return that mercy on thy servant's head. Dryden.

The imagination, which is of simple perception, doth never of itself, and directly, mislead us; yet it is the almost fatal means of our deception. Glanville, Scipio.

Whatever necessity determines to the pursuit of real bliss, the same necessity establishes suspense, and scrutiny of each successive desire, whether the satisfaction of it does not interfere with our true happiness, and mislead us from it. Locke.

'Tis hard to say, if greater want of skill Appear in writing or in judging ill: But of the two less dangerous is th' offence To live our patience, than mislead our sense. Pope.

MISLEADER.* n. s. [from mislead.] One that leads to ill.

When thou dost hear I am as I have been, Approach me, and thou shalt be as thou wast, The tutor and the feeder of my riots; Till then I launch thee on pain of death, As I have done the rest of my misleader. Shakespeare.

They have discoloured and shandoued those heretical phantasies touching our Saviour, wherein by their misleaders they had been anciently plunged. Irreverend on Languages.

MISLEARNED.* adj. [mis and learned.] Not really or properly learned.

Such is this which you have here propounded on the behalf of your friend, whom it seems a mislearned advocate would fain bear up in a course altogether unjustifiable. Sp. Hall, Cases of Consc. Add.

MISLETOE.* See MISLETOE.

To MISLIKE.* v. a. [mis and like; Saxon miclican.] To disapprove; to be not pleased with; to dislike.

It was hard to say, whether he more liked his doings, or misliked the effect of his doings. Sidney.

Tertullian was not deceived in the place; but Aquinas, who misliked this opinion, followed a worse. Baile.

Judge not the preacher, for he is thy judge: If thou mislike him, thou conceiv'st his merit not. Herbert.

To MISLIKE.* v. n. Not to be pleased with.

They made sport, and I laughed; yet mispronounced, and I misliked.

Milton, Apol. for Smectymnus.

MISLIKE.* n. s. [from the verb.] Disapprobation; dislike.

Setting your scorn on your mislike aside, Tell me some reason, why the lady Gray

Should not become my wife. Shakespeare, Hen. VI.

Their angry gestures with mislike disclose, How much his speech offends their noble cars. Fairfax.

MISLIKE.* n. s. [from mislike.] One that disapproves.

Once flatterers of great men, privy mislikers of good men, fair speakers with smiling countenances.

*Mislike.** n. s. [See MISLINT.] Mislike

corn: as, wheat and rye.

They commonly sow those lands with wheat, mislike, and barley. Mortimer, H. H.

To MISLIVE.* v. n. [mis and live.] To live ill.

Should not this child, that gave him that good, Eke cherish his child, if in his ways he stood?

For if he abide in leanness and lust, Little boots all the wealth and the trust. Spenser, Shep. Cal. May.

The misleading Christian crucifies Christ again.

Rp. Holt, Rev. p. 16.

MISLU'CK, * n. s. [mis and luck.] Misfortune; bad luck.

Poor man! it was his misluck to marry that wicked wife.

Widdow, Fr. and Eng. Gr. (1623) p. 301.

To MISMAN'AGE, v. a. [mis and manage.] To manage ill.

The debates of princes' councils would be in danger to be mismanaged, since those who have a great stake in them are not always perfectly knowing in the forms of syllogism.

Locke.

MISMAN'AGEMENT, n. s. [mis and management.] Ill management; ill conduct.

It is mismanagement more than want of abilities, that men have reason to complain of in those that differ.

Locke.

The falls of favourites, projects of the great, Of old mismanagement, taxation new, All neither wholly false, nor wholly true.

Pope.

To MISMA'RK, v. a. [mis and mark.] To mark with the wrong token.

Young, Night Th. 5.

To MISMA'VE, v. a. [mis and make.] To call by the wrong name.

They make one man's fancie, or perhaps fallacy, confining laws to sub, and connect them as such to their successors, who are bold to misname all unbelongingness to their incogitancy, presumption.

Bayle on Colours.

MISNOMER' n. s. [French.] In law, a wrong name; by which an indictment, or any other act, may be vacated.

The law does not favour advantages of misnomer any further than the strict rule of law requires.

Foster's Abridg. of Law and Equity.

To MISOBSE'VE, v. a. [mis and observe.] Not to observe accurately.

They understand it as early as they do language; and, if I misobserve you, they love to be treated as rational creatures sooner than is imagined.

Locke on Education.

MISO'GAMIST, n. s. [μῖσος, and γάμος.] A marriage-hater.

MISO'GYNIST, * n. s. [μῖσος to hate, and γυνή, a woman.] A woman-hater.

Julius, at the first, little better than a misogynist, was afterwards so altered from himself, that he successively married four wives.

Fallax, Holy State, (1648) p. 81.

The hardest task is to persuade the erroneous obscene misogynist, or woman-hater, that any discourse acknowledging their worth can go beyond poetry.

Whitcomb, Memo. of the Eng. p. 372.

MISO'GYN, n. s. [μῖσος, and γυνή, Greek.] Hatred of women.

MISOPH'NION, * n. s. [mis and opinion.] Erroneous notion.

We are as apt as those, that see through a mist, to think them greater than they are: every fault is a crime, where misopinion is an heresy.

Rp. Hall, Peccator. 16.

To MISORDER, v. a. [mis and order.] To conduct ill; to manage irregularly.

If the child misorder in forgetting a word, or miscalculating the sentence, I would not have the master frown.

Acham.

Yet few of them come to any great age, by reason of their misorder'd life when they were young.

Acham.

The time misorder'd doth in common sense Crowd us, and crush us to this monstrous form,

To hold our safety up.

Shakespeare, Hen. IV.

MISO'RDER, n. s. [from the verb.] Irregularity; disorderly proceedings.

When news was brought to Richard the Second, that his uncle, who sought to reform the multitude of his councilors, were assembled in a wood near unto the court, he merrily demanded of one Sir Hugh a Linne, who had been a good military man, but was then somewhat distraught of his wits, what he would advise him to do? Issue out, quoth Sir Hugh, and slay them every mother's son; and when thou hast so done, thou hast killed all the faithful friends thou hast in England.

Camden, Remains.

MISO'RDERLY, † adj. [from misorder.] Irregular; unlawful.

His overmuch fearing of you drives him to seek some misorderly shift, to be helped by some other book, or to be prompted by some other scholar.

Spartacus.

To MISPE'ND, v. a. preterite and pass. passive, mispent, [mis and spend.]

1. To spend ill; to waste; to consume to no purpose; to throw away.

What a deal of cold wisdom did a man mispend the better part of life in! In scattering compliments, tendering visits, gathering and venting news.

B. Jonson, Discoveries.

Let it in now endeavour to redeem what he hath mispent by employing more of that leisure in this duty for the future.

W. Duty of Man.

First guilty conscience does the mirror bring, Then sharp remorse shoots out her angry sting; And anxious thoughts, within themselves at strife, Upbraid the long mispent luxurious life.

Dryden.

Let this his *mis*pent want of some arrange.

Treat all his empty pages with disdain, And think a grave repit mispent and vain.

Blackmore.

He who has lived with the greatest care will find, upon a review of his time, that he has mispent much; but he who has mispent much has still a greater concern.

Rogers.

Wise men retrieve, as far as they are able, every mispent or unprofitable hour which has slipped from them.

Rogers.

2. To waste, with the reciprocal pronoun.

Now let the arched knife their thirsty limbs Discover, for the genial moisture due

To apply, otherwise mispend its self

Phaëg.

MISPEN'DER, n. s. [from mispend.] One who spends ill or prodigally.

I suspect the excellency of those men's parts who are dissolute, and careless mispenders of their time.

Norris.

MISPEN'SE, * n. s. [from mispend.] Waste; loss; ill employment.

Your riotous *mispen*ce had empyr'd your estate.

Rp. Hall, Epist. (1608) D. 2. Ep. 10.

Since we had ourselves guilty of the usual *mispen*ce of our good hours, let us, whilst we have space, obtain of ourselves to be careful of redeeming that precious time which we have lost.

Rp. Holt, Rev. p. 607.

To engage now in contest about them, may be reasonably deemed nothing more than a *willful mispen*ce of our time, labour, and good humour, by vainly reciprocating the sale of endless contention.

Barrow, vol. i. S. 29.

The *mispen*ce of our time, the wasting our talents, and the neglect of that immediate duty and worship we owe to Almighty God, are, I fear, matters which are seldom accounted for by us.

Killingbeck, Sermon. p. 171.

To MISPERUA'VE * v. a. [mis and persuade.] To bring to a wrong notion.

Shall we give sentence of death inevitably against all those fathers of the Greek church, which, being misperuaded, died in the error of free-will? Hosker, Disc. on Justification, p. 41.

So true we find it, by experience of all ages in the church of God, that the teacher's error is the people's trial, harder and heavier so much to bear, as he is in worth and regard greater that misperuadeth them.

Hosker, Eccl. Pol. v. § 62.

The world's mislabelling or misperuaded magnificences.

Las. Bl. of Dr. Beaudry, p. 29.

And curb the range of his misrule tongue.

Br. Hall, Ser. vi.

MISS. n. s. [contracted from mistress.] Bailey, and Dr. Johnson. — It may perhaps be a contraction of the Teut. meysen, i. e. meysden, a girl.]

1. The term of honour to a young girl. Dr. Johnson. — Miss, at the beginning of the last century, was appropriated to the daughters of gentlemen under the age of ten, or given opprobriously to young gentlewomen reproachable for their conduct. See Notes on Steele's Ep. Correspond. I. 92. Mistress was then the style of grown up unmarried ladies, though the mother was living; and, for a considerable part of the century, maintained its ground against the infantine term of miss.

Where there are little masters and misses in a house, they are great impediments to the diversions of the servants. Suff.

2. A strumpet; a concubine; a whore; a prostitute.

All women would be of one piece,
The virtuous matron and the miss.

This gentle cock, for salience of his life,
Six misses had besides his lawful wife. Dryden.

By this new-felt attraction, and instinct.

Milton, P. L.

2. Not to hit by manual aim.

The life you boasted to your javelin given,
Prince, you have miss'd. Pope.

3. To fail of obtaining.

If she desired above all things to have Organius, Organius feared nothing but to miss Parthenia. Sidney.

So may I, blind fortune leading me,
Miss that, which one unworship may attain;
And die with grieving. Shakspeare, Merch. of Ven.

Where shall a maid's distracted heart find rest,
At she can miss it in her lover's breast? Dryden.

When a man misses his great end, happiness,
he will acknowledge he judged not right. Locke.

4. To discover something to be unexpectedly wanting.

Without him I found a weakness, and a mistrustfulness of myself, as one strayed from his best strength, when at any time I missed him. Sidney.

In vain have I kept all that this fellow hath in the wilderness, so that nothing was missed. 1 Sam. xiv. 31.

5. To be without.

We cannot miss him; he does make our fire,
Fetch in our wood. Shakspeare, Tempest.

6. To omit.

He that is so tender of himself, that he can never find in his heart so much as to miss a meal, by way of punishment for his faults, shows he is not much fallen out with himself. Whole Duty of Man.

She would never miss one day,
A walk so fine, as this so gay. Prior.

7. To perceive want of.

My recumb'd love and care,
May ever tend about thee to old age
With all things grateful cheer'd, and to supply'd,
That what by me thou hast lost thou least *miss*est.

He who has a firm, sincere friend, may want all the rest without missing them. South.

To MISSA'Y. v. n.

1. To fly; not to hit.

Moses was in the mount, and missing long,
And the great Thibithe, who on fiery wheels
Rode up to heaven, yet once again to come.

5. To miscarry; to fail; as by accident.

The invention all admird, and each, how be
To be the inventor miss'd, so easy it seem'd, Once found, which yet unfound most would have thought impossible. Milton, P. L.

Criticus missing of the Moldavian fell upon Maylat. Knodles.

6. To fail to obtain, learn, or find; sometimes with of before the object.

The moral and relative perfections of the Deity are easy to be understood by us; upon the least reflection we cannot miss of them. Atterbury, Sermon.

Miss.† n. s. [from the verb.]

1. Loss; want.

I could have better spar'd a better man.
Oh, I should have a heavy miss of thee,
If I were much in love with vanity. Shakspeare, Hen. IV.

If these papers have that evidence in them, there will be no great miss of those which are lost,
and my reader may be satisfied without them. Locke.

2. Mistake; error; [missa, Gothic; may, Sax.]

O rascal hand, to do so foul a miss!
Chaucer, Mancip. Tot.

He did without any great miss in the hardest points of grammar. Acham, Schoolmaster.

Amends for miss he now will make.

misshapen. [miss and shape.]

1. To shape ill; to form ill; to deform.

A rude misshapen, monstrous rabbleman. Spenser, F. G.

His monstrous scalp down to his teeth it tore,
And that misshap'd shape, misshap'd more. Spenser, F. G.

Whom then she does transform to monstrous
lues, And horribly misshap'd with ugly sights, Captiv'd eternally in iron mews. Spenser, F. G.

Let the misshap'd trunk that bears this head
Be round implac'd with a glorious crown. Shakspeare.

Pride will have a fall: the beautiful trees go all to the wreck here, and only the misshapen and despicable dwarf is left standing. L'Estrange.

Flute hates his own misshapen race,
Her sister furies fly her hideous face. Dryden, Rn.

They make bold to destroy ill-formed and misshap'd productions. Locke.

The Alps broken into so many steps and precipices, form one of the most irregular, misshapen scenes in the world. Addison.

We ought not to believe that the banks of the oceans are really deformed, because they have not the form of a regular ballwork; nor that the mountains are misshapen, because they are not acute pyramids or cones. Bentley, Sermon.

Rome figures monstrous and misshap'd appear Consider'd singly, or beheld too near,
Which has proportion'd to their size or place,
Due distance reconciles to form and grace. Pope.

2. In Shakspeare, perhaps, it once signifies ill directed; as, to shape a course.

Thy wit, that ornament to shape and love,
Misshapen in the conduct of them both,
Like powder in a skill-less soldier's flask,
I set on fire. Shakspeare, Rom. and Jul.

MISSILE. adj. [missilis, Latin.] Thrown by the hand; striking at distance.

Wa bend the bow, or wing the missile dart. Pope.

MISSION. n. s. [missio, Latin.]

1. Commission; the state of being sent by supreme authority.

Her son tracing the desert wild,
All his great work to come before him set,
How to begin, how to accomplish best,
His end of being on earth, and mission high. Milton, P. R.

The divine authority of our mission, and the powers vested in us by the high-priest of our profession, Christ Jesus, are publicly disputed and denied. Atterbury.

2. Persons sent on any account, usually to propagate religion.

In these ships there should be a mission of three of the brethren of Solomon's house, to give us knowledge of the sciences, manufactures, and inventions of all the world, and bring us up books and patterns; and that the brethren should stay abroad till the new mission. Bacon, New Atlantis.

3. Dismissal; discharge. Not in use.

In Cesar's army, somewhat the soldiers would have had, yet only demanded a mission or discharge, though with no intention it should be granted, but thought to wrench him to their other desires; whereupon with one cry they misd mission. Bacon, Apophthegms.

4. Faction; party. Not in use.

Glorious deeds, in those fields of late,
Made emulous missions 'mongst the gods themselves.

And drove great Mars to faction. Shakspeare.

MIS'SIONARY.† n. s. [missionaire, Fr. Dr. MIS'SIONER. n. s. Johnson. — Our word at first was missioner; of which the earliest example, given by Dr. Johnson, is from Dryden. Dryden, however, adopted also the French form missionnaire; and thus, in the original edition of the Hind and Panther, writes, "these the missionaries our zeal has made," 4to. 1687, p. 63. Soon afterwards missionary became the word.] One sent to propagate religion.

The missionaries of France seek to establish this practice in all places where they teach.

W. Montague, Dev. Ess. P. II. (1654), p. 94.
You mention the pre-terter missionary, who had been persecuted for his religion. Swift.

I desire our young missionaries from the university to consider where they are, and not dress, and look, and move, like young officers.

Like mighty missioner you come,
Ad partes infidelium. Dryden, Ep. to Sir G. Etherege.

MIS'SIVE.† adj. [missive, French.]

1. Such as is sent.

The king grants a licence under the great seal called a cougè d'elire, to elect the person he has nominated by his letters missive. Ayliffe, Peregrin.

2. Used at distance.

In vain with darts a distant war they try,
Short, and more short the missive weapons fly. Dryden.

Ink is the great missive weapon in all battles of the learned. Swift, Battle of the Books.

MIS'SIVE. n. s. [French.]

1. A letter sent: it is retained in Scotland at that sense.

Great aids came in to him; partly upon missives, and partly voluntary from many parts. Bacon, Hen. VII.

2. A messenger. Both obsolete.

Isotting in Alexandria, you
Did pocket up my letters; and with taunts
Did give my missive out of audience. Shakspeare.
Whiles I stood wrapt in the wonder of it, came messengers from the king, who all-hailed me thence of Cædore. Shakspeare, Macbeth.

TO MISSE'AK. v. a. [mis and speak.] To speak wrong.

Them as a mother which delights to hear
Her early child misseep half-utter'd words.
Donne, Poems, p. 177.

TO MISSE'AK. v. n. To blunder in speaking.

It is not so; thou hast misseep, misheard;
Be well advis'd, tell o' thy tale again. Shakspeare, K. John.

MIST.† n. s. [mixt, Saxon; mist, Icel. caligo; myrcan, caligare, Saxon.]

1. A low thin cloud; a small thin rain not perceived in single drops.

Old Chaucer, like the morning star,
To us discovers day from far;
His light shows mists and clouds dissolv'd,
Which our dark nation long involv'd. Denham.

And mists condens'd to clouds obscure the sky,
And clouds dissolv'd, the thirsty ground supply. Bacon.

As a mist is a multitude of small but solid globules, which therefore descend; so a vapour, and therefore a wazy cloud, is nothing else but a congeries of very small and concave globules, which therefore ascend to that height, in which they are of equal weight with the air, where they remain suspended, till by some motion is the air, being broken, they descend in solid drops; either small, as in a mist, or bigger, when many of them run together, as in rain. Great.

But hovering mists around his brows are spread,
And night with sable shades involves his head. Dryden.

A cloud is nothing but a mist flying high in the air, as a mist is nothing but a cloud here below. Locke.

2. Any thing that dims or darkens.

My people's eyes once blinded with such mists of suspicion, they are misled into the most desperate actions. King Charles.

His passion cast a mist before his sense,
And either made or magnify'd th' offence. Dryden.

TO MIST.† v. a. [myrcan, Saxon.] To cloud; to cover with a vapour or steam.

Lead me a looking-glass;
If that her breath will mist or stain the stone,
Why then she lives. Shakspeare, K. Lear.
An ineffectual laziness is the seminary both of vice and infamy; it clouds the mental mind, it mists the wit, and chokes up all the sciences here below. Fielding, Ret. ii. 49.

MISTA'KABLE.† adj. [from mistake.] That may be mistaken; liable to be conceived wrong.

Places of Scripture explicable, or mistakeable by the enthusiast.

Hammond, Postser. is his N. Test. § 52.
It is not strange to see the difference of a third part in large accounts, if we consider how differently they are set forth in minor and less mistakeable numbers. Brown.

TO MISTA'KE. v. a. [mis and take.] To conceive wrong; to take something for that which it is not.

These did apprehend a great affinity between their invocation of saints and the heathen idolatry, or else there was no danger one should be mistaken for the other. Stillingfleet.
This will make the reader very much mistake and misunderstand his meaning. Locke.
Fancy passes for knowledge, and what is prettily said is mistaken for solid. Locke.

Food into the notion fall,
That vice or virtue there is none at all;
Ask your own heart, and nothing is so plain,
'Tis to mistake them costs the time and pain. Pope.

TO MISTA'KE. v. n. To err; not to judge right.

Seeing God found folly in his angels, men's judgments, which inhabit these houses of clay, cannot be without their mistakings.

Raleigh, Hist. of the World.
Seldom any one mistakes in his names of simple ideas, or applies the name red to the idea green. Locke.

Servants mistake, and sometimes occasion misunderstanding, among friends. Swift.

MISTA'EN. pret. and part. pas. of mistake for mistaken, and so retained in Scotland.

This dagger hath mista'en, for lo! the sheath Lies empty on the back of Mountague.
The point mistaken in my daughter's bosom. Shakspeare.

TO be MISTA'KEN. TO err. [To mistake

has a kind of reciprocal sense; I mistake, "je me trompe." I am mistaken, means I misconceive, I am in an error; more frequently than I am ill understood; but, my opinion is mistaken, means, my opinion is not rightly understood.]

The towns, neither of the one side nor the other, willingly opening their gates to strangers, nor strangers willingly entering, for fear of being mistaken. Sidney.

England is so idly king'd:
— You are too much mistaken in this king:
Question, your grace, the late ambassadors,
How modest in exception, and wihal
How terrible in constant resolution. Shakspeare, Hen. V.

Mistaken Brutus thought to break their yoke,
But cut the bond of union with that stroke. Waller.

MISTA'KE. n. s. [from the verb.] Misconception; error.

He never shall find out fit mate; but such As some misfortune brings him, or mistake. Milton, S. A.

And shew'd him how through error and mist- thought
Of our ill persons what to be disgul'd
Or his exchange or freedom might be wrought.

Spenser, F. Q. iv. viii. 58.
MISTILY. adv. [from misty.] Darkly;
obscurely; not plainly.

These philosophers speke so mistily,
In this craft, that men cannot come thereby.

Chaucer, Chan. Yeom. Tale.
TO MISTIME. v. a. [mist and time.] Not to time right; not to adapt properly with regard to time.

How often is a hasty and unguarded expression, an incautious and mistaken remark, or an inconsiderate and accidental trespass, aggravated and blown up into a lasting variance and hatred!

AWingback, Sermon. p. 63.
TO MISTIME. v. n. To neglect proper time.

Idleness; ill husbandry, in mistiming; neglect of meet helps. Seasonable Sermon. (1644), p. 25.

MISTINESS. n. s. [from misty.] Cloudiness; state of being overcast.

The speedy depredation of air upon watry moisture, and version of the same into air, ap-peareth in the sudden vanishing of vapours from glass, or the blade of a sword, such as doth not at all detain or imbibe the moisture, for the misti- ness scattereth immediately. Bacon, Nat. Hist.

MISTION. n. s. [mision, Fr. Cotgrave; from mistus, Latin.] The state of being mingled.

In animals many actions are mist, and depend upon their living form as well as that of mistion; and, though they wholly seem to retain unto the body, depart upon dissolution. Brown.

Both bodies do, by the new texture resulting from their mision, produce colour.

Boyle on Colours.
TO MISTLE. See TO MISTLE.
MISTLETOE. n. s. [mistletoe, Sax. mistel, Danish, birdlime, and tan, a twig.] A plant.

The flower of the mistletoe consists of one leaf, which is shaped like a bason, divided into four parts, and beset with warts; the ovary which is produced in the female flowers is placed in a remote part of the plant from the male flowers, and consists of four shorter leaves; this becomes a round berry, full of a glutinous substance, inclosing a plain heart-shaped seed; this plant is always produced from seed, and is not to be cultivated in the earth, but will always grow upon trees; from whence the ancients accounted it a super-plum, who thought it to be an excrescence on the tree without seed. The manner of its propagation is as follows: the mistle- toe thrush, which feeds upon the berries of this plant in winter when it is ripe, doth open the seed from tree to tree;
for the viscous part of the berry, which immediately surrounds the seed, doth sometimes fasten it to the outward part of the bird's beak, which, to get disengaged, it strikes his beak at the branches of a neighbouring tree, and so leaves the seed sticking by this viscous matter to the bark, which, if it lights upon a smooth part of the tree, will fasten itself, and the following winter put out and grow: the trees which this plant doth most readily take upon are the apple, the ash, and some other smooth rind trees; whenever a branch of an oak tree hath any of these plants growing upon it, it is cut off, and preserved by the curious in their collections of natural curiosities.

Miller.
If anyone do continue, sheepe hardly that fare
Crave mistle and ivie for them to spare.

Taster.
A barren and detested vale you see it is:
The trees, though summer, yet forlorn and lea-O'ercome with moss and baleful mistletoe. Shakspeare.
Mistletoe grows chiefly upon crab trees, apple trees, sometimes upon hawes, and rarely upon oaks; the substance whereof is counted very medicinal: it is ever green winter and summer, and beareth a white glistering berry; and it is a plant utterly differing from the plant upon which it grows.

Bacon.
All your temples strow
With laurel green, and sacred mistletoe.

Gay, Trivia.
MISTLIKE. adj. [mist and like.] Resembling a mist.

Good Romeo, hide thyself.
— Not I, unless the breath of heart-sick groans,
Mistlike, infold me from the search of eyes.

Shakespeare.
MISTLE'D. particip. pass. of mistle.
MISTO'OK. particip. pass. of mistake.

Look nymphs, and shepherds look,
What sudden blaze of majesty,
Too divine to be misto'ok. Milton, Arcades.

TO MISTRAIN. v. a. [mist and train.] To educate amiss.

For by the force is still to me detain'd,
And with corruptible helps is to untruth mis- train'd. Spenser, F. Q. v. li. 54.

TO MISTRANSLATE. v. a. [mist and trans- late.] To translate incorrectly.

Eunubus, by them mistranslated.
Bp. Hall, Hon. of the Marr. Clergy, p. 135.
They mistranslate the words.

Festus, Dippers Dict. p. 57.

The late queen's gentleness was a knight's daughter.

To be her mistress' mistress? the queen's queen.

Shakespeare.
Rome now is mistress of the whole world, sea and land, to either pole.

Dr. Johnson, Cato's.
Wonder not, sworn mistress / if perhaps Thou can'st, our art sole wonder; much less arm
Thy looks, the heaven of mildness, with disdain.

Milton, P. L.
Those who assert the lunar orb provides O'er humid bodies, and the ocean gives life!
Whose waves obsequious ebb, or swelling run
With the declining or increasing moon;
With reason seem her empire to maintain.

As mistress of the rivers and the main, Blind-moor.
What a miserable spectacle, for a nation that had been mistress at sea so long.

Arbuthnot on China.
2. A woman who hath something in possession.

There had she enjoy'd herself while she was mistress of herself, and had no other thoughts but such as might arise out of quiet sciences. Sidney.

Agree to come, that shall your bounty bear;
Will think you mistress of the Indies were;
Though straighter bounds your fortune did confine.

In your large heart was found a wealthy mine.

Shakespeare.

She turns, on hospitable thoughts intent;

What choice to choose for delicacy best,

What art, or contriv'd as not to mix

Tastes, nor well join'd, inebriate, but bring

Taste after taste, upheld with kindest change.

Milton, P. L.

To MIX. v. n.

1. To be united into one mass, not by junction of surfaces, but by mutual intermixture of parts.

But is there yet no other way, besides

These painful passages, how we may come

To death, and mix with our conatural dust?

Milton, P. L.

If spirits embrace,

Total they mix, union of pure with pure

Desiring; or restrain'd conveyance need

As flesh to mix with flesh, or soul with soul.

Milton, P. L.

2. To be joined, in a general sense.

The evil soon,

Driven back, redounded as a flood on those

From whom it sprung, impossible to mix

MIXTILINEAR. adj. [mixtus and linearis, Latin.] Consisting of a line, or lines, part straight, and part curved.

These three triangles are different from each other; the rectilinear CEs being less than the curved.

Newton, Principia.

misalliance CET. whose sides are the three increments above mentioned; and this still less than the triangle CET. Jp. Berkeley, Analyst, § 54.
MIXTION. n. s. [mixture, French; from miz.] Mixture; confusion of one thing with another.

Others perceiving this rule to fall short, have placed it out by the mixture of vacancy among bodies, believing it is that which makes one rarer than another.

They are not to lightly pass over as elementary or subterraneous mixtions. Brown.

MIXTLY. [from miz.] With coalition of different parts into one.

Not to proceed precisely, or merely, according to the laws and customs either of England or Scotland; but wisely, according to the instructions by your majesty to be set down, after the imitation and precedent of the council of the marches, here in England erected, upon the union of Wales. Bacon, Articles on the Union of Eng. and Scotland.

MIXTURE. † n. s. [mixture, old French; mistrura, Latin.]

1. The act of mixing; the state of being mixed.

O happy mixture, wherein things contrary do so qualify and correct the one the danger of the other's excess, that neither boldness can make us presume, as well as we are kept under with the sense of our own wretchedness; nor, while we trust in the mercy of our God, can we be proud. Shakespeare.
 These liquors are expelled out of the body which, by their mixture, convert the aliment into an animal liquid. Arbuthnot.

1. by lawful furies led,
 With monstrous mixture stain'd my mother's bed. Pope.

2. A mass formed by mingled ingredients. Come vial — What if this mixture do not work at all? Shakespeare.

While we live in this world, where good and bad men are blended together, and where there is also a mixture of good and evil wisely distributed by God, to serve the ends of his providence.

3. That which is added and mixed.

Neither can God himself be otherwise understood, than as a mixed free and disentangled from all corporeal mixtures, perceiving and moving all things. Billingfleet.

Cicero doubts whether it were possible for a community to exist, that had not a prevailing mixture of piety in its constitution.

MIZAZEE. † n. s. [A cant word, formed from maze by reduplication.] A maze; a labyrinth.

He hath walked us through the whole labyrinth and minner of this life, shewing us the knowledge of using it well. Harmer, Tr. of Deane, (1587), p. 68.
 Those who are accustomed to reason have got the true key of books, and the clue to lead them through the minner of variety of opinions and authors to truth. Locke.

MIZZEN. n. s. [Mezenen, Dutch.]

The mizzen is a mast in the stern or back part of a ship: in some large ships there are two such masts, that standing next the main mast is called the main mizzen, and the other near the poop the bonaventure mizzen: the length of a mizzen mast is half that of the main mast, or the same with that of the maintop mast from the quarterdeck, and the length of the mizzen topmast is half that.

A commander at sea had his leg fractured by the fall of his mizzen topmast. Wise, Surgeon.

To MIZZLE. v. n. To rain small rain. See TO MISLE, and MEAZLING.

Their ivory lutes lay by. Spenser.

With rubies and oxyces, with other things fair

For esteem and luncheon in plough for to go. Tasso.

MO. adv. Further; longer. Obsolete.

Sing no more duties, sing no mo

Of dumps so dull and heavy; Spenser.

The frauds of men were ever so,

Since summer was first leafy. Shakespeare.

TO MOAN. † v. a. [from manan, Saxon,] to grieve. Anciently written wane or men; like the Saxon original.] To lament; to deplore.

Edward sore it ment. R. of Brunne, p. 255.

Ye beauteous woods, ye colours, moan,

My dear Columbe dead and gone. Prior.

TO MOAN. † v. n. To grieve; to make lamentation. In the following passage from Shakespeare, the old copies read meane, the same as moan. See the etymology of the verb active.

Thus she moans:

Adeep, my love?

What, dead, my dove? Shaks. Mid. N. Dream.

The gen'rous hand redressive search'd

Into the horrors of the gloomy jail,

Unply'd and unheard, where misery mourns. Thomas.

MOAN. n. s. [from the verb.] Lamentation; audible sorrow; grief expressed in words or cries.

I have disabled mine estate,

By shewing something a more swelling port,

Than my faint means would grant continuance;

Nor do I now make moan to be abridg'd

From such a noble rate. Shakespeare, Merch. of Ven.

The fresh stream ran by her, and murmur'd her moan: Shakespeare.

The salt tears fell from her, and soften'd the stones fell. Shakespeare.

Sullen means,

Hot liver grows,

And cries of tortur'd ghoms. Pope, Ode St. Cecilia.

MO'ANFUL. adj. [moan and full.] Lamentable; expressing sorrow; exciting sorrow.

Look upon all the sad moanful objects in the world, betwixt whom all our compassion is wont to be divided. Hawesmond, Works, i. 240.

Do not grudge, or make moanful complaint.

Barnes, Sermon, on Acts, x. 42.

MO'ANFULLY. adv. [from moanful.] With lamentation.

Thy our poets are ever moanfully singing.

Barnes on Content. (ed. 1685), p. 135.

MOAT. n. s. [motte, French, a mound; mota, low Latin.] A canal of water round a house or castle for defence.

The castle I found of good strength, having a great moat round about it, the work of a noble gentleman, as witness untrifery son he had bought it. Sidney.

The fortress thrice himself in person storm'd;
 Your valour bravely did th' assault sustain,
 And fill'd the moats and ditches with the slain. Dryden.

No walls were yet, nor fence, nor moat, nor mound,
 Nor drum was heard. Dryden, Ovid.

TO MOAT. v. a. [motte, French, from the noun.] To surround with canals by way of defence.

I will presently to St. Luke's; there at the moated Grange resides this dejected Mariana. Shakespeare, Measure for Measure.

An arm of Lethe, with a gentle flow,

The palace moats, and e'er the palace creeps,

And with soft murmurs calls the coming sleep. Dryden.

He sees he can hardly approach greatness, but, as a seated castle, he must first pass the mud and filth with which it is encompassed. Dryden.

MOB. † n. s. [contracted from mobile, Lat.] Mr. Malone believes the word mobile to have been first introduced into the language about 1690, and to have been soon abbreviated into mob. T. Brown, he says, in 1690, uses both the Latin word at length, and the abbreviation; and in the preface to Cleomenes, two years afterwards, Dryden uses mob with a kind of apology. Note on Dryden's Pref. to Don Sebastian. Mobile, however, had certainly been in use long before 1690, as the examples from South and L'Estrange prove. The rabble which attended the partisans of the earl of Shaftesbury, at the latter end of Charles the Second's reign, are said by Mr. Tollet to have been first called "mobile vulgus," and afterwards by contraction the mob; and ever since the word mob has become proper English.]

The crowd; a tumultuous rout.

Parts of different species jumbled together, according to the mad imagination of the dabbler; a very monstrous in a Baribolowen-fair, for the mob to gaze at. Dryden.

Dreams are but interludes, which fancy makes, When monarch reason sleeps, this mimic wakes; Compounds a medley of disjointed things.

A court of robbers, and a mob of kings. Dryden.

A cluster of mobs were making themselves merry with their betters. Addison, Freethinker.

MOB. † n. s. [from mobile. Dr. Johnson. — Rather from the verb mob, of which Dr. Johnson has taken no notice in this sense.] A kind of female address for the head.

Kitty repeated without book the eight best lines in the play; went in our mob to the dumb man; told me my lover's name, &c. Addison, Spect. 325.

The ordinary morning between of ladies continued to be distinguished by the name of mob, to almost the end of the reign of George the Second.

Malone, Note on Hamlet.

In the counties of Essex and Middlesex, this morning cap has always been called a mob, and not a curl. Stevens, Note on Hamlet.

TO MOB. v. a. [adopted perhaps from mob, to dress carelessly; of which the etymology is uncertain.] To wrap up, as in a veil or cowl; hence the mob-cap of women.

Scourers of men that went gossiping up and down, telling odd stories to the people, as old wives and nurses do to children, having most of them chins so smooth as women's, and their faces mob'd in hoods and long coats like petticoats.

More on the Seven Churches, (1695), Pref. b. 2.

To MOB. v. a. [from the mob.] To harass or overbear by tumult.

Mo'raish.† adj. [from mob.] Mean; done after the manner of the mob.

This mobish act was thought an artifice of the albigens in the council of state.

Arceus's Regit. (1728), p. 52.

Mr. Fox treated the associations for prosecuting these libels, as tending to prevent the improvement of the human mind, and as a mobbish tyranny.

Burke, Ohs. on the Cond. of the Minority, (1790).

Mo'BY. n. s. An American drink made of potatoes.

Mo'BILE. n. s. [mobile, Latin.] The populace; the rout; the mob.

Long experience has found it true of the unthinking mobile, that the closer they shut their eyes the wider they open their hands. South, Sermon.
The mobile are uneasy without a ruler, they are restless with one. L'Esrange.

Mo'BLE.* adj. [mobile, French.] Movable. Obsolete.

To treat of any star
Fy't or else mob'd. Stilton, Poems, p. 156.

MOBILITÉ. n. s. [mobilité, French; mobilitas, Latin.]

1. Mobility is the power of being moved.

Locke.

A rod or bar of iron, having stood long in a window, or elsewhere, being taken and used by the help of a cork balanced in water, or in any other kind of liquid substance, where it may have a free mobility, will bewray a kind of unquietude.

Foster on Education.

The present age hath attempted perpetual motions, whose revolutions might out-last the exemplary mobility, and out-measure time itself.

Brown, Vulg. Err.

You tell, it is ingenuit, active force, Mobility, or native power to move

Words, which mean nothing. Blackmore.

2. Nimbleness; activity.

The Romans had the advantage by the bulk of their ships, and the fleet of Antiochus in the swiftness and mobility of theirs, which served them in great stead in the fight. Arbutnot.

3. [In cant language.] The populace.

She singled you out with her eye as commander in chief of the mobility. Dryden, Don Sebastian.

4. Fickleness; inconstancy. Ainsworth.

To Mo'BLE.† v. a. [sometimes written nable, perhaps by a ludicrous allusion to the French je m'habille. Dr. Johnson.—Or from the provincial word mob; and therefore perhaps to mob, a verb lithert overlooked.] To wrap up, as in a hood.
But who, ah woe! hath seen the mobbed queen,
Run barefoot out and down. Shakespeare, Hamlet.

The moon does subtle up herself.

Shirley, Gentleman of France.

Mo'CHO-STONE. n. s. [from Mocha, therefore more properly Mocha-stone.]

Mocha-stones are related to the agat, of a clear horny grey, with declinations representing mosses, shrubs, and branches, black, brown, red, in the substance of the stone.

Woodward.

To MOCK.† v. a. [moquer, French; mocio, Welsh; μαρτυρῶμαι, Greek.]

1. To mock; to laugh at; to ridicule.

All the regions
Do seemingly weep; and who resist
Are mock'd for valiant ignorance,
And perish constant fools. Shakespeare, Coriol.

Many thousands widows
Shall this his mock, mock-out of their dust hands;

Mock mothers from their sons, mock castles down. Shakespeare.

We'll dishonour the spirit,
And mock him home to his Windsor. Shakespeare.

I am as one mock'd of his neighbour; the just, upright man is mock'd to scorn. Job, xli. 4.

2. To deride by imitation; to mimic in contempt.

I long, till Edward fall by war's mischance,
For mocking marriage with a dame of France. Shakespeare.

3. To defeat; to elude.

My father is gone into his grave,
And with his spirit sadly I survive;
To mock the expectations of the world;
To frustrate prophecies, and to raise out Hotten opinion. Shakespeare, Hen. IV.

4. To fool; to tantalize; to play on contemptuously.

He will not
Mock us with his blest sight, thence snatch him
hence,

Soon we shall see our hope return. Milton, P. R.

Why do I overlive?
Why am I mock'd with death, and lengthen'd out
To dwellish pain? Milton, P. R.

Heav'n's fuller influence mocks our dazzl'd sight,
Too great its brightness, and too strong its light.

To MOCK. v. n. To make contemptuous sport.

Pluck down my officers, break my decrees;
For now a time is come to mock at form.

Shakespeare.

A stallion horse is as a mocking friend; he neigheth under every one.

When thou mockest, shall no man make thee madness? Job.

Mock. n. s. [from the verb.]

1. Ridicule; act of contempt; sneer; gibe; flirt.

Tell the pleasant prince this mock of his Hath turn'd his balls to gun-stones. Shakespeare, Hen. V.

Oh, 'tis the spite of hell, the fiend's arch mock,
To lip a wanton, and suppose her chaste. Shakespeare.

Fools make a mock at sin. Prov. xiv. 6.

What shall be the portion of those who have affronted God, derided his word, and made a mock of every thing that is sacred?

Colin makes mock at all her piteous smart,
A lass that Clit'ly light, had won his heart. Gay.

2. Imitation; mimicry.

New reach a strain, my lute,
Above her mock, or be lost ever mute. Cranham.

Mock. adj. False; counterfeit; not real.

Hulstet.

MO'DAL. adj. [modale, French; modalis, Latin.] Relating to the form or mode, not the essence.

When we speak of modality of the soul, we assert not with the schools their real distinction from it, but only a modal diversity.

Glasville, Scipio.

MODALITY. n. s. [from modal.] Accidental difference; modal accident.

The motions of the mouth, by which the voice is discriminated, are the natural elements of speech; and the application of them in their several compositions, or words made of them, to signify things, or the modalities of things, and so to serve for communication of notions, is artificial. Holder.

MODDER.* n. s. [moer, Danish, a girl; modder, modderken, Teut. the same. See MAUTHER.] A wench, or girl. Hu- loet, and Sherwood. Yet used in some counties: as in Norfolk and Suffolk, according to Grose; and also applied, he says, to some female animals.

MODE.† n. s. [mode, French; modus, Lat.] This word seems to have been little used before the middle of the seventeenth century. For P. Heylin calls it, in 1656, new and uncouth.]

1. External variety; accidental discrimination; accident.

A mode is that which cannot subsist in and of itself, but is always esteemed as belonging to and subsisting by, the help of some substance, which, for that reason, is called its subject. Watts, Logic.

Few allow mode to be called a being in the same perfect sense as a substance is, and some modi have evidently more of real entity than others. Watts, Logic.

2. Gradation; degree.

What shades of light betwixt each wide extreme, The mole's dim curtain, and the linx's beam; Of smell, the headlong fumes between, And bound sagacious, on the tainted green. Pope.

3. Manner; method; form; fashion.

Our Saviour behest
A table richly spread in regal mode,
With dishes pitiful. Milton, P. R.

The duty itself being removed upon, the mode of doing it may easily be found.

Bp. Taylor, Guide to a Penitent.

4. State; quality.

My death
Changes the mode for what in life was purchas'd, Falls upon thee in a much fairer sort,
For thou the garland wear'st successively. Shakep.

5. Fashion; custom.

There are certain garbs and modes of speaking, which vary with the times, the fashion of our clothes being not more subject to alteration than that of our speech. Dreikam.

We are to prefer the blessings of Providence before the splendid curiosities of mode and imagination.

L'Etranger.

They were invited from all parts; and the favour of learning was the humour and mode of the age.

Temple.

As we see on coins the different faces of persons, we see too their different habits and dresses, according to the mode that prevailed.

Monte.

Though wrong the mode, comply; more sense is shewn

In wearing others' follies than your own. Young.

If faith itself has different dresses worn,
What wonder modis in wit should take their turn? Pope.

6. A kind of thin silk, worn by ladies.

MODEL. n. s. [modelle, French; modulus, Latin.]

1. A representation in little of something made or done.

I'll draw the form and model of our battle;
Limit each leader to his several charge,
And part in just proportion our small strength. Shakepeare.

You have the models of several ancient temples, though the temples and the gods are perished. Addison.

2. A copy to be imitated.

A fault it would be if some king should build his mansion-house by the model of Solomon's palace.

Hosier.

They cannot see sin in those means they use, with intent to reform to their models what they call religion. King Charles.

3. A mould; any thing which shows or gives the shape of that which it incloses.

Nothing can we call our own but death;
And that small model of the barren earth,
Which serves as paste and cover to our bones. Shakespeare, Rich. II.

4. Standard; that by which any thing is measured.

As he who presumes steps into the throne of God, so he that despairs measures Providence by his own little contracted model. South.

5. In Shakespeare it seems to have two unexampled senses. Something representative.

I have commended to his goodness
The model of our chaste loves, his young daughter. Shakespeare.

6. Something small and diminutive; for module, a small measure; which, perhaps, is likewise the meaning of the example affixed to the third sense.

England! model to thy inward greatness,
Like little body with a mighty heart. Shakespeare.

To MODEL. v. a. [modeller, French.] To plan; to shape; to mould; to form; to delineate.

When they come to model heaven
And calculate the stars, how they will wield
The mighty frame. Milton, P. L.

The government is modelled after the same manner with that of the Cantons, as much as so small a community can imitate those of so large an extent. Addison on Italy.

Mo'DELLER. n. s. [from model.] Planner; schemer; contriver.

Our great modellers of gardens have their magazines of plants to dispose of. Spectator.

Mo'DERABLE.* adj. [from moderabilis, Latin.] Temperate; measurable; governable. Not now in use. Cockeram.

Mo'DERATE. adj. [moderatus, Latin; modéré, French.]

1. Temperate; not excessive.

Sound sleep cometh of moderate eating, but pangs of the belly are with an insatiable man. Ecclesi. xxxi. 30.

2. Not hot of temper.

A number of moderate members managed with so much art as to obtain a majority, in a thin house, for passing a vote, that the king's concessions were a ground for a future settlement. Swift.

Fix'd to one part, but moderate to the rest. Pope.

3. Not luxurious; not expensive.

There's not so much left as to furnish out
A moderate table. Shakespeare, Timon.

4. Not extreme in opinion; not sanguine in a tenet.

These are tenets which the moderated of the Romanists will not venture to affirm. Swadbridge.

5. Placed between extremes; holding the mean.

Quietly consider the trial that hath been thus long had of both kinds of reformation; as well this moderate kind, which the church of England hath taken, as that other more extreme and rigorous, which certain churches elsewhere have better liked. Holier.

6. Of the middle rate.

More moderate gifts might have prolong'd his date,
Too early fitted for a better state. Dryden.

To Mo'DERATE.† v. a. [moderor, Latin; moderer, French.]

1. To regulate; to restrain; to still; to pacify; to quiet; to repress.

With equal measures she did regulate

Note in Bp. Butler's Rem. (1695), p. 567.

Mo'DERATELY.* adv. [from moderate.]

1. Temperately; mildly.

All persons having just cause of sickness, or other necessity, or being licensed by the king's majesty, may moderately eat all kinds of meats, without grudge or scruple of conscience.

Visitation Articles of K. Edw. VI.

2. In a middle degree.

Each nymph but moderately fair,
Commands with no less rigor here. Walker.
Blood in a healthy state, when let out, its red part should congeal strongly and soon, in a man moderately tough, and swim in the serum.

Arbuthnot on Aliments.

Mo'DERATENESS. n. s. [from moderate.]

State of being moderate; temperateness. Moderateness is commonly used of things, and moderation of persons.

Mo'DERATION.* n. s. [moderatio, Latin.]

1. Forbearance of extremity; the contrary temper to party violence; state of keeping a due mean betwixt extremes.

Was it the purpose of these churches, which abolished all popish ceremonies, to come back again to the middle point of evenness and moderation? Holier.

A zeal in things pertaining to God, according to knowledge, and yet duly tempered with candour and prudence, is the true notion of that much talked of, much misunderstood virtue, moderation. Atterbury.

In moderation placing all my glory,
While tories call me whigs, and whigs a tory. Pope.

2. Calmness of mind; equanimity. (moderation, Fr. Dr. Johnson.—Moderation is not derived from the word medium, but from modus; and that from the Hebrew madad, he measured; or moderation, a rule or measure; and in the Greek is styled μετρίτης, from μετρον, a measure: whence it is evident, that moderation, properly so called, and in the moral sense of the word, belongs only to things in which we are subject to a vicious excess; or to act beyond that rule or measure, which Scripture, or religion, doth prescribe for the due regulation of our actions and passions; and it respects first and principally the government of our passions; whence the due government of them is by philosophers styled μετρώσιμος, the moderation of our passions. Whately, Paraphr. on the N. Test. Phil. iv. 5.]

Let your moderation [in old translations, softness, modesty, patience, gentleness,] be known unto all men. Phil. iv. 5.

Equally inur'd

By moderation either state to bear, Prosperous, or adverse. Milton, P. L.

3. Frugality in expense. Ainsworth.

MODERATOR.† n. s. [moderator, Latin; modérateur, French.]

1. The person or thing that calms or restrains.

Hope, that sweet moderator of passions, as Simonides calls it. Burton, Anat. of Mel. p. 64.

Angling was, after tedious study, a calmer of unquiet thoughts, a moderator of passions, and a procurer of contentedness. Walton, Angler.

2. One who presides in a disputation, to restrain the contending parties from indecency, and confine them to the question.

Sometimes the moderator is more troublesome than the actor. Bacon, Essays.

How does Philopollis seasonably commit the opponent with the respondent, like a long-petioled moderator?

The first person who speaks when the court is set, opens the case to the judge, chairman, or moderator of the assembly, and gives his own reasons for his opinion. Watts.

MODERN. adj. [moderne, French; from modernus, low Latin; supposed a casual corruption of hodiernus. "Vel potius ab adverbio modo modernus, ut a die diurnus. Ainsworth."]

1. Late; recent; not ancient; not antique. Some of the ancient, and likewise divers of the modern writers, that have laboured in natural magic, have noted a sympathy between the sun and certain herbs. Bacon.

The glorious parallels then downward bring To modern wonders, and to Britain's king. Prior.

2. In Shakespeare, vulgar; mean; common. Trifles, such as we present modern friends withal. Shakespeare.

The justice
With eyes severe and beard of formal cut,
Full of wise saws and modern instances. Shakspeare.

We have our philosophical persons to make modern and familiar things supernatural and causeless. Shakspeare.

MODERNLY.† n. s. Those who have lived lately, opposed to the ancients. Dr. Johnson has given no example of the substantive modern in the singular number; but this use of it now is not uncommon.

There are moderns who, with a slight variation, adopt the opinion of Plato. Boyle on Colours.

Some by old words to fancy have made pretence; Ancients in phrase, were moderns in their sense! Pope.

In the country, as a great modern observes, small matters serve for amusement.

Green, Spirit. Quire, B. 2. ch. 10.

To MODERNISE.† v. a. [from modern.] To adapt ancient compositions to modern persons or things; to change ancient to modern language.

Another copy of this poem, but greatly altered and somewhat modernized, is preserved in the Advocates' Library at Edinburgh.

Ep. Percy, Ess. on the Art. Metrical Romances. He modernized the more ancient narratives of the miracles and martyrdoms of the most eminent eastern and western saints.

Warton, Hist. E. P. ii. 191.

MODERNISER.† n. s. [from modernise.] One who adapts ancient compositions to modern persons or things.

Mr. Neville, no unsuccessful moderniser of the Latin satyrists.

MODERNISM. n. s. [from modern.] Deviation from the ancient and classical manner. A word invented by Swift.

Scribblers send us over their trash in prose and verse, with abominable curtailings and quaint modernisms. Swift.

MODERNIST.† n. s. [from modernism.] One who admires the moderns.

The base, detracting world would not have then dared to report, that Wottoo's brain had undergone an unlucky shake, which even his brother modernists themselves, like uogates, do whisper so loud, that it reacheth up to the very garret I am now writing in. Swift, Trist. of a Turk, 4.

MODERNNESS. n. s. [from modern.] Novelty.

MOD'EST.† adj. [modeste, Fr. modestus, Lat.]

1. Not arrogant; not presumptuous; not boastful; bashful.

Antiochus — wept, because of the sober and modest behaviour of him that was dead.

Your temper is too modest,
Too much inclin'd to contemplation. 2 Mac. iv. 37.

Beaum. and Fl. Pelgrim.

Of boasting more than of a tomb afraid;
A soldier should be modest as a maid. Young.

2. Not impudent; not forward.

Resolve me with all modest haste, which way Thou might'st deserve, or they impose this usage. Shakspeare.

Her face, as in a nymph display'd
A fair fierce boy, or in a boy betray'd
The blushing beauties of a modest maid. Dryden, Ovid.

3. Not loose; not unchaste; decent.

Mrs. Ford, the honest woman, the modest wife, the virtuous creature, that hath the jealous fool to her husband. Shakspeare.

That women adorn themselves in modest apparel. 4 Tim. ii. 9.

4. Not excessive; not extreme; moderate; within a mean.

There appears much joy in him, even so much that joy could not show itself modest enough without a badge of bitterness. Shakspeare.

During the last four years, by a modest computation, there have been brought into Great Britain six millions sterling in bullion. Addison.

MOD'ESTLY.† adv. [from modest.]

1. Not arrogantly; not presumptuously. I may modestly conclude, that whatever errors there is in this play, there are not those which have been objected to it.

Dryden, Don Sebastian.

Tho' learn'd, well-bred; and tho' well-bred, sincere,
Modestly bold, and humbly severe. Pope.

First be modestly conjectures,
His pupil might be wick'd with lectures;
Which help'd to mortify his pride,
Yet gave him not the heart to chide. Swift.

2. Not impudently; not forwardly; with respect.

I, your glass,
Will modestly discover to yourself
That of yourself, which yet you know not of. Shakspeare.

3. Not loosely; not lowly; with decency.

4. Not excessively; with moderation. To proceed modestly, is also an honourable quality in him that conspires to moderate his fortunes, who doth hardly refrain covetous and proud desires; yea, some good and great captains have, in like cases, forgotten what did best become them. Raleigh, Art of Empire, ch. 25.

MOD'ESTY. n. s. [modestie, Fr. modestus, Lat.]

1. Not arrogance; not presumptuousness. They cannot, with modesty, think to have found out absolutely the best which the wit of men may devise.

2. Not impudence; not forwardness; as, his petition was urged with modesty.

3. Moderation; decency.

A lord will hear you play;
But I am doubtful of your modesty,
Lest over-eying of his odd behaviour,
You break into some merry passion. Shakspeare.

4. Chastity; purity of manners.

Would you not swear,
All you that see her, that she were a maid,
By these exterior shows? But she is more,
Her blush is guiltiness, not modesty. Shakspeare.

Of the general character of women, which is modesty, he has taken a most becoming care; for his amorous expressions go no farther than virtus may allow.

Talk not to a lady in a way that modesty will not permit her to answer. Richardson, Clarissa.

MOD'ESTY-PIECE. n. s.

A narrow lace which runs along the upper part of the stays before, being a part of the tucker, is called the modesty-piece. Addison, Guardian.

MODI'ATION.† n. s. [modiatio, Lat.] A measure. Not in use.

That they should be free, throughout England and Normandy, of all customs, tolls, and modiatio of wine. Trenchard, Anglo-Jud. p. 65.

Cotgrave, and Sherwood.

MOD'ICUM. n. s. [Latin.] Small portion; pittance.

What modicums of wit he utters: his evasions have ears thus long. Shakspeare, Tit. and Cress.

Though hard their fate,
A cruise of water, and an ear of corn,
Yet still they grudge'd that modicum. Dryden.

MODIFI'ABLE.† adj. [modifiable, Fr. Cotgrave.] That may be diversified by accidental differences.

It appears to be more difficult to conceive a distinct, visible image in the uniform, invariable, essence of God, than in variously modifiable matter; but the manner how I see either still escapes my comprehension. Locke.

MODIFI'FABLE. adj. [from modify.] Divertible by various modes.

To MODU'FICATE.† v. a. [from modify.] To qualify.

The kingdoms of this world are become the kingdoms of the Lord, and of his Christ, and he shall reign for ever and ever, not only to the modified eternity of his lordship, so long as there shall be need of regal power to subdue the enemies of God's elect; but also to the complete eternity of the duration of his humanity, which for the future is co-eternal to his divinity.

Pearson on the Creed, Art. 6.

MODIFICATION. n. s. [modification, Fr.]

The act of modifying any thing, or giving it new accidental differences of external qualities or mode.

The chief of all signs is human voice, and the several modifications thereof by the organs of speech, the letters of the alphabet, formed by the motions of the mouth.

The phenomena of colours in refracted or reflected light, are not caused by new modifications of the light variously impressed, according to the various terminations of the light and shadow.

Newton, Opticks.
If these powers of cogitation, volition and sensation, are neither inherent in matter as such, nor acquirable to matter by any motion and modification of it, it necessarily follows that they proceed from some cogitative substance, some incorporeal inhabitant within us, which we call spirit. Beaumont.

To MODIFY. v. a. [modifier, Fr.]

1. To change the external qualities or accidents of any thing; to shape.

Yet there is that property in all letters, of aptness to be confounded in syllables and words through the voluble motions of the organs that they modify and discriminate the voice without appearing to discontinue it.

Holder.
The middle parts of the broad beam of white light which fell upon the paper, did, without any confine of shadow to modify it, become coloured all over with one uniform colour, the colour being always the same in the middle of the paper as at the edges. Newton, Opticks.

2. To soften; to moderate; to qualify.

A king after the rule is holds
To modify, and to address,
His yfices upon such largesse,
That he measure might exceed.

Greene, Conf. Am. B. 7.

He modifies his first severe decree,
The keener edge of battle to rebate. Dryden.

To MODIFY. v. n. To extenuate.

After this dissenting and modifying upon the matter, there is hazard on the yielding side.

L. Extraneous.

MODILLON. n. s. [French; modiglione, Ital. modulus, Lat.]

Modillions, in architecture, are little brackets which are often set under the Corinthian and composite orders, and serve to support the projecture of the frieze or drip: this part must be distinguished from the great model, which is the diameter of the pillar; for, as the proportion of an edifice in general depends on the diameter of the pillar, so the size and number of the modillions, no also the interval between them, ought to have due relation to the whole fabric.

Harris.

The modillions or dentelli make a noble show by their graceful projection. Spectator.
The entablature, and all its parts and ornaments, architrave, frieze, cornice, triglyph, metopes, modillions, and the rest, have each an use.

Dr. Warton, Essay on Pope.

MODISH. adj. [from mode. The vulgar use of modish has, I suppose, disgraced it. It would not, now, be endured in polite conversation, much less in polite writing. Bp. Hurd.] Fashionable; formed according to the reigning custom.

VOL. II.

For clothes, I leave them to the discretion of the mob, whether of our own or the French nation. Phillips, Theat. Pictorum, (1675.) Pref.
But you, perhaps, expect a modish feast,
With various songs, and wanton dances grac'd.

Congreve, Jun.
Hypocrity, at the fashionable end of the town, is very different from hypocrisy in the city; the modish hypocrite endeavours to appear more virtuous than he really is, the other kind of hypocrite more virtuous.

MODISHLY. adv. [from modish.] Fashionably.

Young children should not be much perplexed about putting off their hats, and making immodest looks.

MODISHNESS. n. s. [from modish.] Affectation of the fashion.

They scoff at the profession of it, out of modishness, and a burlesque imitation.

Glanville, Sermon, (1681.) p. 216.

To MODULATE. v. a. [modular, Lat.]

To form sound to a certain key, or to certain notes.

The nose, lips, teeth, palate, jaw, tongue, throat, lungs, muscles of the chest, diaphragm, and muscles of the belly, all serve to make or modulate the sound.

Could any person so modulate her voice as to deceive us many?

Each charm of modulated sound.

MODULATION. n. s. [from modulate; modulation, French.]

1. The act of forming any thing to certain proportion.

The more serene they approached to that temperance and subtle modulation, of the subtle superior bodies, the more perfect and commendable is their dancing.

The number of the simple original mixtures have not been rightly fixt: the matter of two or more kinds being mixed together, and by the different proportion and modulation of that matter variously diversified, have been reputed all different kinds.

The speech, as it is a sound resulting from the modulation of the air, has most affinity to the spirit, but, as it is uttered by the tongue, has immediate connection with the body, and so is the fittest instrument to manage a connection between the invisible powers of human souls clothed in flesh.

2. Sound modulated; harmony; melody.

Innumerable songsters, in the freshening shade, their melodious notes, mellifluous.

MODULATOR. n. s. [from modulate.] He who forms sound to a certain key; a tuner; that which modulates.

It [Poetry] is a most musical modulation of all intelligibles by her inventive variations.

The tongue is the grand instrument of taste, the faithful judge of all our communications, the useful modulator of our voice, and the necessary servant of mastication.

MODULUS. n. s. [modulus, Fr. cotgrave; modulus, Latin.] An empty representation; a model; an external form.

My heart hath one poor string to stay it by,
Which holds but till thy news be uttered;
And then, all this thou seest, it is but a cloud,
And modula of confounded royalty.

The modula of Minerva's temple is her own city.

Dr. Bernard to Dr. Pococke, Pococke on Hist. (1685.)

To MODULUS. v. a. [modular, Latin.]

1. To model; to shape; to mould.

O, would I could my father's cunning use,
And souls into well mould'd clay infuse.

2. To modulate. Both obsolete.

The nightingales, — that charmer of the night,
That modulate her tunes so admirably rare.

MO'DUS. n. s. [Latin.] Something paid as a compensation for tithes on the supposition of being a moderate equivalent.

MOGUL. n. s. [from Tamerlane, the Mengul or Mogul Tartar.] The title of the emperor of Hindostan, who was called the great Mogul.

The dastar or walli
Of Camblus, son of Cathian Can,
And Samarchand by Orus, Temir's throne,
To Paygun of Sinan kings; and thence To Agn and Lohar of great Mogul,
Down to the golden Chacraene.

MOHATRA. n. s. [mohtaire, French; an oriental voice mohtaire, species camelot.

Skinner.] Thread or stuff made of camels or other hair.

She, while her liver pants upon her breast,
Can mark the figures on an Indian chest,
And when she sees her friend in deep despair,
Observes how much a chintz exceeds malair.

MO'HOKE. n. s. The name of a cruel nation of America given to ruffians who infested, or rather were imagined to infest, the streets of London.

Dr. Johnson. — Rather perhaps from those who run a-muck. See To run a muck in the third sense of the substantive MUCK.

In your speculation of Wednesday last, you have given us some account of that worthy society of brutes, the mohtaks, wherein you have particularly specified the ingenious performances of the lion-tippers, the dancing-masters, and the tumblers!

Who has not trembled at the mohtak's name?

Thou hast fallen upon me with the rage of a mad dog, or a mohtak.

MOHA'MMEDAN. See MAHOMEDAN.

To MOIDER. v. a. [perhaps from the Teut. moede, weiden, moeden, to tire out, as Dr. Jamieson observes; agreeing with the sense of moither, another form of moider. To puzzle; to perplex. So used in the north of England. In some parts of England, as in Gloucestershire and Shropshire, the word is moither, or moither; and means to confound; to tire out; to distract.

What if you and I Nick should enquire how money-matters stand between us? Arbutnot, Hist. of J. Bull.

MO'NEYSCRIVENER. n. s. [money and scrivener.] One who raises money for others.

Suppose a young unexperienced man in the lands of money-scriveners; such fellows are like your Wire-drawing mills, if they get hold of a man's finger, they will pull in his whole body at last. Arbutnot, Hist. of J. Bull.

MO'NEYSPINNER. n. s. A small spider, vulgarly so called; and fancifully held to prognosticate the receipt of money, or good luck, to those on whom they are seen to crawl.

MO'NEYWORTH. n. s. [money and worth.] Something valuable; something that will bring money.

There is either money or moneyworth in all the controversy of life; for we live in a mercenary world, and it is the price of all things in it.

L'Extrême.

MO'NEYWORD. n. s. A plant.

MO'NEOCORN. n. s. [mang, Sax. and corn.] Mixed corn; as, wheat and rye; miscellane, or maslin.

From off the mangercorn-beep. Byr, Hall, Sat. B. 5. S. 2.

MO'NGER. † n. s. [mangege, monger, Sax. a trader, from mangian, to trade.] A dealer; a seller. It is seldom or never used alone, or otherwise than after the name of any commodity to express a seller of that commodity; as, a fish-monger; and sometimes a medler in any thing; as, a whoremonger; a newsmonger. Dr. Johnson. — I've makes a similar remark, overpassing the use of monger by itself, which Wicliffe, I think, somewhere uses in the good sense of a trader, or merchant; and which Ben Jonson certainly employs in the contemptuous meaning of a low trader.

Here was no subtle device to get a wench! This Chanon has a brave paste of his own, A shaven pate! and a right monger, y'faith! This was his plot! B. Jonson, Tale of a Tub.

Do you know me? — Yes, excellent well, you are a fish-monger. Shakespeare.

The impatient station-monger
Could not contain himself no longer. Hudibras.

MO'NGREL† adj. [as mongera, from mang, Saxon, or mengen, to mix, Germ.] Of a mixed breed; commonly written mungrel for mangrel.

There is a mangrel dulcet, composed of Italian and French, and some Spanish words are also in it; which they call Franco. Hovell, Instruct. For Trav. (1642) p. 139.

This zealot
Is of a mangrel, divers kind,
Clerk before, and lay behind. Hudibras.

Ye mangrel work of heaven, with human shapes,
That have but just enough of sense to know
The master's voice. Dryden, Don Sebastian.

I've but a half-strain'd villain yet,
But mangrel mischiefous. Dryden.

His friendship still to few confin'd,
Were always of the middling kind,
Who fain would pass for lords indeed,
Who fain would pass for lords indeed. Swift, Miscell.

MO'SGREL* n. s. Any thing of mixed breed.

His two faculties of serving-man and solicitor should compound into one mongrel. Milton, Colasterion.

Base, grovelling, worthless wretches;
Mongrels in faction; poor faint-hearted traitors. Addison.

MO'SIED* See MONEYED.

MO'SIMENT† n. s. [monimento, Ital. monimentum, or monumentum, Latin, from monere.]

1. A memorial; a record.
That as a sacred symbol he may dwell
In her son's flesh, to mind revengement,
And be for all chase dames an endless moniment. Spenser, F. Q. ii. li. 10.

2. A mark; a superscription; an image.
Some others were new driven, and discent into great ingoes, and to wedges square;
Some in round plates withouten moniment. Spenser, F. Q. ii. li. 5.

MO'SNISH† v. a. [monere, Latin; a contraction of admonish. Dr. Johnson.] It is not a contraction, but the Saxon verb monian, monian; and is old in our language; probably in use before admonish. It was written also unofest, as well as monish. To warn; to counsel; to admonish.

For I you praise and chee moneste, Nought to refrain our requests. Chaucer, Rom. R. 3279.

Now worthy women, in this balde short,—
Of charity I moneste and exhort. Chaucer, Compl. of Crest. 135.

Monish him gently, which shall make him both willing to ascend, and glad to go forward in love. Achens, Schoolmaster.

Here are all degrees to be monished. Hovell, Instruct. For Trav.

MO'SNISH* n. s. [from monish.] An admonisher; a monitor.

MO'SNISHMENT* n. s. [from monish.] Admonishment; counsel given. Sherwood.

MO'STROUS* n. s. [monitus, Latin; monition, Fr.].

1. Information; hint.
We have no visible monition of the returns of any other periods, such as we have of the day, by successive light and darkness. Holder on Time.

2. Instruction; document.

Unruly ambition is deaf, not only to the advice of friends, but to the counsels and monitions of reason itself. J. Strange.

Then after sage monitions from his friends,
His talents to employ for nobler ends,
He turns to politics his dangerous wit. Swift.

MO'SNITIVE* adj. [monitus, Lat.] Instruction-monitor; conveying useful instruction.

These evils are exemplary and monitive. Barrow, vol. ii. S. 12.

MO'SITOR* n. s. [Latin.] One who warns of faults, or informs of duty; one who gives useful hints. It is used of an upper scholar in a school commissioned by the master to look to the boys in his absence.

You are safe to be a monitor to the king; his learning is eminent; he but his scholar, and you are need. Bacon.

It was the privilege of Adam innocent to have those notions also firm and untainted, to carry his monitor in his bosom, his law in his heart, and to have such a conscience as might be its own casuist. South, Sermon.

We can but divine who it is that speaks;
whether Persius himself or his friend and monitor,
or a third person. Dryden.

The pains that come from the necessities of nature, are monitors to us to beware of greater mischiefs. Locke.

MO'SITORY adj. [monitoire, Fr. monitarius, Lat.] Conveying useful instruction;
giving admonition.

Losses, miscarriages, and disappointments, are monitory and instructive. J. Strange.

He is so taken up still, in spite of the monitory hint in my essay, with particular men, that he neglects mankind. Pope.

MO'SITORY* n. s. Admonition; warning.
A king of Hungary took a bishop in battle, and kept him prisoner; whereupon the pope wrote a monitory to him, for that he had broken the privilege of holy church. Bacon.

MO'SITRESS* n. s. [from monitor.] A female monitor; an instructress.

Thus far our pretty and ingenious monitress; were I to say any thing after her, my case would be that of the direst actor. Student, ii. 367.

MONK* n. s. [munch, Su. Goth. monac, Saxon; monachus, Latin; μοναχός.] One of a religious community bound by vows to certain observances.

'Twould prove the verity of certain words,
Spoke by a holy monk. Shakespeare, Hen. VIII.

Abemacketh, an old weary of the world, gave over all, and betook himself to a solitary life, and became a melancholy Mahometan monk. Kneller, Hist. of the Turks.

The dromish monks, the scorn and shame of manhood. *Rouse and prepare one more to take possession,
And needs in their ancient lives again. Rouse.*

Monks in some respects, agree with regulars, as in the substantial vows of religion; but in other respects monks are regulars differ; for that regulars' vows excepted, are not tied up to so strict a rule of life as monks are. Ayliffe, Parerg.

MO'SKEY* n. s. [Dr. Johnson considers the word as monikin, a little man. Pennant derives it from monca, a name which the Malayes give to a particular species of the animal among them. Monicchio for a monkey is old in the Italian language.]

1. An ape; a baboon; a jackanapes. An animal bearing some resemblance of man.

One of them showed me a ring that he had of your daughter for a monkey. Tulal, it was my turquoise; I would not have given it for a wilderness of monkeys. Shakespeare.

More new-fangled than an ape; more giddy in my desires than a monkey. Shakespeare, As you like it.

Other creatures, as well as monkeys, destroy their young ones by senseless fondness. Locke on Education.

With glittering gold and sparkling gems they shine, Bos apes and monkeys are the gods within. Geniville.

2. A word of contempt, or slight kindness. Geniville.

This is the monkey's own giving out; she is persuaded I will marry her. Shakespeare, Othello.

Four monkey! how wilt thou do for a father?
Shakespeare.

MO'SKEYRY* n. s. [from monk.] The monastic life.

Heresy in Britain smiteth of monks. Bale, Acts of Eng. Vol. P. i. fol. 19.

Monks then were as far distant from those of our days, as the moon is distant from the earth.
Herman, Tr. of Bruns. (1587) p. 316.

Vows of chastity, monks, and a soldier's life. Barton, Anal. of Med. p. 657.

Neither do I meddle with their evangelical perfection of vows, nor the dangerous servitude of their rash and impetuous votaries, nor the inconveniences of their monks. Sp. Hall.

MO'SKHOOD* n. s. [monk and hood.] The character of a monk.

He had left off his monks hood too, and was no longer obliged to them. Atterbury.

MO'SKISH adj. [from monk.] Monastic; pertaining to monks; taught by monks.

Those public charities are a greater ornament to this city than all its wealth, and do more real honour to the reformed religion, than redounds to the church of Rome from all those monks and superstitious foundations of which she vainly boasts. Atterbury.

Rise, rise, Roscommon, see the Blenheim muse, The dull constraint of monkish rhyme refuse.

MONKS-HOOD* n. s. [consolida regalis.] Smith.
A plant. Ainsworth.

MONKS-RICHARD* n. s. A species of dock; its roots are used in medicine.

MO'SCEROS* n. s. [μοσχος, single, and MO'SCEROT.] μοσχος, horn, Gr.] The unicorn.

Jacob de Doudin, in his catalogue of simples, hath ambergreen, the bone in a stag's heart,
monscer's horn. Barton, Anal. of Med. p. 376.

MO'SCHOIRD* n. s. [μοσχος and χορδ.]
1. An instrument of one string; as, the trumpet marine. Harris.

2. A kind of instrument anciently of singular use for the regulating of sounds;
the ancients made use of it to determine the proportion of sounds to one another. When the chord was divided into two equal parts, so that the terms were as one to one, they called them unisons; but if as two to one, they called them octaves or diapasons; when they were as three to two, they called them fifths or diapentes; if they were as four to three, they called them fourths or diatessérons; if as five to four, they called it diton, or a tierce major; but if as six to five, then they called it a demi-diton, or a tierce minor;

and, lastly, if the terms were as twenty-four to twenty-five, they called it a demition or diezze; the monochord being thus divided, was properly that which they called a system, of which there were many kinds, according to the different divisions of the monochord.

Harris.

MONOCULAR. } adj. [μῑνός; and oculus.]
MONOCULOUS. } One-eyed; having only one eye.

He was well served who, going to cut down an ancient wide hawthorn tree, which, because she basked before others, might be an occasion of superstition, had some of the prickles flew into his eyes, and made him monocular.

Hawell.

Those of China repute the rest of the world monoculars.

Glanville, Scrymgeour.

MONODY. n. s. [μονωδία, Gr. monodie, Fr.]

A poem sung by one person, not in dialogue. Dr. Johnson. — Of this usage Dr. Johnson gives no example. Our old lexicography calls a monody, "a mournful song." Cockerham. This is the sense of the word among the ancients: a ditty sung by the person alone, to vent his grief. Among the French it obtained the distinction of "chant lugubre d'église, qui est toujours sur le même ton." Lacombe.

It is called a monody from a Greek word signifying a mournful or funeral song sung by a single person.

By. Newton, Note on Milton's Lycidas.

MONOGAMIST. n. s. [μῑνός; and γάμος; monogame, Fr.] One who disallows second marriages.

I maintained with Whiston, that it was unlawful for a priest of the church of England, after the death of his first wife, to take a second; or, to express it in one word, I valued myself upon being a strict monogamist.

Goldsmith, Pic. of Walsley, ch. 2.

MONOGAMY. n. s. [monogamie, Fr. μῑνός, and γάμος, Gr.] Marriage of one wife.

If he had ever read the book following of monogamy, he might have found his Tertullian there maintaining, to uphold the true and catholic church with the usual practice and allowance of the second marriages of their bishops.

By. Hall, Hen. of the Marr. Clergy, p. 106.

MONOGRAM. n. s. [μῑνός; and γράμμα, Gr.] monogramme, Fr.]

1. A cypher; a character compounded of several letters.

It came

To be described by a monogram.

By. Jonson, Underwoods.

2. A picture drawn in lines without colour.

A kind of first draught or ground colours only, and monogram of line. Hammond, Works, iv. 371.

MONOGRAMMAL. adj. [from monogram.] Sketching in the manner of a monogram.

Though it be but as it were a monogrammal description, and a kind of rude draught as it were with a coal. Fotherley, Atholm. (1692), p. 355.

MONOLOGUE. n. s. [μῑνός; and λόγος; monologue, Fr.] A scene in which a person of the drama speaks by himself; a soliloquy.

He gives you an account of himself, and of his retreating from the country, in monologue; to which unusual way of narration Terence is subject in all his plays. Dryden.

MONOMACHY. n. s. [μονομαχία; μῑνός, and μάχη, Gr. monomachie, old Fr.] A duel; a single combat.

In those ancient monomachies and combats they were searched, [that] they had no magical charms.

Burton, Anat. of Mel. p. 54. Abner invites his rival in honour to a tragical play, (as he terms it,) a monomachy of twelve single combatants on either part.

By. Hall, Cases of Cons. D. 2. C. 2.

MONOME. n. s. [monome, Fr.] In algebra, a quantity that has but one denomination or name; as, a, b, a a b, a a a b.

Harris.

MONOPATHY. n. s. [μῑνός, and πάθος, Gr.] Solitary sensibility; sole suffering.

By this Spanish proverb, every one calculated his nativity, and sentenceth his own future fate, by crying at his birth; not coming only from the body's monopathy, or sole suffering by change of its warm quarters; but, according to some, from sympathy with the divine soul, that knoweth half for a time banished from the Father of Spirits.

Whitlock, Mamm. of the Engl. (1654), p. 52.

MONOPETALOUS. adj. [monopetale, Fr. μῑνός, and πέταλον.] It is used for such flowers as are formed out of one leaf, howsoever they may be seemingly cut into many small ones, and those fall off together.

Quincy.

MONOPOLIST. n. s. [monopoleur, Fr. Our own word was formerly monopolizer. Cotgrave and Sherwood. Then monopolizer.] One who by engrossing or patent obtaining the sole power or privilege of vending any commodity.

Joy is an import; joy is an exchange;

Joy lies monopolists; it calls for two.

Young, Night Th. 2.

To MONOPOLIZE† v. a. μῑνός, and πῑνός; monopolizer, French.] To engross, so as to have the sole power or privilege of vending any commodity.

As if this age had monopolized all goodness to itself.

Fuller, Holy War, p. 236. He has such a prodigious trade, that if there is not some stop put, he will monopolize a nobody will sell a yard of drapery, or mercery ware, but himself.

Arbutnot.

MONOPOLIZER. n. s. [from monopolize.]

A monopolist.

Merchants have been prohibited to unlade their goods in such ports as were for their own advantage, and forced to bring them to those places which were most for the advantages of the monopolizers and projectors.

Remonstrance in 1642, Whitlock's Mem. p. 298.

There was in it the franchise of some old patentees and monopolizers in the trade of book-selling.

Milton, Areopagitica.

MONOPOLY. n. s. [μονωδία; monopole, French; μῑνός; and πῑνός.] The exclusive privilege of selling any thing.

If I had a monopoly on't they would have part on't.

Shakespeare right well happily than knowingly and justly; and Jonson, who, by studying Horace and then acquainted with the rules, yet seemed to envy to posterity that knowledge, and make a monopoly of his learning.

Dryden, Juv.

fit

To question a monopoly of it?

One of the most oppressive monopolies imaginable; all others can concern only something without us, but this fastens upon our nature, runs upon our reason.

Gov. of the Tongue Shakespeare rather well happily than knowingly and justly; and Jonson, who, by studying Horace and then acquainted with the rules, yet seemed to envy to posterity that knowledge, and make a monopoly of his learning.

Dryden, Juv.

MONOPTER. n. s. [μῑνός; and πτερά.] A noun used only in some one oblique case.

Clarke, Lat. Gram. MONOPTICH. n. s. [μῑνός; and πτερά.] A composition of one verse.

The drugs and spices here so perfumed the place, that it made me since give the better credit to that monomachy of an old poet, "Auras madentes Perficere arumque."

Sir T. Herbert, Triv. p. 164.

MONOSYLLABLE. adj. [from monosyllable.] Consisting of words of one syllable.

MONOSYLLABLE. n. s. [monosyllable, French; μῑνός; and σύνταξις.] A word of only one syllable.

My name of Ptolemy!

It is so long it takes an hour to write it! I'll change it into Jove or Mars!

Or any other civil monosyllable, That will not tire my hand.

Dryden, Chron. Poets, although not innumerable how much our language was at first overstocked with monosyllables, yet, to save time and pains, introduced that barbarous custom of abbreviating words, to fit them to the measure of their verses.

Swift. Monosyllable lines, unless artfully managed, are still or languishing; but may be beautiful to express melancholy.

Pope.

MONOSYLLABLE. adj. [monosyllable, Fr. monosyllable.] Consisting of one syllable.

Nine tailors, if rightly spell'd, Into one man are monosyllabled.

Cleveland.

MONOSTROPHICK. adj. [μῑνός; and στροφή, Gr.] Free from the restraint of any particular metre.

The measure of verse used in the chorus is all sorts, called by the Greeks monostrophick.

Milton, Pref. to Samson Agonistes.

MONOTONE. n. s. [μῑνός; and τόνος, Greek.] Uniformity of sound; want of proper cadence in pronunciation.

A kind of chant that frequently varies very little from a monotone.

Mason, on Church Music, p. 95.

MONOTONICAL. adj. [from monotony.] Having an unvaried sound; wanting variety in cadence.

We should not be lulled to sleep by the length of a monotonical declamation.

Ld. Chesterfield.

MONOTONOUS. adj. [from monotony.] Wanting variety in cadence.

Every line was perhaps uniformly recited to the same monotonous modulation.

Warton, Hist. E. P. Emend. li. a. 4.

The invidious, whether old or new, ought to be executed in a less monotonous, and consequently more intelligible, manner.

Mason, on Church Music, p. 196.

MONOTONY. n. s. [μονωδία; μῑνός; and τόνος; monotonie, Fr.] Uniformity of sound; want of variety in cadence.

I could object to the repetition of the same rhymes within four lines of each other as tiresome to the ear through their monotony.

Pope, Letters.

MONSIEUR. n. s. [French.] A term of reproach for a Frenchman.

A Frenchman his companion; An eminent monsieur, that it seems, much loves

A Gallian girl. Shakespeare, Cymbeline.

Nor shall we then need the monsters of Paris to take our hopeful youth into their slight and prodigious custodies.

Milton on Education.

MONSOON. n. s. [monsoon, monsoon, Fr.]

Monsoons are shifting trade winds in the East Indian ocean, which blow periodically; some for a half year one way, others but for three months, and then shift and blow for six or three months directly contrary. Harri-

The monsoons and trade winds are constant and periodical, even to the thirtieth degree of latitude, all round the globe, and seldom transgress or fly short of those bounds. Hay-

MON'STER. n. s. [monstre, French; monstrum, Latin.]

1. Something out of the common order of nature.

Metaphoric heroics till now,
Like some fantastic fairy land did show, (Gods, devils, nymphs, witches, and giants' race,
And all but man in man's chief work had place;
Then like some worthy knight, with sacred arms,
Duth drive the monsters thence, and end the charms. Conley.

It ought to be determined whether monsters be really a distinct species: we find, that some of these monstrous productions have none of those qualities that accompany the essence of that species from whence they derive. Locke.

2. Something horrible for deformity, wickedness, or mischief.

If she live long,
And, in the end, meet the whole course of death,
Women will all turn monsters. Shakespeare, K. Lear.

All human virtues, to its latest breath,
Finds error never conquer'd but by death:
The great Alcides every labour past,
Had still this monster to subdue at last. Pope.

To MON'STER. v. a. [from the noun.] To put out of the common order of things. Not in use.

Her offence
Must be of such unnatural degree,
That monsters it. Shakespeare, K. Lear.
I had rather have one scratch my head i' th' sun,
When the alarm were struck, than idly sit
To hear my nothings monster'd. Shakespeare, Coriol.

MONSTROUSITY. n. s. [from monstrous.]
MONSTROUSITY. The state of being monstrous, or out of the common order of the universe. Monstrousity is more analogous.

This is the monstrousity in love, that the will is infinite, and the execution confin'd. Shakespeare, Tr. and Com.

Such a tacit league is against such routs and shoals of people, as have utterly degenerated from nature, as have in their very body and frame of estate a monstrousity.

We read of monstrous births, but we often see a greater monstrousity in educations: thus, when a father has begot a man, he trains him up into a beast. South, Sermon.

By the same law monstrousity could not incapacitate from marriage; witness the case of hermaphrodites. Arbutnot and Pope.

MON'STROUSLY. adj. [monstreux, French; monstruosus, Latin.]

1. Deviating from the stated order of nature.

Nature there pervene,
Brought forth all monstrous, all prodigious things,
Hydras, and gorgons, and chimeras dire. Milton, P. L.

Every thing that exists has its particular constitution; and yet some monstrous productions have few of those qualities which accompany the essence of that species from whence they derive their originals. Locke.

2. Strange; wonderful. Generally with some degree of dislike.

It is not monstrous that this player here
But is a fiction, in a dream of passion,
Could force his soul so to his conceit,
That, from her working, all his viage was'd? Shakespeare.

O monstrous! but one halfpenny worth of bread to this intolerable deal of sack. Shakespeare.

3. Irregular; enormous.

No monstrous height, or breadth, or length appear,
The whole at once is bold and regular. Pope.

4. Shocking; hateful.

This was an invention given out by the Spaniards, to save the monstrous scorn their nation received. Bacon.

5. Full of monsters.

Where thou, perhaps, under the wheeling tide,
Visit'st the bottom of the monstrous world. Milton, Lycidas.

MON'STROUSLY. adv. Exceedingly; very much. A cant term.

Oil of vitriol and petroleum, a dram of each, turn into a mouldy substance, there reading a fair cloud in the bottom, and a monstrous thick oil on the top. Bacon.

She was easily put off the books, and monstrous hard to be pleased again. L'Estrange.

Add, that the rich have still a globe in store,
And will be monstrously wily on the poor. Dryden.

MON'STROUSLY. adv. [from monstrous.]

1. In a manner out of the common order of nature; shockingly; terribly; horribly.

Tiberius was bad enough in his youth, but superlatively and monstrously so in his old age. South, Sermon.

2. To a great or enormous degree.

And that self chain about his neck,
Which he forewore most monstrously to have. Shakespeare.

These truths with his example you divorce,
Who with his wife is monstrously in love. Dryden, Jun.

MON'STROUSNESS. n. s. [from monstrous.]
Enormity; irregular nature or behaviour.

See the monstrousness of man,
When he looks out in an ungrateful shape! Shakespeare.

O, how I hate the monstrousness of time!
B. Jonson, Every Man out of his Humour.

MON'TANISM. n. s. The tenets of Montanus, an ancient heretic, who, about the close of the second century, founded a sect; unjustly pretending to be a prophet; multiplying fasts; forbidding second marriages; condemning all care of the body; and declaring that philosophy, arts, and whatever savoured of polite learning, should be banished from the Christian church.

Tertullian, proclaiming even war to the church, maintained montanism, wrote a book in defence of the new sect, and intitled the same, A treatise of fasting against the opinion of the carnal sort. Hodder, Ecc. Pol. v. § 72.

His (Tertullian's) montanism put no separation at all betwixt him and other Christians, save only in point of discipline, which he, according to the severity of his nature, would have to be most harsh and rigorous. Hammer, View of Antiqu. p. 115.

MON'TANIST. n. s. A follower of Montanus.

The montanists held these additions to be supplements to the Gospel. Hodder, Ecc. Pol. v. § 72.

MON'TANISTICAL. adj. Belonging to the heresy of the Montanists.

An emulation of the montanistical zeal of virginity.

Mp. Hall, Hon. of the Merv. Chirgy, p. 247.
Containing in them divers of his wild, montanistical conceits. Hammer, View of Antiqu. p. 123.

To MON'TANIZE. v. a. To follow the opinions of Montanus.

Tertullian, together with such as were his followers, began to montanize, and, pretending to perfect the severity of Christian discipline, he sought in sundry uncustomed days of fasting.

Hodder, Ecc. Pol. v. § 72.

MON'TANT. n. s. [French.] A term in fencing.

Vat be all you, one, two, tree, four, come for!
— To see thee fight, — to see thee pass thy pranks, thy stock; thy reverse; thy distance; thy montant. Shakespeare.

MONTERO. n. s. [Spanish.] A horseman's cap.

His hat was like a helmet, or Spanish montero. Bacon.

MONETH. n. s. [from the name of the inventor.] A vessel in which glasses are washed.

New things produce new words, and thus Moneth

Has by one vessel us'd its name from death. King.

MONT'H. n. s. [monath, Saxon. Dr. Johnson. — Moon was formerly written moneth; and month was written moneth.] It means the period in which that planet moneth, or completh its orbit. Mr. H. Tooke, Div. of Purley, ii. 417. — This observation is very ingenious, although there are no vestiges of a verb of this form in the Anglo-Saxon or any of the Gothic languages. Dr. Jamieson. — The Saxon monath, is from mona, the moon; and the Goth. menath, from mena, the same; μην, Greek.

Wachter deduces the Goth. word for moon from mana, to warn, to admonish, to instruct; and Dr. Jamieson the Sax. mona from monian, the same. May we not then refer also to the Greek verb προει, to indicate, to point out, to declare, whence perhaps προει the moon, and μην, a month? If this be admitted, here is the verb to support Mr. Tooke's observation, though in other words, viz. a month menath the period in which that planet warns, instructs, and points out.) A space of time either measured by the sun or moon: the lunar month is the time between the change and change, or the time in which the moon comes to the same point: the solar month is the time in which the sun passes through a sign of the zodiac: the calendar months, by which we reckon time, are unequally of thirty or one-and-thirty days, except February, which is of twenty-eight, and in leap year of twenty-nine.

Till the expiration of your month,
Sajours with my sister. Shakespeare, K. Lear.
From a month old even unto five years old. Lee, xlviii. 6.

Months are not only lunar, and measured by the moon, but also solar, and terminated by the motion of the sun, in thirty degrees of the ecliptic. Brown, Phil. Reg.

As many months as I sustain'd her hate,
So many years is the contentment 'till fate
To daily death.

Dryden, Tho. and Hen.

MONTH's mind. n. s. Longing desire.

Dr. Johnson. — Dr. Johnson gives no account of the origin of this phrase.

A month's mind, is the mind or remembrance days of former times, when persons directed, in their wills, that within a year, a month, or some specific time, after their death, a requiem for their souls should be performed, and some charity bestowed. They were called also mind days. Pegge, in his Anecdotes of the English Language, says that the phrase originated from the direction being "a declaration of the will and mind of the deceased." But the months' minds have been sometimes called memories, and sometimes monuments; and therefore clearly denote remembrance, not intention. They were a source of profit to that, our ancestors at the Reformation perhaps retained the phrase, as a ludicrous mode of expressing any desire of gratifying their wishes.

Skyne to make all men's goods common unto them by title of tythes, offerings, devotions, pilgrimages, absolucions, indulgences, bequestes, mortuaries, month-mynnds, year-mynnds, and the devil and all beyndes.

Whether there are any month's minds and anniversaries.

Interrog. in 1555, Strype's Men. of the Ref. ii. 354.

You have a month's mind to them. Skyneper.

For if a trumpet sound or drum beat, Who has not a month's mind to combat? Hudibras.

MO'NTLY. adj. [from month.]

1. Continuing a month; performed in a month.

I would ask concerning the monthly revolutions of the moon about the earth, or the diurnal ones of the earth upon its own axis, whether those have been finite or infinite. Bentley.

2. Happening every month.

The youth of heavenly birth I view'd,
For whom our monthly victims are renew'd; Dryden.

MO'NTLY. adv. Once in a month.

If the one may very well monthly the revolutions of the moon about the earth, or the diurnal ones of the earth upon its own axis, whether those have been finite or infinite. Bentley.

If the one may very well monthly the revolutions of the moon about the earth, or the diurnal ones of the earth upon its own axis, whether those have been finite or infinite. Bentley.

MO'NTLY. adv. Once in a month.

So many grateful alarms I would rear
Of gray's turf; and pile up every stone
Of lustre from the brook; in memory,
Or monument to ages; and thereon Offer sweet-smelling gums. Milton, P. L.

Of ancient British art
A pleasing monument, not less admir'd
Than what from Attick or Etruscan hands Arose. Philips.

Collect the best monuments of our friends, their own names, and their writings. Pope to Swift.

2. A tomb; a cenotaph; something erected in memory of the dead.

On your family's old monument
Hang mournful epitaphs, and do all rites
That appertain unto a burial. Shakespeare.

The flowers which in the circling valley grow;
Shall on his monument their odours throw. Sanders, Paraph.

In a heap of slain,
Two youthful knights they found beneath a load oppress'd.

Of slaughter'd foes, whom first to death they sent,
The trophies of their strength, a bloody monument. Dryden.

With thee on Raphael's monument I mourn,
Or art inspiring dreams at Maro's urn. Pope, Miscell.

MONUMENTAL. adj. [from monument.]

1. Memorial; preserving memory.

When the sun begins to fling
His flaming beams, me, goddess, bring
To arch'd walks of twilight groves,
And shadows brown that Syrian rocks
Of pine or monumental oak. Milton, El. Pens.

The destruction of the earth was the most monumental proof that could have been given to all the succeeding ages of mankind. Woodward, Nat. Hist.

The polish'd pillar different sculptures bears,
A rare outlasting monumental urn. Pope.

2. Raised in honour of the dead; belonging to a tomb.

Perseverance keeps honour bright:
To have done, is to hang quite out of fashion,
Like rusty mail in monumental mockery. Shakspeare.

I'll not scar that whiter skin of her than snow,
And smooth as monumental alabaster. Othello.

Therefore if he needs must go,
And the fates will have it so,
Softly may he be posset. Cressida.

MONUMENTALLY. adv. [from monument.]

In memorial.

This description of his house is in short the very same with an ancient justice of peace his hall; a very dangerous armory to be touched, like Paul's scaffolds, monumentally standing, because none dare take them down. Gayton on D. Quirato, (1654), p. 2.

To Moo.* See To Muz.

MOOD.* n. s. [mode, French; modus, Lat.]

1. The form of an argument.

Mood is the regular determination of propositions
according to their quantity and quality, i. e.
their universal or particular affirmation or negation. Watts, Logic.

Aristotle reduced our loose reasonings to certain rules, and made them conclude in mode and figure. Baker on Learning.

2. Style of music.

They move
In perfect phalanx, to the Dorian mood
Of flutes, and soft recorders. Milton, P. L.

Their sound
Little prevails, or rather seems a tune Harsh, and of dissonant work by his complaint. Milton, S. A.

A bird,
Whom art had never taught cliffs, woods, or notes.
Ford, Lover's Melancholy.

3. The change the verb undergoes in some languages, as the Greek, Latin, and French, to signify various intentions of the mind, is called mood.

Clarke, Lat. Grammar.

We have observed, that all speech or discourse is a publishing or exhibiting some part of our soul, either a certain perception, or a certain volition.
Hence then, according as we exhibit it either in a different part, or after a different manner, hence I say the variety of modes or moods.

Herrius, Hermes, D. i. ch. 8.

4. [mod, Gothick; moob, Saxon; mood, Dutch; and generally in all Teutonic dialects.] Temper of mind; state of mind as affected by any passion; disposition.

The trembling ghosts, with sad amazed mood,
Chattering their iron teeth, and staring wide
With stony eyes. Shakspeare, F. Q.

The kindly beast upon her gazing stood,
With pity calm'd, down fell his angry mood. Shakspeare, F. Q.

Eyes unused to the melting mood,
Drop tears as fast as the Arabian trees
Their medicinal gum. Shakspeare, Othello.

Florida chang'd to ruth her warlike mood,
Few silver drops but vermilion cheeks depictant. Enfias.

Solyman, in a melancholy mood, walked up and down in his tent a great part of the night.

She was in fittest mood
For cutting cords, or letting blood. Hudibras.

These two kinds to appease his angry mood,
I bear, of which the furies give him good. Dryden.

He now profuse of tears,
In suppliant mood fell prostrate at our feet. Addison.

5. Anger; rage; heat of mind. [mod,
Goth. rage, See MAD.]

At the last ask'd was his mood.

A gentleman, Chaucer, Kn. Tale.

Whom, in my mood, I staid'd up to the heart.

That which we move for our better instruction's sake, turneth into anger and choler in them; yet in their mood they cast forth somewhat wherewith, under pain of greater displeasure, we must rest contented. Hobbes.

MO'ODLY. adv. [from moody.] Sadly; penively. Cotgrave, & Sherwood.

MO'ODINESS. n. s. [Sax. mobi-gne.]

Indignation; vexation.

Such was the natural hatred of the sheep towards the dogs, and the implacable rancours which they conceived to be hurried up and down, that they fell into an inveterate conceit of language and despair; and so into flat disobedience, to abhor both their shepherds and the dogs, insomuch that when they were to be milked, and shorn, they hid themselves in woods and dens. Frank's Rancours (1676), p. 179.

MO'ODY. adj. [from mood, Goth. modags, angry; Sax. mobi.]

1. Angry; out of humour.

How now, moody?
What is't thou canst demand? Shakspeare, Tempest.

Chide him reverently,
When you perceive his blood inclin'd to mirth;
But being moody, give him line and scope,
Till that his passions, like a whale on ground,
Confound themselves with working. Shakspeare, Hen. IV.

According to Milton's description of the first couple, as soon as they had fallen, and the turbulent passions of anger, hatred, and jealousy, first entered their breast; Adam grew moody. Tatler, No. 217.

Every periwish, moody malecontent
Shall set the sensitive riddle in an uproar? Rever.

2. Sad; pensive; melancholy. See also MOODILY.

Give me some music; music, moody food
Of us that trade in love. Shakspeare, Ant. & Cleop.
Sweet recreation bar'd, what doth ensue,
But moody and dull melancholy? Shakspeare, Com. of Err.

3. Violent; furious; raging.
The malicious traumas of the world, with their middle modge magistrates and slaves.

Ide on the Revel. P. iii. (1550). D. iij.
In his moody madness, without just proof, did he openly excommunicate him,

Fir. Acts and Mon. of Lord Cobham.
If we be English deer, be then in blood.
Not rascal-like, to fall down with a pinch;
But rather moody-mad and desperate stages.
Turn on the bloody hounds with heads of steel.

Shakspeare, Her. Pt. P. I.

- MOON. † n. s. [μῆν, Gr. mēna, Gothic; mona, Saxon; mona, Icelandic; maanc, Danish; mon, German; maen, Dutch. See the etymology of MONTH.]

1. The changing luminary of the night, called by poets Cynthia or Phœbe.

The moon sits bright: 'twas such a night as
this,

When the sweet wind did gently kiss the trees,
And they did make no noise. Shakspeare.

Diana hath her name from moisture, which is the property of the moon, being by nature cold and moist, and is feigned to be a goddess thereof.
Poet.

Beneath the mighty ocean's wealthy craves,
Beneath the eternal fountain of all waves,
Where their vast court the mother waters keep,
And undisturb'd by moons, in silence sleep.

Gayley.

Ye moon and stars bear witness to the truth!
Dryden.

2. A month.
Since these arms of mine had seven years' pith,
Till now some nine moons waxed, they have us'd
Their dearest action in the tented field.

Shakspeare, Othello.

3. [In fortification.] It is used in composition to denote a figure resembling a crescent: as, a half moon.

- MOON-BEAM. † n. s. [moon and beam.] Rays of lunar light.

The division and quivering, which please so much in music, have so agreement with the glittering of light, as the moon-beams playing on a wave. Bacon, Nat. Hist.

On the water the moon-beams play, and make it appear like floating quicksilver.

Dryden on Dream. Poem.

- MOON-CALF. † n. s. [moon and calf.]
1. A monster; a false conception; supposed perhaps anciently to be produced by the influence of the moon.

How com'st thou to be the image of this moon-calf? Shakspeare.

2. A dolt; a stupid fellow.
The potion works not on the part design'd,
But turns his brain, and stupefies his mind;
The sotted moon-calf gapes. Dryden, Jun.

- MOON-EYED. † adj. [from moon.]
1. Resembling the new moon.

White thus be spake, the angelic squadron bright

Turn'd fiery red, sharpening in mooned horns
Their phantoms. Milton, P. L.

2. Having the title and character of the moon.

Poor and Basilius
Fornake their temples dim,

With that twice batter'd god of Palestine,
And moaned Ashtaroth,
Heaven's queen and mother both
Now sits not girt with tapers' holy shine.

Milton, Ode Neirin.

- MOON-ET. † n. s. [from moon.] A little moon.

Some lesser planets moving round about the sun,
and the moons about Saturn and Jupiter.

1. Having eyes affected by the revolutions of the moon.

2. Dim eyed; purblind. Ainsworth.

So manifest, that 'e'en the moon-ey'd sects

See whom and what this providence protects.

Dryden, Britan. Rediviva.

- MOONFEAR. † n. s. [hemionitis.] A plant.

Ainsworth.

- MOON-FISH. † n. s.

Moon-fish is so called, because the tail fin is shaped like a half moon, by which, and his odd trussed shape, he is sufficiently distinguished. Grew, Mus.

- MOONISH. † adj. [from moon.] Like the moon; variable as the moon; flighty.

At which time would I, being but a moonish youth, grieve, be effeminate, changeable, longing, and lying. Shakspeare, At you like.

He tells you of a deluge and wonderful fraction that hath been in that world, [the moon] much like the same which be hath represented us of our world; with several other such rare moonish inventions.

Sp. H. Crisp, Anim. on Burnet's The. (1685), Pref.

- MOONLESS. † adj. [from moon.] Not enlightened by the moon.

His angry eyes look all so glaring bright,
Like the hunted badger in a moonless night,
Or like a painted staring Saracen.

Sp. Hall, Sat. vi. l.

Assisted by a friend, one moonless night,
This Palamon from prison took his flight.

Dryden, Pal. and Arc.

- MOONLIGHT. † n. s. [moon and light.]
The light afforded by the moon.

Their bishop and his clergy, being departed from them by moonlight, to choose in his room any other bishop, had been altogether impossible.

Hooker.

Thou hast by moonlight at her window sung,
With feigning voice, verses of feigning love.

Shakspeare.

- MOONLIGHT. † adj. Illuminated by the moon.

If you will patiently dance in our round,
And cease our moonlight revels, go with us.

What beck'ning ghost along the moonlight shade
Invites my steps, and points to yonder glade?

Pope.

- MOONLING. † n. s. [from moon.] A simpleton.

I have a husband, and a two-legg'd one;
But such a moonling, as no wit of man,
Or rooks can redeem from being an ass.

B. Jonson, Dev. and Au.

- MOON-SEED. † n. s. [menispermum, Lat.]

The moon-seed hath a rosaceous flower: the pointal is divided into three parts at the top, and afterward becomes the fruit or berry, in which is included, one flat seed, which is, when ripe, hollowed like the appearance of a miller.

Miller.

- MOONSHINE. † n. s. [moon and shine.]
1. The lustre of the moon.

Pinch him, and burn him, and turn him about,
Till candles, and starlight, and moonshine be out.

Shakspeare.

I, by the moonshine, to the windows went;
And, ere I was aware, sigh'd to myself.

Dryden, Spem. Friar.

2. [In burlesque.] A month.
I am some twelve or fourteen moonshines Lag of a brother. Shakspeare, A. Lear.

- MOONSHINE. † adj. [moon and shine.] Il-MOONSHINY. † adj. illuminated by the moon:

both seen a popular corruption of moonshining.

Fairies, black, gray, green, and white,
You moonshine revellers, and shades of night.

Shakspeare.

Although it was a fair moonshine night,
the enemy thought not fit to assault them. Clarendon.

I went to see them in a moonshine night.

Addison.

- MOONSTONE. † n. s. A kind of stone.

Ainsworth.

- MOONSTRUCK. † adj. [moon and struck.]
Lunatic; affected by the moon.

Demetrius phrening, mooping melancholy,
And moonstruck madness. Milton, P. L.

- MOON-TREFOIL. † n. s. [medicago, Latin.]
A plant.

The moon-trefoil hath a plain orbicular fruit, shaped like an half moon.

Miller.

- MOONWORT. † n. s. [moon and wort.]
Stationflower; honesty.

And I be plucking plants among:
Hemlock, henbane, adder's tongue,
Night shade, moonwort, libbard-bane.

Jonson, Masques.

- MOON-Y. † adj. [from moon.]
1. Denoting the moon.

Diana did begin, what mo'd I do to invite Your presence, sister deuse, first to my moony sphere? Sidney, Arcad. b. 3.

2. Lunated; having a crescent for the standard resembling the moon.

The moonly standards of proud Ottoman.

Sylvester, Du Bart. (1621), p. 29.

Encountering fierce
The solemian sultan, be o'erthrow
His moonly troops, returning bravely smoo'd
With much blood. Philips.

The golden palis the Hylian cross;
But soon the miscreant moonmy host
Before the victor-cross shall fly.

Fenton.

- MOOR. † n. s. [moor, Teut. and Icel.
mud, clay; moor, Swed. rotten earth.]

1. A marsh; a fen; a bog; a tract of low and watry grounds.

Let the marsh of Elsham Bruges tell,
What colour were their waters that same day,
And all the moor 'twixt Elsham and Delf.

Spenser, F. Q.

While in her girlish age she kept sheep on the moor, it chanced that a London merchant passing by saw her, and liked her, begged her of her poor parents, and carried her to his house.

Cervus, Surv. of Cornwall.

In the great level near Thorny, several troops of oak and fir stand in firm earth below the moor.

Hale.

She's come to moorage, —

To lay aside until cur'd.

Olis Stone, (1648), p. 182.

MOORCOCK. n. s. [moor and cock.] The male of the moorhen.

Griev'd him to lurk the lakes beside,

Where coots in rushy dingles hide,

And moorcocks about the day.

Shakespeare, Ode to Sir R. Lyleston.

MOORGAME. n. s. [moor and game.] Red game; grouse.

A tract of land, so thinly inhabited, must have much wild fowl; and I scarcely remember to have seen a dinner without them. The moorgame is every where to be had.

Johnson, Journ. West. Islands.

MOORHEN. n. s. [moor and hen.] A fowl that feeds in the fens, without web feet.

Water-fowl, as sea-gulls and moorhens, when they flock and fly together from the sea towards the shores, forebode rain and wind.

Bacon, Nat. Hist.

MOORISH. adj. [from moor.]

1. Fenny; marshy; watery.

Misty, foggy air; such as comes from fens, moorish grounds, lakes, &c.

Burton, Ant. of Mid. p. 81.

No, Camar; they pathless moorish mounds,
That, being once made rotten with the dung
Of damned riches, ever after sink
Beneath the steps of any villany.

R. Jonson, Postaster.

In the great level near Thorney, several oaks and firs have lain there till covered by the inundation of the fresh and salt waters, and moorish earth exaggerated upon them.

Hale.

Along the moorish fens
Sighs the sad genius of the coming storm.

Thomson.

As when thick mists arise from moory vales.

Faucher.

In Essex, moory-land is thought the most proper.

MOOSE. n. s. The large American deer; the biggest of the species of deer.

Are you still of opinion, that the American moose and European elk are the same creature?

White's Siberia, p. 80.

To MOOT. v. a. [from mocan, mot, xemot, meeting together, Sax. or perhaps, as it is a law term, from mot, French. Dr. Johnson. — It is certainly from the Sax. mot, xemot, a meeting together; mocian, to treat of, as well as to meet together; the Gothic nations, as Dr. Jamieson observes, being accustomed to meet for the purpose of discussing public concerns. Cowel, in his Law Dictionary, gives the Saxon etymon, but takes no notice of the needless Fr.] To plead a mock cause; to state a point of law by way of exercise, as was commonly done in the inns of court at appointed times.

I mean the pleading into courts and chancery called moots, where first a case is applied to be mooted by certain young men, containing some doubtful controversy.

Sir T. Egot, Cor. fol. 48.

A bad habit to moot cases on the supposed ruin of the constitution.

Burke on the Discontents in 1770.

To MOOT. v. n. To argue or plead upon a supposed cause in law.

There is a difference between mooted and pleading; between feigning and fighting.

B. Jonson, Discoveries.

MOOT. n. s. [from the verb.] Case to be disputed; point to be argued.

Orators have their declamations; lawyers have their moots. Bacon, Const. on the Ch. of England. But to end this moot: the law of Moses is manifest.

Milton, Tetrachordon.

MOOT case or point. A point or case unsettled and disputable, such as may properly afford a topic of disputation.

In this moot case your judgement to refuse,
Is rent death.

Dryden, Jus.

Would you out think him crack'd, who requires another to make an argument on a moot point, who understands nothing of our laws?

Locke on Education.

Let us drop both our pretences; for I believe it is a moot point, whether I am more likely to make a master Bell, or a master Strutt.

Arbuthnot, Hist. of J. Bull.

MOOT-HALL. n. s. [mot-huf, moel-heal, MOOT-HOUSE.] Sax.] Council-chamber; hall of judgement; town-hall. See MOTE. Yet used in the north of England.

He commends him to be kept in the moot-hall of Eroude.

Wicliffe, Acts, xiii.

MOOTING. n. s. [from moot.] The exercise of pleading a mock cause.

By that he hath heard one mooted; and seen two plays, he [an Inn-of-Court man] thinks as basely of the University, as a young sophister doth of the Grammar-school.

Oberbury, Charact. sign. K. 4.

MOOTED. adj. Plucked up by the root.

Ainsworth.

MOOTER. n. s. [from moot.] A disputer of moot points.

MOP.† n. s. [moppa, Welsh; mappa, Latin.]

1. Pieces of cloth, or locks of wool; fixed to a long handle, with which mads clean the floors.

Such is that sprinkling which some careless queen

Flirts on your face from her poor, but not clean. You fly, invokes the gods; then turning, stop To rail; she singing still whirls on her mop.

Swift.

2. [Perhaps corrupted from mock. Dr. Johnson. — Mock and mop were certainly used indifferently. Shakespeare has both mock and mop, and mop and mow. See the edit. of Spenser, 1805. vol. 7. p. 30. But the Su. Goth. mopa, illudere, deludere, may possibly have given rise to our word.] A wry mouth or grin made in contempt.

Each one tripping on his toe
Will be here with mop and mow.

Shakespeare, Tempest.

To MOP. v. a. [from the noun.] To rub with a mop.

To MOP. v. n. [from mock, or from the Su. Goth. mopa, illudere.] To make wry mouths or grin in contempt.

Five fangs have been in poor Tom's case; of lust, as Obdicut; Hobbsides, price of dumbness; Mahu, of stealing; Mohu, of murder; and Flitterbittibbet, of mopping and mowing, who since possesses clamber-maid.

Shakespeare.

Mark! but his countenance; see how he mops and how he mows; and how he strains his locks.

Nich. Faults, and nothing but Faults, (1606), p. 7.

As no felt a moping and braying at a lion.

L'Estrange.

To MOPE. v. n. [Of this word I cannot find a probable etymology. Dr. Johnson. — Serenius thinks it to be in mopa, deludere, pro stulto habere, Chron. Rythm. p. 288. and I here also notices the affinity between the Su. Goth. and our word.] To be stupid; to drowse; to be in a constant day-dream; to be spiritless, unactive, and inattentive; to be stupid and delirious.

What a wretched and peevish fellow is this King of England, to mope with his fat-bellied followers.

Shakespeare.

Eyes without feeling, feeling without sight, Ears without hands or eyes, smelling sans all, Or but a sickly part of one sense worse

Could not so mope.

Shakespeare, Hamlet.

Ev'n in a dream, were we divided from them, And were brought moping hither.

Shakespeare, Tempest.

Intestive stone, and ulcer, colic pang, Demonsick phrency, moping melancholy.

And moon-struck madness.

Milton, P. L.

The busy craftsman and o'erlabour'd blind, Forget the travel of the day in sleep;

Care only wakes, and moping penitence;

Will neigurge discontented looks they sit, and lie

And watch the waning of the midnight taper.

Rever.

To MOPE. v. a. To make spiritless; to deprive of natural powers.

Many men are undone by this means, moped, or so dejected, that they are never to be recovered.

Burton, Ant. of Mid. p. 150.

They say there are charms in beds, said he, and so threw a handful of grass; which was so ridiculous, that the young thief took the old man to be moped.

L'Estrange.

It is doubtless a great disgrace to our religion to imagine, as too many superstitious Christians do, that it is an enemy in mirth and cheerfulness, and a severe exactor of penitence looks and solemn faces; that men are never serious enough till they are moped into statues, and cloistered from all society but that of their own melancholy thoughts.

Scott, Christian Life, P. i. ch. v.
Severity breaks the mind; and then in the place of a disorderly young fellow, you have a low-spirited moped creature. Locke on Education.

MORPE. * n. s. [from the verb.] One who is moped; a spiritless and inattentive person.

They have made, by their humouring or gulling, 'ex stulto insanum,' a mope or a noddy; and all to make themselves merry.

Burton, Diss. of Med. p. 149.

MORPEYED. * adj. Blind of one eye. Dr. Johnson says, on the authority of Ainsworth, without any example. It means rather short-sighted, purblind, μωπός, Gr. See MYOPY.

He pitied his simplicity, and returneth him for answer, that, if he be not mopeyed, he may find the procession of the divine persons in his creed.

J. Brinsford, Scitum Guarded, (1684) p. 191.

MOPFISH. * adj. [from mope.] Spiritless; inattentive; dejected.

They generally sink down under crosses and afflictions, are exposed to contempt and blame, traduced as a sort of mopish and unbecoming characters.

Killingbeck, Scrm. p. 348.
MOPFISHNESS. * n. s. [from mopish.] Dejection; inactivity.

The recesses of the cloyster: the seats of mopishness, superstition, and bigotry.

Cowley, Phil. to Hyl. Conn. 2.
He became very melancholy, and at length fell into a kind of mopishness of faculty.

Hut. E. P. li. 301.

MOPPET. * n. s. [perhaps from moj.] A MOPPEY. } puppet made of rags, as a mope is made: a fondling name for a girl.

Our sovereign lady: made for a queen?
With a globe in one hand, and a sceptre in 't' other?
A very pretty mope! Dryden, Spans. Priar.

MOPPEYED. * adj. That cannot see well; mope-eyed. Coles, Dict. 1685. Mr. Moor, in his Suffolk Words, 1823, defines it low-spirited, drooping, moping. In the following example it appears to have the meaning, from mope, of stupid, delirious.

Others of more airy and elevated fancies are altogether in military dreams, religious phantasms, &c. not caring much how they break any moral precept of law or gospel, &c. until they come to such a sovereignty, as may be able to govern and oppress others, their mystical humours being never satisfied, but in fancying themselves as kings and reigning with Christ.

By. Gauden, Hivings. (1653), Pref. sign. b.
MOPPEY. * n. s. [A cant word from mope.] A drone; a dremmer.

I'm grown a mere moppey; no company comes but a rabble of tenants. Swift, Miscell.

MORAL. * adj. [moral, French; moralis, Latin.]

1. Relating to the practice of men towards each other, as it may be virtuous or criminal; good or bad.

Keep at the least within the compass of moral actions, which have in them vice or virtue. Hooker, Laws and ordinances positive he distinguishes from the laws of the two tables, which were moral.

Hooker.

In moral actions divine law helps exceedingly the law of reason to guide life, but in supernatural it alone guides.

Hooker.
Now, brandish'd weapons glitt'ring in their hands,
Mankind is broken loose from moral bands;
No rights of hospitality remain,
The guest, by him who harbour'd him, is slain.

Dryden.
2. Reasoning or instructing with regard to vice and virtue.

France spreads his banners in our noiseless land,
With plumed helm they slay 's begins his threats,
Whilst thou, a moral fool, sit'st still and criest.

Shakespeare.
3. Popular; customary; such as is known or admitted in the general business of life.

Physical and mathematical certainty may be styled infallible; and moral certainty may properly be styled indubitable.

We have found, with a moral certainty, the seat of the Monachal abys. Burnet, Th. of the Earth.

Mathematical things are capable of the strictest demonstration; conclusions in natural philosophy are capable of proof by an induction of experiments; things of a moral nature by moral arguments, and matters of fact by credible testimony.

Tillotson, Scrm.
A moral universality, is when the predicate agrees to the greatest part of the particulars which are contained under the universal subject.

Watts, Logic.

MORAL. * n. s.

1. Morality; practice or doctrine of the duties of life: this is rather a French than English sense.

Their moral and oeconomy, Prior.
Most perfectly they made agree, by a fiction;

2. The doctrine inculcated by a fiction; the accommodation of a fable to form the morals.

— Benedictus? why benedictus? you have some moral in this benedictus.

— Moral! No, by my troth I have no moral meaning; I meant plain holy thistle.

Shakespeare, Much Ado.
Expound the meaning or moral of his signs and tokens.

Shakespeare, Twelfth of the Street.
The moral is the first business of the poet, as being the ground-work of his instruction; this being formed, he contrives such a design or fable as may be most suitable to the moral.

Dryden, Dufrenoy.
I found a moral first, and then studied for a fable, but could do nothing that pleased me.

Swift to Gay.
To MORAL. v. n. [from the adjective.]

To moralize; to make moral reflections. Not in use.

When I did hear
The motley fool thus moral on the time,
My lungs began to crow like chanticleer,
That fools should be so deep contemplative. Shaks.

MORALER. * n. s. [from moral.] A moralizer. Not in use.

Comer, you are too severe a moralizer.

Shakespeare, Othello.

MORALIST. * n. s. [moralist, Fr.]

1. One who teaches the duties of life.

I have often heard my truly noble and most dear nephew, Sir Edmund Bacon, say, out of his exquisite contemplations and philosophical practices, that Nature surely, if she be well studied, is the best moralist, and hath much good counsel hidden in her bosom.

Watson on Education.
The advice given by a great moralist to his friend was, that he should compose his passions; and let that be the work of reason, which would certainly be the work of time.

Additional.

2. A mere moral man.

The love [in the moralist of virtue, but in the Christian] of God himself.

Hemans, Works, iv. 504.

How severely, though blindly, do they judge of men's hearts! Such a man is profane, another is carnal, and a mere moralist.

South, Scrm. vii. 286.
MORALIST. * n. s. [moralist, Fr. from moral.]

1. The doctrine of the duties of life; ethics.

The system of morality, to be gathered out of the writings of ancient sages, falls very short of that delivered in the gospel.

Swift, Miscell.
A necessity of sinning is as impossible in morality, as any the greatest difficulty can be in nature.

Baker on Learning.
2. The form of an action which makes it the subject of reward, or punishment.

The morality of an action is founded in the freedom of that principle, by virtue of which it is in the agent's power, having all things ready and requisite to the performance of an action, either to perform or not perform it.

Smith, Scrm.
3. An old kind of drama; an allegorical play, in which the virtues and vices were personified. [moralists, old Fr.]

The moralists indicate drawings of the dramatic art; they contain some rudiments of a plot, and even attempt to delineate characters, and so point manners.

Warton, Hist. E. P. li. 242.
Even after the people had been accustomed to tragedies and comedies, moralists still kept their ground: one of them, entitled The New Custom, was produced so late as 1573; at length they assumed the name of Masques.

By. Percy, Ess. on the Orig. of the Eng. Stage.
This [Hick-Scorner], and every morality I have seen, conclude with a solemn prayer.

Ibid.
MORALIZATION. * n. s. [from moralize.]

Explanation in a moral sense.

It is the more commendable, and also commendous, if the players have read the moralization of the chess, and when they play do think upon it.

Sir T. Elyot, Gov. fol. 61. b.
Annoted to be a moralization of twice the length in the octavo stanza. Almost every narrative was antiently supposed or made to be allegorical, and to contain a moral meaning.

Warton, Hist. E. P. iii. 417.

To MORALIZE. * v. a. [moralize, Fr.]

1. To make moral. This primary meaning is overpassed by Dr. Johnson.

Good and bad starts moralize not our actions.

Dromed, Chr. Mor. iii. 7.
The goodness of these actions is never to be estimated merely by the degree of enthusiasm and ardor that is in them, but by such other laws and circumstances as moralize human actions.

Cudworth, Scrm. p. 28.
Those laws and circumstances which do moralize human actions, and render them reasonable, and holy, and good.

Scott's Works, (ed. 1718), ii. 139.

2. To apply to moral purposes; to explain in a moral sense.

He 'as left me here behind to expound the meaning or moral of his signs and tokens.

— I pray thee moralize them.

Shakespeare, Tim. of the Shrew.
Did he not moralize this spectacle?

— O yes, into a thousand similes. Shakespeare.
This fable is moralized in a common proverb.

L'Estrange.
3. In Spenser it seems to mean, to furnish with manners or examples.

Fierce warres and faithful loves shall moralize my song.

Spenser, F. Q.

4. In Prior, who imitates the foregoing line, it has a sense not easily discovered, if indeed it has any sense.

High as their trumpets tune his lyre he strung,
And with his pious arms he moraliz'd his song.
Prior.

To MORALIZE, v. n. To speak or write on moral subjects.

When my friend was alone with me there, Isaac, said he, I know you come abroad only to moralize,
and make observations.
Tuldr, No. 170.

MORALIZER, n. s. [from moralize; Fr. moraliseur.] One who moralizes.

Sherwood.

MORALLY, adv. [from moral.]

1. In the ethical sense.
By good, good morally so called, bonum honestum, ought chiefly to be understood; and that the good of profit or pleasure, the bonum utile or jucundum, hardly come into any account here.
South, Serm.

Because this, of the two brothers killing each other, is an action morally unnatural; therefore, by way of preparation, the tragedy would have begun with heaven and earth in disorder, something physically unnatural.
Rymer.

2. According to the rules of virtue.
To take away rewards and punishments, is only pleasing to a man who resolves not to live morally.
Dryden.

3. Popularly; according to the common occurrences of life; according to the common judgement made of things.
It is morally impossible for an hypocrite to keep himself long upon his guard.
L'Estrange.

I am from the nature of the things themselves morally certain, and cannot make any doubt of it, but that a mind free from passion and prejudice is more fit to pass a true judgement than such a one as is biased by affections and interests.

The concurring accounts of many such witnesses render it morally, or, as we might speak, absolutely impossible that these things should be false.
Aitberrig, Serm.

MORALS, n. s. [without a singular.] The practice of the duties of life; behaviour with respect to others.

Some, as corrupt in their morals as vice could make them, have yet been solicitous to have their children soberly, virtuously, and piously brought up.
South, Serm.

Learn then what morals critics ought to shew:
'Tis not enough wit, art, and learning join;
In all you speak, let truth and candour shine.
Pope.

MORA'SS, n. s. [morais, French. Dr. Johnson.—Rather the Goth. marisaine, whence morais, Su. stagnum. See MARSH. Our word was, in 1656, reckoned by P. Heylin new and uncouth.]
Fen; bog; moor.

Landscapes point out the fairest and most fruitful spots, as well as the rocks, and wildernesses, and morasses of the country. Watts on the Mind.

Nor the deep morass
Refuse, but through the shaking wilderness
Pick your nice way. Thomson, Autumn.

MORA'SS, adj. [from morass.] Moorish; marshy; fenny.

The wind, by which they are brought on, generally comes from a morass country.

Dryden on the Plagues of Egypt, P. III.
The sides and top are covered with morass earth. Fennell.

MORAVIAN, n. s. One of a religious sect of Moravian and Bohemian brethren, which was founded in the fifteenth century. In modern times, one of the united brethren, who are followers of Count Zinzendorf, a German nobleman; called also Herrnhuters. The gross fanaticism of these persons, in some opinions and practices, has been warmly asserted; as have also their quiet demeanour, and their undaunted courage in communicating the light of revealed religion to the most remote and uncivilized parts of the world.

The Moravians who retired to Herrnhut, and who are the most inconsiderable part of the inhabitants of that village, have nothing common with the ancient Bohemian and Moravian brethren.

Rimius, Narr. of the Herrnhuters, (1755), p. 14.
A conformity has been shown between Moravians and Papists.

By, Lawrence, Morav. Compared, (1755), p. 177.
MORAVIAN, adj. Denoting, or belonging to, the sect of Moravians.

I thought it would answer the same purpose, should I consult the writings of the Moravian leaders.
Rimius, Narrative, &c. Pref. p. 6.

MORRIBID, n. s. [morbidus, Lat.] Diseased; in a state contrary to health.

Though every human constitution is morbid, yet there are diseases consistent with the common functions of life.
Arbutnot.

MORRIBNESS, n. s. [from morbid.] State of being diseased.

MORRIBUS, adj. [morbus and facio, MORRIBUS, adj. Latin; moribique, Fr.] Causing diseases.

Some strange moribund distemper of the air.
Whitlock, Mann. of the Engl. (1654), p. 326.
Nothing but the removal of the feverish and moribund matter within can carry off the distemper.
South, Serm., v. 211.

The air appearing so malicious in this moribund conspiracy, exacts a more particular regard; therefore initiate consumptions must change their air.
Harvey on Consumptions.

This disease is cured by the critical resolution, concoction, and evacuation of the moribund matter.
Arbutnot.

MORBORE, adj. [morbus, Lat.] Proceeding from disease; not healthy.

Malignity, under galls, comprehends all preternatural and morbose tumours and excrescences of plants.
Ray on Creation.

MORBO'SITY, n. s. [from morbus, Lat.] Diseased state. A word not in use.

The inference is fair, from the organ to the quality, that they have eyes, therefore some sight was designed, if we except the casual impediments or morbidities in individuals.
Brown.

MORDACIOUS, adj. [mordax, Lat.] Biting; apt to bite.

Many of these [composts] are not only sensibly hot, but mordacious and burning. Evelyn's Earth.

MORDACIOUSLY, adv. [from mordacious.] Bitingly; sarcastically.
Buchanan, a learned though violent Scot, has mordaciously taunted this tradition.

Waterhouse on Fortunatus, p. 901.
MORDACIOUS, adj. [mordacius, Lat. mordax, Fr. from mordax, Lat.] Biting quality.

It is to be enquired, whether there be any menstrum to dissolve any metal that is not fretting or corrodig, and openeth the body by sympathy, and not by mordacity, or violent penetration.
Becon.

Its [the serpent's] rancorous venom, its keen mordacity.
Barrow, Works, i. 46.

MORDACIAN, n. s. [from mordacian.] Biting quality.

The mordaciousness thus allayed, be sure to make the mortar clean.
Evelyn, Act. § 57.

MORDICANT, adj. [mordax, Lat. mordicant, Fr.] Biting; acrid.

He presumes, that the mordicant quality of bodies must proceed from a fiery ingredient, whereas the light and inflammable parts must be driven away by that time the fire has reduced the body to ashes.
Boyle.

MORDICATION, n. s. [from mordicant.] The act of corroding or biting.

Another cause is mordication of the orifices, especially of the secretory veins; as any thing that is sharp and biting doth provoke the part to expel, and mustard provoketh sweating.
Becon, Nat. Hist.

MORE, adj. [mape, Saxon; the comparative of some or great. Dr. Johnson.—Mr. Tooke views the Sax. mope, a heap, as the radical word; supposing the Sax. ma, Engl. mo, to be the positive, Sax. mape, Engl. more, the comparative, and Sax. mæp, Engl. most, the superlative. But not to say that mope does not seem to have been used to denote quantity in general, or applied to persons, the hypothesis labours under several considerable difficulties. The first is, that mo never occurs in Saxon, but always ma; which has been corruptly changed in later times into mo, like many other words originally written with a. But besides this, the Sax. ma is as really a comparative as mare, both being used adverbially in the sense of plus, magis. As an adjective, mare properly denotes superiority in size, or in quality, major; ma, superiority in number, as plures. This word, even as changed into mo, has been always used in the same manner. Dr. Jamieson, in V. Ma.]

1. In greater quantity; in greater degree. Who got not that wrong with more contempt.
Shakespeare.
These kind of knives in this palaces
Harbour more craft, and more corrupter ends
Than twenty silly ducking observants.
Shakespeare.
'their riches were more than that they might dwell together. Gen. xliii. 7.
Let more work be laid upon the man, that they may labour.
Erod. v. 9.
Then crown my joys, or cure my pain;
Give me more love, or more disdain.
Corne.

2. In greater number. [The comparative of some or many.]

He had so many languages in store,
That only time shall speak of him in more.
Cowley.

3. Greater. Now out of use.

Of India the more and the less. Manderley.
Both more and less have given him the reward.
Shakespeare.

The more part advised to depart. Acts, xxi. 12.

4. Added to some former number.

One more citizen to yield give.
Dryden.
I'm tir'd of rhyming, and would fain give o'er,
But Matamoras demands one labour more.
Addison.

Great Dryden's friends believed,
With open arms receiv'd one poet more.
Page.

MORE. adv.

1. To a greater degree.

He loved Rachel more than Leah.

Gen. xlix. 30.

The spirits of animate bodies are all, in some degree, more or less kindled. Bacon, Nat. Hist.
Some were of opinion, that feeling more and more in himself the weight of time, he was not unwilling to bestow upon another some part of the pains. Watson.

The more the kindled combat rises higher, The more by fire burns the blazing fire.

Dryden, Æd.

As the blood passeth through narrower channels, the redness disappears more and more.

Arbutnot on Aliments.

The more God has blessed any man with estate or quality, just so much less in proportion is the care he takes in the education of his children. Swift, Miscell.

2. The particle that forms the comparative degree.

I am fall'n out with my more header will, To take the Indispos'd and sickly fit

Shakespeare, A. Lear.

For the sound man, May you long live a happy instrument for your king and country: happy here, and more happy hereafter. Bacon.

The advantages of learning are more lasting than those of mirth. Cadell on Pride.

3. Again; a second time.

Little did I think I should ever have business of this kind on my hands more. Tatler.

4. Longer; yet continuing; with the negative particle.

Cassius is no more! Oh, setting sun! As in thy red rays thou dost sink to-night, So in his red blood Cassius' day is set. Shake.

MORE. n. s. [A kind of comparative from more or much.]

1. A greater quantity; a greater degree. Perhaps some of the examples which are adduced under the adverb, with the before more, should be placed here; but I rather think the more to be adverbial.

Were I king,

I should cut off the nobles for their lands;

And my more having would be as a success

To make us hunger more. Shakespeare, Macbeth.

An heretic poem requires more of the active spirit of war; and as much or more of the active spirit than the suffering. Dryden.

The Lord do so, and much more, to Jonathan. I Sam.

From hence the greatest part of ill proceeds, When less of getting more will have no end. Dryden.

They that would have more and more can never have enough; no, not if a miracle should interpose to gratify their avarice. L'Estrange.

A mariner having let down a large portion of his sounding line, he reaches no bottom, whereby he knows the depth to be so many fathoms more; but how much that more is, he hath no distinct notion. Locke.

2. Greater thing; other thing.

They who so state a question, do no more but separate the parts of it one from another, and lay them so in their due order. Locke.

3. Second time; longer time.

They steer'd their course to the same quiet shore, Not parted long, and now to part no more. Pope.

4. It is doubtful whether the word, in this use, be a noun or adverb.

The dove returned not again unto any more. Gen. viii.

Pr'ythee be satisfy'd; I shall be aided, Or I'll no more be king. Dryden, Cleom.

Delia, the queen of love, let all deplore! Delia, the queen of beauty, is now no more. Wals.

To MORE. To make more. Obsolete.

What will make more, be moreth.

Gower, Conf. Am. B. 7.

MORE. n. s. [Saxon mop, a mountain.]

1. A hill. North. Hence the Staffordshire morelands or morlands. See MORZLAND.

2. A root. [Saxon mopan, bacca, semina-Sommer.] Used in Gloucestershire; as a moring-axe is for an axe to grub up the roots of trees. Graze.

"Tenne thousand mords of sundry seed and beu." Spenser, E. Q. vi. viii. 10. In Hughes's edition 'tis spell more. We use the word more in the west of England for roots, &c.

Upton, Note on Spenser.

MOREN. n. s. A kind of stuff used for curtains and bed-hangings.

MORÉL. n. s. [morille, French.]

1. A kind of mushroom, as Cotgrave describes it; or rather a kind of fungus, the external part of which is cellular, and resembles a honey-comb. It is a great delicacy at the table, when eaten fresh, and is also preserved and dried for culinary purposes. Gay has well described this vegetable by the title of spongy.

Spongy morels in strong ragousts are found, And in the soup the slimy snail is drown'd.

Gay, Trivia.

2. A kind of cherry. [μαύρις, Greek, black. Littleton.]

Morel is a black cherry, fit for the conservatory before it be too thorough ripe; for it is better eaten raw. Mortimer.

MORELAND. n. s. [mopland, Saxon; mop, a mountain, and land.] A mountainous or hilly country: a tract of Staffordshire is called the Morlands, from being hilly.

MORENESS. n. s. [from more.] Greatness. Obsolete. See the third sense of the adjective more.

Moreness of Christ's vicars is not measured by worldly moreness.

Wicliffe, Lett. in Lewis's Life of W. p. 284.

MOREOVER. adv. [from more and over.] Beyond what has been mentioned; besides: likewise; also; over and above.

Moreover he hath left you all his walks. Shakspeare.

He did hold me dear

Above this world; adding thereto, moreover, That he would wed me, or else die my lover.

Shakspeare.

Moreover by them is thy servant warned.

Psalm xix. 11.

MORESK. adj. [morezque, French, from Maurus, Latin.] Done after the manner of the Moors; a term applied to a kind of antique carving and painting; "morek work, feuillage morezque." See Cotgrave in V. MOREZQUE. It is oftener written morezque.

They trim it with paint after the moresque manner. St. Herbert, Tract. p. 129.

A piece of as good Morezque work as any I had yet seen. Baillie, Tract. L. 31.

MORGLAY. n. s. A deadly weapon. Ainsworth. Glaive and more, French, and gley schür, Erse, a two-handed broadsword, which some centuries ago was the Highlander's weapon.

A trusty morgay in a rusty sheath.

Cleveland, Poems, &c. p. 15.

To MORIGERATE. v. n. [morigero, Latin, from more and gero; morigerare, Ital.] To do as one is commanded; to obey. This pedantic word is in the old vocabulary of Cockermar, and was probably in use. Bacon, we see, considered morigeration as a servicable word. And Dr. Johnson thought fit to give morigerous, though without any authority; which, however, is in the enlarged edition of Bullokar's Expositor in 1626.

MORIGERATION. n. s. [morigeratio, Lat.] Obedience; obsequiousness.

Not that I can tax or condemn the morigeration or application of learned men to men in fortune.

Bacon, Adv. of Learning, B. 1.

Courtesy and morigeration will gain mighty upon them. Howell, Instruct. For. Trav. p. 59.

MORIGEROUS. adj. [moriger, Lat.] Obedient; obsequious; civil. Bullokar.

MORION. n. s. [French.] A helmet; armour for the head; a casque.

For all his majesty's ships a proportion of swords, targets, morions, and coats of proof should be allowed. Raleigh.

Polish'd steel that cast the view aside, And crested morions with their plummy pride.

Dryden.

MORISCO. n. s. [morisco, Spanish, more, risque, old French.]

1. The Moorish language.

He, leaning in first of all, set hand to his fashion, and said in morisco, Let one of you that are here stir. — The Moors, hearing their master say so, were marvellously amazed. Sheldon, D. Quinde, ix. 14.

2. A dance after the manner of the Moors, often written morris, but sometimes more properly morezque. Morezque, morisk, morez, seems an easy deduction; though morez is also an old word for moorish.

To this purpose were taken up at Rome these foreign exercises of vaulting and dancing the morezque. Hakewell on Providence, p. 365.

The lady and her companions, attended with music and a morezque-dance of men.

Houart, Anc. Tem. p. 149.

3. A dancer of the moorish or moorish-dance.

I have seen him

Caper upright like a wild morezque, Shaking the bloody darts, as he his tells.

Shakspeare, Hen. VI. P. II.

Your wit skips a morezque.

Morison, What you will, (1607.)

MORISCO. adj. Applied to carving and painting. See MORESK.

MORSKIN. n. s. [Dr. Johnson cites this word from Bailey, without etymology or example. The word is old; and agrees with the Swedish murken, rotten, from murkna, to rot.] A wild beast, dead through sickness or mischance.

Not a wild beast alone, but a sheep, — Some sorry morisk that outlives his day.

Ry. Hall, Sat.

MORLING. n. s. [mork, French.] Wool

MORTLING. [plucked from a dead sheep. Ainsworth.

MORMO. n. s. [морь, Russian.] Bugbear; false terror.

The belief of a judgement day is no panick fear, or melancholy dream: 'tis no trick of politicians, or morose of priests to fright fools and keep the world in awe, but a truth as certain and undoubted as the oracles of truth can make it.

Gloucester, Sermon, p. 306.

All the rest is plagiatically passed over with a "simul, id quod, &c." as only the morosus and bugbears of a frightened rabble.

Warburton on Predicatio, p. 80.

MORN.† n. s. [Goth. maurgins; Icel. morgen, myrgen; Sax. morgen, mepzen, mepien, mepne, mapne, noipne. Mr. H. Tooke derives this substantive from the Goth. merjan, Sax. meppan, myppan, to spread abroad, to dissipate, to scatter; "morrow therefore and morn (the former being the past tense of myppan, with the addition of the participial termination en), have both the same meanings, viz. dissipated, dispersed. And whenever either of those words is used by us, clouds or darkness are understood; whose dispersion, or the time when they are dispersed, it expresses. Div. of Purl. ii. 214. Dr. Jamieson views the Gothic maurgins as allied to the verb maurgan, to shorten: as the dawn of morning shortens the reign of darkness, or culls off the night. The term is used by Ulph. St. Mark, xiii. 20. he adds, expressly with respect to time: "gamurgida thana dagans," he hath shortened the days: the days referred to are those of darkness in a figurative sense. Mr. Tooke's is the more natural deduction. And thus the Latin mane has been traced to the Greek μαῖν, clear, which is from the verb μαίνομαι, to rarify, to make clear. I may further observe the concurrent sentiment of our great poet, in the morning hymn of Adam and Eve:

"If the night
"Have gather'd aught of evil, or
"conceal'd,
"Disperse it, as now light dispels the "dark.]"

The first part of the day: the morning. Morn is not used but by the poets.

The cock, that is the trumpet to the morn,
Dubs with his hoity and shrill-sounding throat,
Awake the god of day. Shakespeare, Hamlet.
Where you might sleep beyond the morn. Lee.
Friendship shall still thy evening feasts adorn,
And blooming peace shall ever bless thy morn. Prior.

MORNING.† n. s. [morgen, Saxon, but our morning seems rather to come from morn. Dr. Johnson.—Wynne is the regular present participial of myppan: for which we had formerly morewende. The present participial termination ende is, in modern English, always converted to ing. Hence morewending, morwing, and by an easy corruption morning. Mr. H. Tooke, Div. of Purl. ii. 215. See MORNE.] The first part of the day, from the first appearance of light to the end of the first fourth part of the sun's daily course.

One master Brook hath sent you worship a morning's draught of sack.

Shakespeare, M. Wives of Windsor.

By the second hour in the morning,
Desire the earl to see me. Shakespeare, Rich. III.
Morn'ing by morn'ing shall it pass over.

What shall become of us before night, who are weary so early in the morning? Law.

Ep. Taylor, Guide to Devotion.

The morning is the proper part of the day for study.

Every morning sees her early at her prayers,
she rejoices in the beginning of every day, because it begins all her pious rules of holy living, and brings the fresh pleasures of repeating them. Law.

MORNING. adj. Being in the early part of the day.

She looks as clear

As morning roses newly wash'd with dew. Shakspeare.
Your goodness is as a morning cloud, and as the early dew it goeth away. Hos. vi. 5.

Let us go down after the Philistines by night, and spoil them until the morning light. 1 Sam. xiv. 56.

The twining jasmine and blushing rose,
With lavish grace their morning scents disclose. Prior.

All the night they stem the liquid way,
And end their voyage with the morning ray. Pope, Odyssey.

MORNING-GOWN. n. s. A loose gown worn before one is formally dressed.

Seeing a great many in rich morning gowns, he was amazed to find that persons of quality were up so early. Addison.

MORNING-STAR. n. s. The planet Venus when she shines in the morning.

Bright as dush the morning-star appear,
Out of the East, with flaming locks bedight,
To tell the dawning day is drawing near. Spenner, F. Q.

MOROCCO.† n. s. A fine sort of leather, of various colours; the preparation of which is said to have been borrowed from the kingdom of Morocco. The word is sometimes written like the French term, marroquin.

MOROSE.† adj. [morosus, Latin. Dr. Johnson.—This word is not of great age in our language. Dr. Johnson has found no earlier usage of it than that in the example from Addison. I find it nearly in the Latin form, morosus, in 1616; and in 1662, morose; employed by the authors for ungovernable.]

1. Ungovernable; licentious. Not now in use.

Daily experience either often relapses, or morosus desires.

Selden, Miracles of Antichrist, (1616), p. 301.

In this commandment are forbidden all that feeds this life, [solutary], or are incentives to as luxurious diet; inflaming wiles; an idle life; morose thoughts, that dwell in the faculty with delight.

Ep. Nicholson, Essay of the Duties, (1662), p. 123.

2. Sour of temper: peevish; sullen.
Without these pretences, the man degenerates into a cynic, the woman into a coquette; the man grows sullen and morose, the woman impetuous. Addison, Spectator.

Some have deserved censure for a morose and affected taciturnity, and others have made speeches, though they had nothing to say.

Watts, Improv. of the Mind.

MOROSELV. adv. [from morose.] Sourly; peevishly.

Too many are as morosely positive in their age, as they were childishly so in their youth.

Com. of the Tongue.

MOROSENESS. n. s. [from morose.] Sourness; peevishness.

Thine cure that no sourness and moroseness mingle with our serious frame of mind. Newton.

Learn good humour, never to agree without just reason; abate some degrees of pride and moroseness. Watts.

MOROSITY.† n. s. [morositas, Fr. Cotgrave; morositas, Latin; from morose.] Moroseness; sourness; peevishness.

Why then be sad,

But entertain no morosity, brothers, other than a joint burden laid upon you. Shakespeare
This morosity and villousness is far from being imitable and laudable.

Ep. Taylor, Sermon, (1653), p. 294.

Some morosities

We must expect, since jealousy belongs To age, of scorn, and tender sense of wrongs. Denham.

The pride of this man, and the popularity of that; the levity of one, and the morosity of another.

Is not a morosity and singularity in such things often made a veil and cover of licentiousness in greater things? Smyth, Sermon, (1677), p. 16.

MORPHEUS.† n. s. [morpheus, French; morpheus, low Lat. morpha, Ital.] A scurf on the face.

We shall then see the shameful wrinkles and foul morpheus of our soul.

Ep. Hall, Fall of Pride.

TO MORPHEUS.† v. a. [from the noun.] To cover with scurf.

And sullen rage bewray his morpheus's skin.

Ep. Hall, St. Paul's Adv.

The face that was fair, is now distorted and morpheus'd. Ep. Hall, St. Paul's Combat.

MORRIS.† n. s. [that is moorish or MORRIS-DANCE.] moorish-dance.

1. A dance in which bells are ginged, or staves or swords clashed, which was learned by the Moors, and was probably a kind of Pyrrhic or military dance.

The queen stood to some doubt of a Spanish invasion, though it proved but a moorish-dance upon our wares. Wotton.

One in his catalogue of a feigned library, sets down this title of a book. The morris-dance of heretics. Bacon.

The sounds and seas, with all their fony dore, Now to the moon in wattering moorish morn. Milton, Comus.

I took delight in pieces that shewed a country village, moorish-dance, and peasants together by the cart. Pucknam.

The vulgar sort [of Persians] delight in moorish-dance. Sir T. Herbert, Trav. p. 304.

The ditrambus was a kind of extatic moorish-dance. Strlingford, Orig. Sec. ii. 4.

Four rappers danced a moorish to oasts pipe. Spectator.

2. Nine men's MORRIS. A kind of play with nine holes in the ground. It is called also meris, and five-penny morris. The game is played with stones in England, but in France with pawns or men made on purpose, called merelles, which Mr. Tollet thinks "to have been originally black, and therefore so termed; as we call a black cherry a morello, and a small black cherry a merry; perhaps from Maurus, a moor, or rather from morum, a mulberry."

The folds stand empty in the drowned field,
And crows are fattened with the mountain flock;
The nine morn's morris is filled up with mad.

Shakespeare, Midw. N. Dream.

Nine morn's morrice is a game still played by the shepherds, cowkeepers, &c. in the midland counties, as follows: A fife (of squares, one within another), is made on the ground by cutting out the turf; and two persons take each nine stones, which they place by turns in the angles, and afterwards more alternately, as at chess or draughts. He who can play three in a straight line may then take off any one of his adversary's, where he pleases, till one, having lost all his men, loses the game.

Alchorno, Note on Shakespeare.

MORRIS-DANCE. n. s. [morris and dance].
One who dances à la morrice, the morrisian dance.

There went about the country a set of morris-dancers, composed of ten men, who danced a maid marian and a tabor and pipe.

Tenby.

MORRIS-PIKE. n. s. [morris and pike].
A Moorish pike; a formidable weapon used by the Moors.

He that sets up his rest to do more exploits with his name, than a morris-pike.

Shakespeare, Com. of Err.

The English mariners laid about them with brown bills, lubbers, and morrice-pikes.

Baynard, Delle, of cert. Christians from the Turks.

MORROW. n. s. [See the etymon of MORROW.] The original meaning of morrow seems to have been morning, which being often referred to on the preceding day, was understood in time to signify the whole day next following.

1. The morning; the primary meaning.
Upon a morrow tide. Gower, Conf. Am. B. S.
The when appeared the third morrow bright
Upon the waves to spread her trembling light
An hideous roaring far away they heard.
Spenser, F. Q. ii. xli. 8.
She's white as morrow's milk, or flakes new blown
Bp. Hall, Sat. i. 7.
The pale rose her colour lost renova
With the fresh drops fall'n from the silver morrow.
Chapman, Tass. xl. 129.

I would not buy
Their mercy at the price of one fair word;
To have't with saying, good morrow.

Shakespeare, Coriol.

2. The day after the present day.
Thou
Canst pluck ought from me but not lend a morrow.
Shakespeare, Titus.
The Lord did that thing on the morrow.
Exod. ix. 6.

Peace, good reader, do not weep,
Peace, the lovers are asleep.
Let them sleep, let them sleep on,
Till this story might be gone,
And the eternal morrow dawn,
Then the curtains will be drawn,
And they waken with the light,
Whose days shall never sleep in night.
To morrow you will live, you always cry,
In what far country doth this morrow lie?
That 'tis so mighty long 'er it arrive,
Beyond the Indies doth this morrow live?
'Tis so far fetch'd this morrow, that I fear
'Twill be both very old and very dear.
To morrow will I live, the fool does say,
To day itself's too late, the wise I'll yesterday.

Cowley.

3. To MORROW. [This is an idiom of the same kind, supposing morrow to mean originally morning; as to night: to day.]
On the day after this current day.

To morrow comes; 'tis noon; 'tis night;
This day like all the former flings;
Yet on he runs to seek delight
To morrow, till to night he dies.

Prior.

4. To MORROW is sometimes, I think, improperly used as a noun.

Our yesterday's to morrow now is gone,
And still a new to morrow does come on.
We by to morrow draw out all our store,
Till the exhausted well can yield no more.

Cowley.

To morrow is the time when all is to be rectified.

Spectator.

MORSEL. n. s. [phoca]. A sea-horse.

That which is commonly called a sea-horse is properly called a morsel, and makes not out that shape.

It seems to have been a tusk of the morse or walron, called by some the sea-horse.

Woodward on Fossils.

MORSELL. n. s. [morsellus, low Lat. from morsus. Dr. Johnson.—We have the word from the ancient French morsel or morsel.]

1. A piece fit for the mouth; a mouthful.
Yet can't thou to a morsel of this feast,
Having fully din'd before. Shakespeare, Coriol.
And he my parent would full soon devour
For want of other prey, but knows that I Should prove a bitter morsel, and his bane.

Milton, P. L.

Every morsel to a satisfied hunger, is only a new labour to a tired digestion.

South, Sermon.

He boils the flesh,
And lays the mangled morsels in a dish. Dryden.

A wretch is prisoner made,
Whose flesh turn off by lumps, the ravenous foe
In morsels cut to make it further go. Tate, Jun.

A letter to the keeper of the lion requested that it may be the first morsel put into his mouth.

Addison.

2. A piece; a meal.
On these herbs, and fruits and flowers,
Feed first; on each boast next, and fish and fowl,
No homely morsels! Milton, P. L.
A dog crossing a river with a morsel of flesh in his mouth, saw, as he thought, another dog under the water, upon the very same adventure.

L'Estrange.

3. A small quantity. Not proper.
Of the morsels of native and pure gold, he had seen some weighed many pounds.

Boyle.

MORSURE. n. s. [morsure, French; morsura, Latin. The act of biting.

MORT. n. s. [morte, French].
1. A tune sounded at the death of the game.

To be making practis'd smiles,
As in a looking-glass, and to sigh, as 'twere
The heart o' the deer; oh, that is entertainment
My bosom likes best. Shakespeare, Wint. Tale.

2. [Mort, Icelandic.] A great quantity. Not in elegant use, but preserved colloquially in many parts.

3. A salmon in the third year of its growth, no called by fishermen in some parts of England.

MORTAL. adj. [mortalis, Lat. mort., Fr.].

1. Subject to death; doomed sometime to die.

Nature does require

Her times of preservation, which, perforce,
I her frail son amongst my brethren mortal Must give my attendance to.

Shakespeare, Hen. VIII.

This corruptible must put on incorruption, and this mortal must put on immortality.

1 Cor. xv. 53.

Heavenly powers, where shall we find such love!
Which of ye will be mortal to redeem
Man's mortal crime, and just, the unjust to save?

Milton, P. L.

The day thou eat'st thereof, my sole command
Transgress'd, inevitably thou shalt die;
From that day mortal; and this happy state Shalt lose. Milton, P. L.

2. Deadly; destructive; procuring death.

Come all you spirits

That tend on mortal thoughts, unsex me here,
And fill me from the crown to the toe, top-full
Of cruelty. Shakespeare, Macbeth.

The mortalists poison practised by the West Indians, have some mixture of the blood, fat, or flesh of man. Bacon.

Of that forbidden tree, whose mortal taste
Brought death into the world and all our woe.

Milton, P. L.

Some circumstances have been great discouragers of trade, and others are absolutely fatal to it.

Tenby.

Hope not, base man! on queston'd hence to go,
For I am Palamon, thy mortal foe. Dryden.

3. Inferring death.

Save in the hand of one disposing power,
Or in the natal or the mortal hour.

Pope, Ess. on Man.

4. Inferring divine condemnation; not venial.

Though every sin of itself be mortal, yet all are not equally mortal; but some more, some less fatal. Perkins.

5. Human; belonging to man.

They met me in the day of success; and I have learned by the perfected report, they have more in their hand than mortal knowledge. Shakespeare, Macbeth.

Shall live the lease of nature, pay his breath
To time and mortal custom. Shakespeare, Macbeth.

The voice of God

To mortal ear is dreadful; if they beecher,
That Moses might report to them his will,
And terror speak.

Milton, P. L.

Success, the mark no mortal wit,
Or surest hand, can always hit.

Dutcher.

No one enjoyment but is liable to be lost by ten thousand accidents, out of all mortal power to prevent.

South, Sermon.

6. Extreme; violent. A low word.

The birds were in a mortal apprehension of the beetles, all the sparrow reasoned them into understanding.

L'Estrange.

The nymph grew pale, and in a mortal fright,
Spent with the labour of so long a fight;
And now despairing, cast a mournful look Upon the streams. Dryden.

MORTAL. n. s.

1. Man; human being.

Warn poor mortals left behind. Tickett.

2. This is often used in ludicrous language.

I can behold no mortal new,
For what's an eye without a brow? Prior.

MORTALITY. n. s. [mortality, Lat. mort.].

1. Subject to death; state of a being subject to death.

When I saw her die,

I then did think no you mortality.
I point out mistakes in life and religion, that we might guard against the springs of error, guilt, and sorrow, which surround us in every state of mortality. Watts, Logic.

2. Death.

I beg mortality
Rather than life press'd with infamy. Shakespeare.

Gladly would I meet Mortality my sentence. Milton, P. L.

3. Power of destruction.

Mortality and mercy in Vienna
Live in thy tongue and heart. Shakespeare, Meas. for Meas.

4. Frequency of death.

The rise of keeping those accounts, first began in the year 1599, being a time of great mortality.

5. Human nature.

A single vision so transports them, that it makes up the happiness of their lives; mortality cannot bear it often.

Take these tears, mortality's relief,
And till we share your joys, forgive our grief.

To MOR'TALISE. * v. a. [from mortal.]

To make mortal.

We know you're flesh and blood as well as men,
And, when we will, can mortalize and make you so again.

MOR'TALLY. adv. [from mortal.]

1. Irrecoverably; to death.

In the battle of Landen you were not only dangerously, but in all appearance mortally wounded.

2. Extremely; to extremity. A low ludicrous word.

Adrian mortally envied poets, painters, and artificers, in works wherein he had a vein to excel.

Know all, who would pretend to my good grace,
I mortally dislike a damning face.

MOR'TAR. n. s. [from marte, Saxon; mortarium, Latin; mortier, French.]

1. A strong vessel in which materials are broken by being pounded with a pestle.

Except you could buy Christendom in a mortar, and mould it into a new paste, there is no possibility of an holy war.

The action of the diaphragm and muscles serves for the comminution of the meat in the stomach by their constant agitation upwards and downwards, resembling the pounding of materials in a mortar.

2. A short wide cannon, out of which bombs are thrown.

Those arms, which for nine centuries had braved
The wrath of time, on antique stone engrav'd,
Now torn by mortars stand yet undecid'd
On nobler trophies by thy valour rais'd.

MOR'TAR. n. s. [morter, Dutch; mortier, French.] Cement made of lime and sand with water, and used to join stones or bricks.

Mortar, in architecture, is a preparation of lime and sand mixed up with water, serving as a cement, and used by masons and bricklayers in building of walls of stone and brick. Wolfius observes, that the sand should be dry and sharp, so as to prick the hands when rubbed, yet not earthy, so as to foul the water it is washed in; he also finds fault with masons and bricklayers as committing a great error in letting their lime slacken and cool before they make up their mortar, and also in letting their mortar cool and die before they use it; therefore he advises, that if you expect your work to be well done, and to continue long, to work up the lime quick, and but a little at a time, that the mortar may not lie long before it be used.

I will tread this unbolthead villain into mortar,
And deub the wall of a jakes with him.

They had brick for stone, and lime for mortar.

Lime hot out of the kiln mixed soft with water, putting sand to it, will make better mortar than other.

MOR'TER. * n. s. [mortier, Fr. Cotgrave.] A lump or light; a chamber-lamp.

By that name which that I see burne,
Know I full well that day is not far hence.

Chaucer, Tr. and Cress. iv. 1245.

MORTGAGE. n. s. [mort and gage, Fr.]

1. A dead pledge; a thing put into the hands of a creditor.

The estate runs out, and mortgages are made,
Their fortune ruin'd, and their fame betray'd.

The Romans do not seem to have known the secret of paper credit, and securities upon mortgages.

The broker,
Bent on some mortgage, to avoid reproach,
He seeks bye-streets, and saves the expensive coach.

2. The state of being pledged.

The land is given in mortgage only, with full intention to be redeemed within one year.

Bacon, Off. of Alienation.
To MOR'TGAGE. † v. a. [from the noun.]

To pledge; to put to pledge; to make over to a creditor as a security.

Mortgaging their lives to covetise.
His land mortgag'd.
Let men contrive how they disentangle their mortgag'd souls.

They make the widows' mortgag'd of out their prey.

Their not sheding of their expensive way of living, has forced them to mortgage their best manors.

Some have his lands, but none his treasure's store,
Lands unmanor'd by us, and mortgag'd o'er and o'er.

MORTGAGE. n. s. [from mortgage.] He that takes or receives a mortgage.

An act may pass for publick registers of land, by which all purchasers or mortgagees may be secured of all monies they lay out.

MORTGAGE. n. s. [from mortgage.] One that gives a mortgage.

MORTIFYING. adj. [mortifier, Latin.] Fatal; deadly; destructive.

What is it but a continued perpetuated voice from heaven, to give men no rest in their sins, no quiet from Christ's importunity, till they awake from the lethargick sleep, and arise from so dead, so mortifying a state, and permit him to give them life.

These mournings, like a mortifying herb, are poisonous, even in their spring.

God of the Tongue.

MORTIFICATION. n. s. [mortification, Fr.; from mortify.]

1. The state of corrupting, or losing the vital qualities; gangrene.

It appeareth in the gangrene, or mortification of flesh, either by opistia, or intense cold.

My griefs ferment and rage,
Nor less then wounds immediate,
Beats in and festers, and gangrene,
To bleed mortification.

2. Destruction of active qualities.

Inquire what gives impediment to union or restitution, which is called mortification; as when quicksilver is mortified with turpentine.

3. The act of subduing the body by hardships and macerations.

A diet of some fish is more rich and alcalescent than that of flesh, and therefore very improper for such as practise mortification.

Arbuthnot on Aliments.
4. Humiliation; subjection of the passions.

The mortification of our lusts has something in it that troublesome, yet nothing that is unreasonable.

You see no real mortification, or self-denial, no eminent charity, no profound humility, no heavenly affection, no true contempt of the world, no Christian weakness, no sincere zeal, or eminent piety, in the common lives of Christians.

5. Vexation; trouble.

It is one of the venacious mortifications of a studious man, to have his thoughts disordered by a tedious visit.

We had the mortification to lose the sight of Munich, Augsburg, and Ratisbon.

Arbuthnot on Aliments.
MORTIFICATION. * n. s. [from mortified.] Humiliation; subjection of the passions.

No way suitable to that Christian simplicity, mortification, modesty, and humility, which those times required.

By Taylor, Artif. Handson. p. 114.
MORTIFIER. * n. s. [from mortify; Fr. mortifieur.] One who mortifies his passions.

To MORTIFY. † v. a. [mortifier, French.]

1. To destroy vital qualities.

If of the stem the frost mortify any part, cut it off.

To destroy active powers, or essential qualities.

What gives impediment to union or restitution is called mortification, as when quicksilver is mortified with turpentine or spirit.

He mortified pearls in vinegar, and drunk them up.

Oil of tartar per deliquium has a great facility to find out and mortify acid spirits.

3. To subdue inordinate passions.

The breath no sooner left his father's body,
But that his wilderness mortified in him,
Scem'd to die too.

Suppress thy knowing pride,
Mortify thy learned lust,
Vain are thy thoughts, while thou thyself art dust.

He modestly conjectures,
His pupil might be us'd with lectures,
Which help'd to mortify his pride.

4. To macerate or harass, in order to reduce the body to compliance with the mind.

Their dear causes
Would to the bleeding and the grim alarm Excite the mortified man.

We mortify ourselves with fast, and think we fare coarsely if we abstain from flesh.

Mortify'd he was to that degree,
A poorer than himself he would not see.

With fasting mortify'd, worn out with tears,
And bent beneath the load of seventy years.

5. To humble; to deprecate; to vex.

Let my liver cooler beat with wine,
Than my heart cool with mortifying groans.

He is controlled by a nod, mortified by a frown, and transported by a smile.

How often is the ambitious man mortified with the very praises he receives, if they do not rise so high as he thinks they ought?

To MORTIFY. v. n.
1. To gangrene; to corrupt.

dead flies with water cast upon them, to see whether it will putrify. Bacon.

2. To be subdued; to die away.

3. To practise religious severities.

This makes him careful of every temper of his heart, give aims to all that he bath, watch, and fast, and mortify, and live according to the strictest rules of temperance, meekness, and humanity. Lane.

MORTISE. n. s. [mortaise, mortoise, French.] A hole cut into wood that another piece may be put into it, and form a joint.

A fuller blast ne'er shook our battlements;

If it both ruffian'd us upon the sea,

What ribs of oak, when mountains melt on them, Can hold the mortice. Shakespeare, Othello.

Under one skin are parts variously mingled, some with cavities, as mortises to receive, others with tenons to fit cavities. Ray.

To MORTISE. v. a.

1. To cut with a mortise; to join with a mortice.

'Tis a many a weel,

To whose huge spoke ten thousand lesser things Are mortis'd and adjoin'd. Shakespeare, Hamlet.

The walls of spiders' legs are made,

Well mortis'd and finely laid. Dryden, Nymphs.

2. It seems in the following passage improperly used.

The one half of the ship being finished, and by help of a screw launched into the water, the other half was joined by great brass nails mortised with lead. Arbuthnot on Coins.

MORTMAIN. n. s. [mort and main, Fr.]

Such a state of possession as makes it unalienable; whence it is said to be in a dead hand, in a hand that cannot shift away the property.

It were meet that some small portion of lands were allotted since no more mortmain is to be looked for.

Either to entice the pallid dealers of us, [their face], and to redeem it from mortmain; or, to pair and match the unequal cheeks to each other.

By Taylor, Artif. Handson, p. 62.

Land in mortmain is a dead weight upon commerce. Warburton, Serm. 31.

MORTPAY. n. s. [mort and pay.] Dead pay; payment not made.

This parliament was merely a parliament of war, with some statutes conducing therunto; as the severe punishing of mortgages, and keeping back of soldiers' wages. Bacon.

MORTREUX. n. s. [from mortier de sagesse, French. Skimmer.] A dish of meat of various kinds benten together.

A mortreux made with the brains of capons, stamped, strained, and mingled with like quantity of almond butter, is excellent to nourish the weak. Bacon, Nat. Hist.

MORTUARY. n. s. [mortuaire, French; mortuarium, Latin.]

1. A burial-place. Not noticed by Dr. Johnson, or any of our lexicographers. See also the adjective mortuary.

Look on thy full table as a mortuary of the dispeopled elements; where their slain are huddled up. Walsingham, Mann. of the King, (1654), p. 36.

2. A gift left by a man at his death to his parish church, for the recompence of his personal titles and offerings not duly paid in his life-time. Harris. — Mortuaries are a kind of ecclesiastical heriots, being a customary gift claimed by and due to the minister in many many parishes on the death of his parishioners. They seem to have been originally, like lay heriots, only a voluntary bequest to the church. Blackstone.

MORTUARY.* adj. [mortuaire, French.] Belonging to the burial of the dead.

Near the pyramids and mortuary caves. Greenhill, Art of Engraving, p. 523.

MOSAIC. n. s. [mosaïque, French; MOSAÏCK.] supposed to be corrupted from mosaic, Latin. Dr. Johnson. —

Mosaic work, the opus musivum of the Latins; Gr. Barb. μωσα, tessella variè picturata; whence μωσαϊσμός, mosaicism, mosaicism. V. Meursius Gloss. Mosaic is a kind of painting in small pebbles, cockles, and shells of sundry colours; and of late days likewise with pieces of glass figured at pleasure; an ornament in truth, of much beauty, and long life, but of most use in pavements and floorings. Wotton, Architecture.

The trees were to them (the flowers) a pavilion, and they to the trees a mosaic floor. Sidney, Disc. b. 1.

Each beautiful flower,

Is all hues, roses, and jacinth,

The most remarkable remnant of it is a very beautiful mosaic pavement, the finest I have ever seen in marble; the parts are so well joined together, that the whole piece looks like a continued picture. Addison on Italy.

MOSAICAL.* adj. Denoting the writings MOSAÏCK. or law of Moses.

For his acquaintance with the Mosical learning, as it is more credible in itself, so I have also better proof. More, Conf. Calb. p. 188.

The Mosical sacrifices were types (and by both the dispensations of the Law and Gospel declared to be so) of the great vicarious sacrifice of the cross. Warburton, Div. Reg. ix. 2.

MOSCHATEL. n. s. [moschatellina, Latin.] A plant. Miller.

MOSKEREED.* adj. [maschel, mascher, Teut. macula, labes. Our word is also masked in the Craven Dialect. Grose gives this northern word in the form of moskered.] Rotten; decayed.

The teeth stand thin, or loose, or moskered at the root. Granger on Eccles. (1621), p. 320.

MOSQUEE. n. s. [mosquée, French; moschi, Turkish. Dr. Johnson. — From the Arab. masgid, a place of worship.] A Mahometan temple.

The very Turks have their mosques or places to pray in. Halcyon, Acc. of Fowling, (1673), p. 46.

In this mosque we saw several large incense-pots, candlesticks for altars, and other church-furniture, being the spoils of Christian churches at the taking of Cyprus. Mowbray, Trav. p. 14.

MOSSE. n. s. [muscus, Latin; meos, Sax.; mosca, Su. Goth. muscus. Spegel.]

1. A plant.

Though moss was formerly supposed to be only an excrescence produced from the earth and trees, yet it is no less a perfect plant than those of greater magnitude, having roots, flowers, and seeds, yet cannot be propagated from seeds by any art: the botanists distinguish it into many species: it chiefly flourishes in cold countries, and in the winter season, and is many times very injurious to fruit trees: the only remedy in such cases is to cut down part of the trees, and plough up the ground between those left remaining; and in the spring, in moist weather, you should with an iron instrument scrape off the moss. Miller.

Moss is a kind of mould of the earth and trees; but it may be better sorted as a rudiment of germination. Bacon.

Houses then were caves, or homely sheds. With twining raters fræd, and moss their beds. Dryden.

Such mosses as grow upon walls, roofs of houses, and other high places, have seeds that when shaken out of their vessels, appear like vapour or smoke. Ray on the Creation.

2. A morass, or boggy place. [mossa, Su. Goth. musa, low Latin.] Still used in the north of England.

In many of the moasses of the West Riding of Yorkshire are often dug up birch-trees.

The justices of Northumberland and Cumberland may make order in sessions for charging the respective counties for securing the same against the moss-troopers; that is, thieves and robbers, who, after having committed offences in the borders, do escape through the wastes and moass. Stat. 13 & 14 Ch. c. 22.

To MOSS. v. a. [from the noun.] To cover with moss.

An oak whose boughs were moss'd with age, And high top bald with dry antiquity. Shakespeare, As you like it.

Will these moss'd trees,

That have outliv'd the eagle, page thy heels,

And skip when thou point'st out? Shakespeare, Timon.

MOSS-GROWN.* adj. Covered or overgrown with moss.

The moss-grown domes with spiry turrets crown'd. Pope, Eliza to Abchurch.

The rude and moss-grown beech.

O'er-canopies the glade. Gray, Ode 1.

MOSSENESS. n. s. [from moss.] The state of being covered or overgrown with moss.

The herbs withered at the top, shew'd the earth to be very cold, and so dash the mossiness of trees. Bacon.

MOSSEY. adj. [from moss.] Overgrown with moss; covered with moss.

Old trees are more mossy for than young; for that the sap is not so frank as to rise all to the boughs, but stircy by the way, and putteth out moss. Bacon, Nat. Hist.

About the mossy brooks and springs.

And all inferior beauties thence. Cowley.

The mossy fountains and the green shades

Delight no more. Pope, Mensch.

MOST. adj. the superlative of more, [myrt, Saxon; meast, Dutch. Dr. Johnson. — Mr. Tooke has charged Junius with saying untruly that most is formed from the positive mape, having mape as the comparative, and myrt, by contraction myrt, as the superlative. But candour required that this singularity in the Saxon should have been mentioned, that mape is used as a positive, magnus, and a comparative, major; while myrt is the superlative. It does not appear, indeed, that this is the origin of myrt, which occurs in the simple form of maists, M. Goth. from the comparative maista. Dr. Jamieson in V. MA.

And thus Serenus deduces most; M. Goth. moiza, moists; Icel. meire, moire, moist, moist, major, maximus.]

1. Consisting of the greatest number; consisting of the greatest quantity.

Garden fruits which have any acrimony in them and most sorts of berries, will produce diarrhoea. Arbutus.

He thinks most sorts of learning doubtful among them, and I, that only some sort of learning was kept alive by them. Pape.

2. Greatest. Obsolete.

They all repair'd both most and least.

Spenner, F. Q.

Most, adv. [maists, Gothick; maer, Sax.; meest, Dutch; most, Danish.].

1. In the greatest degree.

Coward dogs

Most spend their mouths, when what they seem to threaten Runs far before them. Shakespeare.

Or most for who only saith,

Or most for his, such toils I undertake.

Whilst comprehended under that consciousness, the little finger is as much a part of it as what is most so. Locke.

That which will most influence their carriage will be the company they converse with, and the fashion of time about them. Locke on Education.

2. The particle noting the superlative degree.

Competency of all other proportions is the most incentive to industry; too little makes men desperate, and too much careless. Decay of Chr. Piety.

The faculties of the supreme spirit most certainly may be enlarged without bounds.

Cleaves, Phil. Principles.

Most, [this is a kind of substantive, being, according to its signification, singular or plural.]

1. The greatest number; in this sense it is plural.

Many of the apostles' immediate disciples sent or carried the books of the four evangelists to most of the churches they had planted.

Men must give silver to the poor freers.

However loth he were his way to slake,

Yet must he algaes now abide. Spenner, F. Q.

2. MIGHT.

Most ugly shapes,

Such as dame nature self must fear to see,

Or shame, that ever should so foul defects

From her most cunning hand escaped be.

Spenner, F. Q.

Within the yesters stood Argantes stout

To rescue her, if ill must her betide.

Fairfax, Tass. iii. 13.

MOTET.* n. s. [Ital. mottetto; Fr. motel.] A kind of sacred air; a hymn.

Commending this song's delicate air, that motet's dainty air. Brewer, Lingua, (1657), iv. 1. Dr. Aldrich has adapted the music of two of their motets to English words.

Mason on Church Music, p. 115.

MOTH.* n. s. [moß, Saxon; from matha, Goth. a worm or maggot.] A small insect or worm, which eats cloths and hangings; and afterwards becomes winged.

I should have motion'd to you at the first. B. Jonson, F. B.

Thou, that, after the impetuous rage of five bloody foundations, — when we were quick breathless of thy free grace, didst motion peace and terms of covenant with us — Milton, Of Reform. B. 2.

TO MOTION. v. n. To advise; to make proposal; to offer plans.

Well hast thou motion'd, well thy thoughts employ'd,
How we might best fulfil the work which here
God hath assign'd us. Milton, P. L.

MOTIONER. n. s. [from motion.] A mover. Not in use. Catgrave.

MOTIONLESS. adj. [from motion.] Wanting motion; being without motion.

We cannot free the lady that sits here,
In stony fetters fix'd, and motionless. Milton, Comus.

Ha! Do I dream? Is this my boy's success?
I grow a statue, stiff and motionless. Blackmore.

Should our globe have had a greater share
Of this strong force, by which the parts cohere;
Things had been bound by such a pow'ful chain,
That all would fix'd and motionless remain. Blackmore.

MOTIVE. adj. [motus, Lat.]

1. Causing motion; having motion.

Shall every motive argument used in such kind of conferences be made a rule for others still to conclude the like by, concerning all things of like nature, when as probable inducements may lead them to the contrary? Hooker.

2. Having the power to move; having power to pass forward to motion.

The nerves serve for the conveyance of the motive faculty from the brain; the ligatures for the strengthening of them, that they may not flag in motion.

We ask you whence does matie vigour flow?

That fancy is easily dissipated from the motive power of souls embodied, and the gradual increase of men and animals.

Benley.

MOV'IE. † n. s. [old Fr. matie, cause.]

1. That which determines the choice; that which incites the action.

Hence we have no commandment, either in nature or Scripture, which does exact them at our hands; yet those motives there are in both, which draw most effectually our minds unto them.

Heath.

Why in that rawness left you wife and children, Those precious motives, those strong knots of love, Without leave-taking.

What can be a stronger motive to a firm trust on our Maker, than the giving us his Son to suffer for us?

The motive for continuing in the same state is only the present satisfaction in it; the motive to change is always some uneasiness.

2. Mover. Not in use.

Heaven brought me up to be my daughter's dower;

As I hath fated her to be my mate

And helper to a husband.

Her waeton spirits look'd not

At every joint, and motive of her body.

Shakespeare, Twelfth Night, Act II. Sc. 1.

MOTLEY. † adj. [supposed to be corrupted from medley; perhaps from mollike, coloured, spotted or variegated like a garden-mole.]

Dr. Johnson. — But we are to remember that medley was anciently applied in the present sense of mixed colour; which renders the corruption of motley more probable.

MOTLEY. Lydgate has "floures of sundry motles," i. e. colours.] Mingled of various colours.

They that come to see a fellow
1, a long motley coat, guarded with yellow,
Will be deceived.

Expanse and after-thought, and ill care,
And doubts of motley true, and dark despair.

Enquire from whence this motley style
Did first our Roman party derive.

Tradition, of unquench'd need,
Motley fruit of man's greed,
By the dust from lordlings sprung,
By the sire exhal'd from dung.

Swift.

MOT'OR. † n. s. [motetur, French; from moveo, Lat.] A mover.

Tell motion it is worse than mad, whose motor's not Almighty.

Where there is no adulterous intent or evil thought in the heart; whose prime matter and spring (as to its end and purpose) being set true to the measure of God's will, the outward wheels, motions, and indications cannot go amiss.

Those bodies being of a congenerous nature, do readily receive the impressions of their motor, and if not fettered by their gravity, conform themselves to situations, wherein they best unite unto their animator.

Brown, Vulg. Err.

MOTORY. adj. [motorius, Latin.] Giving motion.

The bones, were they dry, could not, without great difficulty, yield to the blows and attractions of the motor muscles.

Ray on the Creation.

MOTTO. n. s. [motto, Italian.] A sentence or word added to a device, or prefixed to any thing written.

It may be said to be the motto of human nature, rather to suffer than to die.

We ought to be meek-spirited, till we are assured of the honesty of our ancestors; for covetousness and circumvention make no good motto for a courtier.

It was the motto of a bishop eminent for his piety and good works in King Charles the Second's reign, Insuper Deo & laetare, Serve God and be cheerful.

Addison, Freeholder.

TO MOUCH. † See TO MOUNCH.

MOV'ABLE. † adj. [from move. Old French movable. Some write this word moveable, and its derivatives moveables, moveably; but there is no necessity for retaining the e, any more than in impracticable, or immovable, where Dr. Johnson indeed omits it; and it is indeed now usually omitted.]

1. Capable of being moved; not fixed; portable; such as may be carried from place to place.

In the vast wilderness, when the people of God had no settled habitation, yet a movable tabernacle they were commended of God to make.

When he made his prayer, he found the boat was in movable and unbound, the rest remained still fast.

Any least whatsoever promotes the ascent of material matter, which is subtle, and is consequently movable more easily.

Any who sees the Teverone must conclude it to be one of the most movable rivers in the world, that it is so often shifted out of one channel into another.

Changing the time of the year.

The lunar month is natural and periodical, by which the movable festivals of the Christian church are regulated.

Holder.

MOVABLES. n. s. pl. [meubles, Fr.] Goods; furniture; distinguished from real or immovable possessions: as, lands or houses.

We seize
The plate, coin, revenue, and movables,
Whereof our uncle Gaunt did stand possessor.

Let him that moved you hither,
Remove you hence; I knew you at the first
You were a movable.

Why, what's a movable?
— A joint of stool.

Surveys rich movables with curious eyes,
Beats down the price, and threatens still to buy.

Shakespeare, Twelfth Night, Act II. Sc. 1.

MOVABLENESS. † n. s. [from movable.]
Mobility; possibility to be moved.

Dr. Moulton took his error, at leastwise touching the movableness of the poles of the equator, from Joseph Scaliger.

MOVABLY. adv. [from movable.] So as it may be moved.

His back-piece is composed of eighteen platan, movably joined together by as many intermediate skins.

Grav.

TO MOVE. v. s. [moveo, Latin.]

1. To put out of one place into another; to put in motion.

Sinai itself was moved at the presence of God.

At this my heart trembleth, and is moved out of his place.

Psalm, lxxviii.

2. To give an impulse to.

He scorns now, repents, and prays continue; My motions in him; longer than they move.

His heart I know, how variable and vain Self-love.

The will being the power of directing our operative faculties to some action, for some end, cannot at any time be moved towards what is judged at that time unsustainable.

Locke.

3. To propose; to recommend.

If the first consultation be not sufficient, the will may need a review, and require the understanding to inform itself better.

They are to be blamed alike, who move and who decline war upon particular respects.

Hayward, Edu. VI.

They find a great inconvenience in moving their suits by an interpreter.

To Judaea now your suit must move.

4. To persuade; to prevail on; to dispose by something determining the choice.

A thousand knees,
Ten thousand years together, naked fasting,
Upon a barren mountain, and still winter
In storm perpetual, could not move the gods
To look that way thou wert.

Shakespeare, Winter, Titus.

Gratus offered the Transylvanians money; but minds desirous of revenge were not moved with gold.

Sometimes the possibility of preferment prevailing with the credulous, expectation of less expense with the covetous, opinion of ease with the fond, and assurance of remoteness with the unkind parents, have moved them without discretion, to engage their children in adventures of learning, by whose return they have received but small contentment.

Could any power of sense the Roman move
To burn his own right hand?

That which moves a man to do any thing, must be the apprehension and expectation of some good from the thing which he is about to do.

Smith, Scen.

When she saw her reason idly spent,
And could not move him from his fix'd intent,
She flew to him.

But when no female art his mind could move,
She turn'd to furious hate her impious love.

Shakespeare, As You Like It, Act II. Sc. 1.

What can thy mind to this long journey move,
Or need'st thou absence to renew thy love?

Dryden.

5. To affect; to touch pathetically; to stir passion.

If he saw ought in you that makes him like,
That any thing he sees, which moves his liking,
I can with ease translate it to my will.

Shakespeare, King John, Act II. Sc. 1.

It was great ignorance, Gloucester's eyes being out,
To let him live, when he arrives he moves

All hearts against him.

Should a shipwreck'd sailor sing his woe,
Wouldst thou be mov'd to pity, or bestow
An alms?

Dryden, Pers.

Images are very springingly to be introduced; their proper place in poems and orations, and their use is to move pity or terror, compassion and resentment.

O let thy sister, daughter, handmaid move
Or all those tender names in one, thy love.

Pope.

6. To make angry.

From those bloody hands
Threw your distemper'd response to the ground
And hear the sentence of your mood piece.

Shakespeare.

7. To put into commotion.

When they were come to Bethlehem, all the city was moved about them.

Russ, l. 19.

8. To incite; to produce by incitement.

Then feed on thoughts, that voluntary move Harmonious numbers.

Shakespeare, P. L.

9. To conduct regularly in motion.

They, as they move
Their stately dance in numbers that compute Days, months, and years, wot 'twix his all cheering lamp,
Turn swift their various motions.

Milton, P. L.

To MOVE. v. n.

1. To be in a state of changing place; not to be at rest.

Whether heaven move or earth
Imports not, if thou reckon right. Milton, P. L.
The senses represent the earth as immovable; for though it do move in itself, it rests in us who are carried with it. Glennville.

2. To have a particular direction of passage.

The sun
Had first his precept so to move, so shine,
As might affect the earth with cold and heat. Milton, P. L.

3. To go from one place to another.

I look'd toward Eden, and anon, methought,
The wood began to move.
Within three mile may you see it coming;
I say a moving grove. Shakespeare, Macbeth.
On the green bank I sat and listen'd long,
But till her way was ended could I move,
But wish'd to dwell for ever in the grove. Dryd.

This saying, that God is the place of spirits, being literal, makes us conceive that spirits move up and down, and have their distances and intervals in God, as bodies have in space. Locke.
When we are come to the utmost extremity of body, what is there that can put a stop, and satisfy the mind, that it is at the end of space, when it is satisfied that body itself can move into it? Locke.

Any thing that moves round about in a circle is less true than our ideas are wont to succeed one another in our minds, is not perceived to move, but seems to be a perfect entire circle of that matter. Locke.

The goddess move
To visit Paphos, and her blooming groves. Pope, Odyss.

4. To have vital action.

In him we live, move, and have our being.
Acts, xvii. 28.
Every moving thing that liveth shall be meat for you. Gen.

5. To walk; to bear the body.

See great Marcellus! how inard in toils
He moves with many groans, how rich with regal spoils. Dryden, Æn.

6. To march as an army.

Anon they move
In perfect phalanx to the Dorian mood. Milton, P. L.

7. To go forward.

Through various hazards and events we move
To Latium. Dryden, Æn.

8. To change the posture of the body in ceremony.

When Haman saw Mordecai that he stood not up, nor mov'd for him, he was full of indignation.
Ezra, v. 9.

MOVE. n. s. The act of moving, commonly used at chess.

I saw two angels play'd the mate;
With man, alas! no otherwise it proves,
An unsee hand makes all their moves. Cowley.
MOV'LESS. adj. Unmoved; not to be put out of the place.

The lungs, though untouched, will remain
moveless as to any expansion or contraction of their substance. Huyke.

The Grecian phalanx, moveless as a tow'r,
On all sides batter'd, yet resists his pow'r.
Pope, Æn.

MOV'EMENT. n. s. [from moving, French.]

1. Manner of moving.

What farther relieves descriptions of battles, is the art of introducing pathetic circumstances about the heroes, which raise a different movement in the mind, compassion and pity. Pope, Æn. on Homer.

Under workmen are expert enough at making a single wheel in a clock, but are utterly ignorant how to adjust the several parts, or regulate the movement. Suyft.

2. Motion.

Could he whose laws the rolling planets bind,
Describe or fix one movement of the mind? Pope.

MOV'ENT. adj. [from move, Lat.] Moving.
If it be in some part movent, and in some part quiescent, it must needs be a curve line, and so no radius. Grego, Comed. Sacra.

MOV'ENT. n. s. [from move, Lat.] That which moves another.

That there is a motion which makes the vicissitudes of day and night, move may assure us;
but whether the sun or earth be the movent, cannot be determined but by a further appeal. Glennville, Scoria.

MOV'ER. n. s. [from move.]

1. The person or thing that gives motion.

O thou eternal move of the heavens,
Look with a gentle eye upon this wretch! Shaksp.
The strength of a spring were better assisted by the labour of some intelligent move, as the heavenly orbs are supposed to be turned. Wilkins, Mat. Magic.

2. Something that moves, or stands not still.

You as the soul, as the first move, you Vigour and life on every part bestow. Walker.
Yet each from the first move motion take.

Yet each their proper revolutions make. Dryden.

3. A proposer.

See here these *move*s, that do prize their honours
At a crack'd drucken; cushions, leaden spoons,
Ere yet the light be done, pack up. Shakspere, Coriol.

If any question be moved concerning the doctrine of the church of England expressed in the thirty-nine articles, give not the least ear to the move thereof. Bacon.

MOUGH.* n. s. [Saxon, mugðe.]

MOUGHT. adj. [from move.]
Your cloaths ben eten of moughtis
Wichfe, St. James, v.

No mough after bite it. P. Houghman, fol. 67. b.

MOUGHT. Used for might. Obsolete.
Dr. Johnson. — It is the pret. of the old verb move, now converted into may.

Godfrido this both beard, and saw, and knew, Yet nath with death then chiding, though he mought. Fairfax, Sax. xiii. 70.

MOV'ING.* n. s. [from move.] Motive; impulse.

Represent the first movings of the heart towards any forbidden object, as unlawful in themselves, and destructive in their consequence.

The protest of piety is but like the hand of a clock, set indeed more conspicuously, but directed wholly by the secret movings of carnality within. Deacy of Chr. Piety.

MOV'ING. participial adj. [from move.]

Pathetick; touching; adapted to affect the passions.

Great Jupiter,
The moving prayer of Æacus did grant,
And into men and women turn'd the ant. Blackmore.

MOV'INGLY. adj. [from moving.] Pathetically; in such a manner as to seize the passions.

The choice and flower of all things profitable in other books, the Psalms do both more briefly and more movingly express, by reason of that poetical form whereof they are written. Hooker.

I would have had them write more movingly.

Shakspere.
His air, his voice, his looks, and honest soul,
Speak all so modestly in his behalf,
I dare not trust myself to hear him talk. Addison, Cato.

MOV'INGNESS.* n. s. [from moving.]
Power to affect the passions.

There is a strange movingness, and if the epithet be not too bold, a kind of heavenly magic to be found in some passages of the Scripture, which is to be found no where else.

Bible, Style of H. Script. p. 243.

MOULD.* n. s. [from moel, Swedish.

Dr. Johnson. — From mueller, v. r. to wet or moisten; muillé, anglicised, becoming muill'd, muill'd, mould. Mr. H. Tooker.
— Skinner had proposed a similar derivation; sofiness, he says, being the occasion of mould. Menage derives mueller from the Lat. mollare, to soften.]

1. A kind of concretion on the top or outside of things kept motionless and damp; now discovered by microscopes to be perfect plants.

All moulds are incceptions of putrefaction, as the moulds of pies and flesh, which moulds turn into worms. Bacon.

Moss is a kind of mould of the earth and trees, but may be better sort of a rudiment of germination. Bacon.

Another special affinity is between plants and mould, or putrefaction; for all putrefaction; if it dissolve not in afection, will, in the end, issue into plants. Bacon, Nat. Hist.

The malt made in summer is apt to contract
mould. Mortimer.

A hermit, who has been shut up in his cell in a college, has contracted a sort of mould and rust upon his soul, and all his airs have awkwardness in them. Watts.

2. M. Goth. muld; Icel. mold; Saxon, molb.] Earth; soil; ground in which any thing grows.

Those moulds that are of a bright chestnut or hazily colour are accounted the best; next to that, the dark grey and russet moulds are accounted best; the light and dark ash-colour are reckoned the worst, such as are usually found on common or heathy ground; the clear sandy is by no means to be approved, but that of a yellowish colour is reckoned the worst of all; this is commonly found in wild and waste parts of the country, and for the most part produces nothing but gow, furs, and fern. All good lands after rain, or breaking up by the spade, will emit a good smell; that being always the best that is neither too unctuous or too lean, but such as will easily dissolve; of a just consistence between sand and clay.

Though worms devour me, though I turn to mould,
Yet to my flesh I shall his face behold. Sandys, Paraph.

The black earth, every where obvious on the surface of the ground, we call mould. Woodward.

3. Matter of which any thing is made.

When the world began,
One common mass compos'd the mould of man. Dryden.

Nature form'd me of her softest mould,
Enriched all my soul with tender passions,
And sunk the even below my weak sex. Addison, Cato.

4. [Span. mulde; Fr. moûle.] The matrix in which any thing is cast; in which any thing receives its form.

If the intrigues of all the ancient churches be compared, it may be perceived they had all one original mould. Hooker.

A dangerous precedent were left for the casting of prayers into certain pious moulds. Hooker.
French churches all cast according unto that mould which Calvin had made. Hooker.
My wife comes foremost; then the honour'd mould.

Wherein this trunk was from'd. Shakspeare, Coriol.
You may have fruit in more accurate figures, according as you make the moulds. Bacon, Nat. Hist.

The liquid ore he drain'd
Into fit moulds prepar'd; from which he form'd
First his own tools; then what might else be wrought.

We may hope for new heavens and a new earth, more pure and perfect than the former; as if this was a refiner's fire, by which the dross and coarse parts, and then cast the mass again into a new and better mould. Burnet.
Sure our souls were near allied, and thine
Cast in the same poetick mould with mine. Dryden.

Here in fit moulds to Indian nations known,
Are cast the several kinds of precious stone. Blackmore.

5. Cast; form.
No mists for you
Unless you were of gentler, milder mould. Shakspeare.

William earl of Pembroke was a man of another mould, and making, being the most universally beloved of any man of that age, and having a great office, he was the person liv'd better esteemed, and more revered in the country. Clarendon.

Nor virtue, wit, nor beauty, could Preserve from death's hand this their heavenly mould. Corneille.

Learn
What creatures there inhabit, of what mould,
Or substance, how endu'd, and what their power,
And where their weakness. Milton, P. L.
So must the writer, whose productions should Take with the vulgar, be of vulgar mould. Waller.

From their main-top joyful news they hear
Of ships, which by their mould bring new supplies. Dryden.

Hate Carvel, impotent and old,
Married a lass of London mould. Prior.

6. The suture or texture of the skull. Ainsworth.

7. It is used in a sense a little strained by Shakspeare.

New hours come upon him,
Like our strange garments clave not to their mould,
But with the end of use. Shakspeare, Macbeth.

8. A spot; as an iron-mould. [Goth. malu, rust; Saxon, nal, a spot.] More correctly, and anciently, mole.
Thy best coat, Hankin, Hath many moles and spots. P. Pindemon, fol. 65.

To MOULD† v. n. [from the noun. Dr. Johnson.—Saxon. Mr. Tyrwhitt.—Certainly allied to molen, vetus Fland. carum contrahere. Kilian. The same with meluen, Teut. to be worn-ent, from melue, a little worn; whence mulden, Su. rotten, putrified. But see the deduction from the Fr. mouiller, by Mr. Tooke; and it must be observed, our word was at first written moule, and moule.] To contract continued matter; to shape mould; to rot; to breed worms; to putrify.

Let us not moulde thus in idleness. Chaucer, Mon of Love's Prod.

For fears of worne-eating, mouldyng, or stynking. Bale, Acts of Eng. Vat. P. li. sign. O. i.
When the host neweard begun to moue or putrifie, and should ingender wormes, then an other substance succedeth it.

Alph. Cressner, Ans. to Bp. Gardiner, p. 400.
Pureness cannot moule, nor sweetness cannot be sour.

Alph. Cressner, Ans. to Bp. Gardiner, p. 401.
In woods, in waves, in wars she wants to dwell,
And will be found with peril and with pain;

Ne can the man that moulds in idle cell
Unto her joyful mansion attain. Smyth, F. Q.

There be some houses wherein sweet meats will relent, and baked meats will mould, more than in others. Bacon.

To MOULD† v. a. To cover with mould; to corrupt by mould.

Small never chest hymen it, ne enough after Byte it. P. Ploughman, Vis. fol. 71.
The gilt of man with rust of synne synneth.

Jedgite, Life of our Lady, B. 2.
Sour wyne, and moulded bread.
Alph. Cressner, Ans. to Bp. Gardiner, p. 299.

Very coarse, heavy, moulded bread the soldiers thrust upon their spears, railing against Ferdinand, who made no better provision. Knutley, Hist. of the Turks.

To MOULD† v. a. [mouler, French.]
1. To form; to shape; to model.

I feel
Of what coarse metal ye are moulded. Shakspeare, Hen. VIII.

Here is the cap your worship did bespeak;
Why this was moulded on a pottenger,
A velvet dish; for, he, 'tis lewd.

The king had taken such liking of his person, that he resolved to make him a quarter-piece, and to mould him platonically to his own idea. Watson, D. of Buckingham.

Did I request thee, Maker, from my clay
To mould me man? Milton, P. L.

He forgoeth and mouldeth metals, and builds houses. Hale.

By education we may mould the minds and manners of youth into what shape we please; and give them the impressions of such habits as shall ever afterwards remain. Atterbury.

Then rose the seed of chaos, and of night,
Of dull and venal a new world to mould,
And bring Saturnian days of lead and gold.

A faction in England, under the name of puritan, moulded up their new schemes of religion with republican principles in government. Swift.

For you alone he stole
The fire that forms a manly soul;
Then, to complete it every way,
He moulded it with female clay. Swift, Miscell.

Fabellus would never learn any moral lessons till they were moulded into the form of some fiction or fable like those of Æsop. Watts.

2. To knead; as, to mould bread. Ainsworth.

MOULDABLE. adj. [from mould.] That may be moulded.

The differences of figurate and not figurate, mouldable and not mouldable, are plebeian notions. Bacon, Nat. Hist.

MOULDER† v. n. [from mould.] One who moulds.

We are against those unthinking, overbearing people, who, in these odd times, under that pretence, [freedom of thought,] set up for reformers, and new moulders of the constitution.

Bp. Berkeley, Disc. Add. to Magistres.

To MOULDER† v. n. [from mould.] To be turned to dust; to perish in dust; to be diminished; to wear or waste away.

If he had sat still, the common error would have mouldered to nothing, and been exposed to any advantage he would take. Clarendon.

Whatever moulders, or is wasted away, is carried into the lower grounds, and nothing brought forth again. Burton.

Those former stones despoiled of their shells, and exposed upon the surface of the ground, in time decay, wear, and moulder away, and are frequently found defaced, and broken to pieces.

Woodward, Nat. Hist.
To them by smiling Jove 'twas given,
Great William's glories to recall,
When statues moulder, and when arches fall.

Finding his congregation moulder every day, and hearing what was the occasion of it, he resolved to give his parish a little Latin in his turn. Addison, Spect.

To MOULDER. v. a. [from mould.] To turn to dust; to crumble.

The natural histories of Switzerland talk of the fall of those rocks when their foundations have been moulder'd with age, or rent by an earthquake. Addison on Italy.

With nodding arches, broken temples spread,
The very tombs now vanish'd like their dead;
Some felt the silent stroke of mould'ring ages,
Some hostile fury. Pope.

MOULDINESS. n. s. [from mouldy.] The state of being mouldy.

Flesh, fish, and plants, after a mouldiness, rotteness, or corrupting, will fall to breed worms. Bacon, Nat. Hist.

MOULDING. n. s. [from mould.] Ornamental cavities in wood or stone.

Hollow mouldings are required in the work. Mason.

MOULDWARP. n. s. [warp, and peopan, Saxon.] This is, I believe, the proper and original name of the talpæ; a mould-warp is a creature that turns mould.

The word is still retained, though sometimes pronounced mouldy-warp. A mole; a small animal that throws up the earth.

Above the reach of lustful sinful lust,
Whose base effect through cowardly distrust
Of his own wings, dare not to heaven fly,
But like a mouldwarp in the earth do lie.

While they play the mouldwarps, unawary
dampers distemper their heads with annoyance only for the present. Cervus.

With him we weary the vermin of the earth, namely, the scit and the mouldwarp. Waller, Angler.

MOULDY. adj. [from mould.] Overgrown with concretions.

Is thy name mouldy?
— Yes.

— 'Tis the more time thou wert used.
— He, he, ha; most excellent. Things that are mouldy lack use. Wells said, Sir John.

The marble looks white, as being exposed to the winds and salt sea-vapours, but by continually fretting it preserves it from that mouldy colour which others contract. Addison.

To MOUL† v. n. [unhyphen, Teut. Thus our own word at first was mout or mout; from muto, Latin, to change. — To moulen as fowls, plumeo.] Prompt.

Parv.] To shed or change the feathers; to lose feathers.

Some birds upon moulting turn colour, as Robin-red-breasts, after their moulting, grow to be red again by degrees. Bacon.

'Tis time shall moult away his wings,
Ere he shall disengage his wings.

In the wide world who again
Such a constant lover. Suchbeg.

The widow'd turtle hangs her mourning wings,
And to the woods in mournful murmur sings.

Goth.

MOUN.* May; must. See Mow.

TO MOUNCH.† v. a. [mouch, to eat much. To MAUNCH. †] Ainsworth. This word is retained in Scotland, and denotes the obtunded action of toothless gums on a hard crust, or any thing eatable: it seems to be a corruption of the French word manger. Macbean, and Dr. Johnson.—It may be from the French macher, or mascher, to chew; obvious at least in mouch, as this word was also written; and as it is yet in some places pronounced. Or from the Su. Goth. mama, aggr cibum masicare. But perhaps they are all to be referred to the Latin, manducare, to eat. See MOUTH.† To chew; to masticate.

Some of them would mouch their meats alone.

Chaucer, Tr. and Cr. l. 915.

A sailor's wife had cheusins in her lap,
And *mouch*ed, and *mouch*ed, and *mouch*ed.

Shakespeare, Macbeth.

MOUND.† n. s. [munban, Saxon, to defend. Dr. Johnson.—Goth. mound; Sueth. mynd, tutela; Icel. mynda, tueri; mound, manus. Serenius.] Any thing raised to fortify or defend: usually a bank of earth and stone.

His broad branches, laden with rich fœ,
Did stretch themselves without the utmost bound
Of this great garden, compass'd with a mound.

Spenser, F. Q.

The sea's a thief whose liquid surge resolves
The mounds into salt tears.

Shakespeare, Tim. of Athens.

God had thrown

That mountain as his garden mound, high rais'd.

Such as broke through all mounds of law, such as laughed at the sword of vengeance which divine justice brandish'd in their faces. Sueth. Serm.

Nor cold shall hinder me with horns and bounds
To thrice the thicker, or to leap the mounds.

Dryden.

The state of Milan is like a vast garden surrounded by a noble sound-work of rocks and mountains.

Addison.

TO MOUND.† v. a. [mound, from the noun.] To fortify with a mound.

We will sweep the curbed vallies,
Brush the banks that bound our alleys;
We will muster nature's dainties.

Dryden, Muses Sacrificed, (1650.)

A spacious city stood with firmest walls
Sure mounded.

Philips, Cider, B. l.

MOUNT.† n. s. [munc, Saxon; mont, Fr.; mons, Latin.]

1. A mountain; a hill.

Behold yon mountain's hoary height,
Made higher with own mounds of snow. Dryden.

2. An artificial hill raised in a garden or other place.

He might see what mounds they had in short time cast, and what a number there was of warlike soldiers. Andler.

3. A publick treasure, a bank. Now obsolete.

These examples confirmed me in a resolution to spend my time wholly in writing; and to put forth that poor talent God hath given me, not to particular exchanges, but to banks or perpetuities, which will not break. Bacon.

TO MOUNT.† v. n. [monter, French.]

1. To rise on high.

Doth the eagle mount up at thy command,
and make her nest on high? Job, lili. 37.
I'll strive with troubled thoughts to take a nap,
Let laden slumber poise me down to-morrow,
When I should mount with wings of victory. Shakespeare.

A base ignoble mind,

That mounts no higher than a bird can soar.

Shakespeare.

The fire of trees and houses mounts on high,
And meets half-way new fires that show'r's from sky.

Cowley.

If the luxury should be offered to them, it would kindle jealousy, and as the first range of that ladder which should serve to mount over all their customs.

Cleric.

Ambitious meteors set themselves upon the wing, taking every occasion of drawing upward to the sue, not considering, that they have no more time allowed them in their mounting than the single revolving of a day; so that when the light goes down from them they are of necessity to fall. Dryden.

2. To tower; to be built up to great elevation.

Though his excellency mounts up to the heavens, and his head reach unto the clouds, yet shall he perish. Job, xxi. 6.

Pope.

TO MOUNT.† v. a.

1. To raise aloft; to lift on high.

The fire that mounts the liquor till it roars o'er,
Sems to suggest, wastes it. Shakespeare.

What power is it which mounts my love so high,
That makes me see, and cannot feed mine eye.

Shakespeare.

The air is so thin, that a bird has therein no feeling of her wings, or any resistance of air to mount herself by. Raleigh.

2. To ascend; to climb.

Shall we mount against the rural throno,
And rule the country kingdoms once our own?

Dryden.

3. To place on horseback; to furnish with horses.

Three hundred horses in high stables fed,
Of these he chose the fairest and the best,
To mount the Trojan troop. Dryden, Æn.

Clear reason, acting in conjunction with a well-disciplined, but strong and vigorous fancy, seldom fall to attain their end: fancy without reason, is like a horse without a rider; and reason without fancy is not well mounted. Grew, Cos. Sac.

4. To embellish with ornaments.

5. To mount guard. To do duty and watch at any particular post.

Is not 'statio' properly a military term, signifying a soldier's being upon his duty, or (as we now say in England) mounting the guard?
Horatio in the 53 Ch. of Imrich, (3d ed. 1759.) p. 925.

6. To mount a cannon. To set a piece on its wooden frame for the more easy carriage and management in firing it.

earth.

And by his false worship such power he did gain,
As kept him o'er the mountain, and us on the plain.

Raleigh.

The ark no more now floats, but stands on
ground,
Fast on the top of some high mountain fix'd.

Milton, P. L.

From Aconon's hands a rolling stone there came,
So large, it half deserv'd a mountain's name.

Dryden.

2. Any thing proverbially huge.

I had been drowned; a death that I abhor;
for the water swells a man, and what should I have been when I had been swelled? I should have been a mountain of company. Shakespeare.

She did corrupt frail nature with some bribe,
To make an evens mountain on my back,

Where sits deformity to mock my body. Shap.

MO'NTAIN. adj. [montanus, Latin.] Found on the mountains; pertaining to the mountains; growing on the mountains.

Now for our mountain sport, up to yond hill,
Your legs are young. Shakespeare, Cymbeline.

You may as well forbid the mountain plains
To wag their high tops, and to make a noise,
When they are fretted with the gusts of heav'n's

Shakespeare.

MOUNTAINE'ER.† n. s. [from mountain.
MOUNTAINEER. †] This word is certainly written mountaineer, as well as mountaineer, though Dr. Johnson notices only the latter.
Nor has Bentley written it mountaineer, as Dr. Johnson exhibits the word in the example from his Sermons; but mountaineer. Mountaineer also is in the old dictionary of Sherwood.]

1. An inhabitant of the mountains.

Amittion troops, of mighty fame,
And mountaineers that from Severus came.

Dryden, Æn.

A few mountaineers may escape, enough to continue human race; and yet being illiterate (as mountaineers always are) they can preserve no reminers of former times.

Bentley, Serm. (ed. 1724.) p. 108.

2. A savage; a free booter; a rustic.

Yield, rustic mountaineer. Shap., Cymbeline.

No savage, fierce bandit, or mountaineer,
Will dare to soil her virgin purity. Milton, Comus.

Through all Turkie, especially in places desert, there are many mountaineers, or outlaws, like the wild Irish, who live upon spoil.

Blund, Voyage into the Levant, (1650.) p. 94.

MO'NTAIN.ER. n. s. [from mountain.] A hillock; a small mount. Elegant, but in the pleasant vale of Tempe. Bilney.

MO'NTAINOUS. adj. [from mountain.]

1. Hilly; full of mountains.

The ascent of the land from the sea to the foot of the mountains, and the height of the mountains from the bottom to the top, are to be computed, when you measure the height of a mountain, or of a mountainous land, in respect of the sea.

Burnet, Theory of the Earth.

2. Large as mountains; huge; bulky.

What custom wills in all things, should we do't,
Mountaineers error would be too highly heapt
For truth to o'perce. Shakespeare.

On earth, in air, amidst the seas and skies,
Mountaineers' brains of wonders rise;

Whose towering strength will ne'er submit
To reason's batteries, or the mines of wit. Prior.

3. Inhabiting mountains.

In destructions by deluge and earthquakes, the remnant which hap to be reserved are ignorant and mountaineers people, that can give no account of the time past. Bacon, Essays.

horses, and betake themselves to mow; a beast which will fare hardly, live very long, draw indif-ferently well, carry great burthens, and hath also a piece swift and easy enough. Cervus.

'Twould tempt a mule to fury. May.

MUCH.* adj. [Su. Goth. mycten, great, much; Icel. miok, mikit, much. Hence the Span. mucho, as well as our much. Dr. Jamieson in V. myche, the Scottish form of much. We had formerly the substantive michel, apparently in the sense of magnitude, size; "of one michel and might." Vis. of P. Pl. fol. 89. b. See Mr. Tyrwhitt's Gloss. in V. MOKE.]

1. Large in quantity; long in time; opposed to little.

Thou shalt carry much seed out, and shalt gather but little in; for the locust shall consume it. Deut. xii. 39.

I am well served, to take so much pain for one revolved to make away with himself. L'Estrange. You were promised for the service, and got off with much ado. Swift, Dir. to Scavengers.

2. Many in number; opposed to few.

Let us know.

If 't will be up thy discontented sword,

And carry back to Sicily much tall youth,

That else must perish here. Shaks. Ant. & Cleop.

MUCH. adv.

1. In a great degree; by far: before some word of comparison.

Issac, thou art much mightier than xvi.

Gen. xii. 16.

Excellent speech becometh not a fool, much less do lying lips a prince. Prov. xvi. 17.

We have had fathers of our flesh which corrected us, and we gave them reverence: shall we not much rather be in subjection unto the Father of spirits, and live? Heb. xii. 9.

If they escaped not who refused him that spoke on earth, much more shall not we escape, if we turn away from him that speaketh from heaven. Heb. xii. 25.

Full of doubt I stand,

Whether I should repeat me now of sin

By me done or occasioned, or rejoice

Much more, that much more good thereof shall spring. Milton, P. L.

Faeron or Intercessor none appear'd,

Much lost that durst upon his own head draw

The deadly forfeiture. Milton, P. L.

2. To a certain degree.

He charged them that they should tell no man:

but the more he charged them, so much the more a great deal they published it. St. Mark, vi. 36.

There is, said Michael, if thou wilt observe,

The rule of not too much, by temperance taught. Milton, P. L.

3. To a great degree.

Henceforth I fly not death, nor would prolong

Life much, lest rather how I may be quit

Fairest and easiest of this cumbersome charge. Milton, P. L.

So spake, so wish'd much humbled Eve, but Eve

Somewhat aw'd, I shook with holy fear,

Yet not so much but that I noted well

Who did the most in song and dance excel. Dryden.

To thee thy much-afflicted mother flies,

And on thy succour and thy faith relies. Dryden.

Your much-lov'd fleet shall soon

Bestige the petty monarchs of the land. Dryden.

If his rules of diet be not better than his rules for health, he is not like to be much follow'd. Baker on Learning.

Oh much experienc'd man!

Sad from my natal hour my days have run,

A much afflicted, much enduring man. Pope, Ode.

4. Often, or long.

You pine, you languish, love to be alone,

Think much, speak little, and in speaking, sigh. Dryden.

Homeer shall last, like Alexander, long.

As much recorded, and as oft sung. Gravello.

5. Nearly.

All left the world upon as they found it, ever unquiet, subject to changes and revolutions. Temple.

MUCH. n. s.

1. A great deal; multitude in number; abundance in quantity: opposed to a little.

They gathered against Moses and Aaron, and said, Ye take too much upon you. Numb. xvi. 3.

5 L 2

Nor grudge I thee the much the Grecians give,
Nor murmur'ing take the little I receive.

Dryden, Hind.
They have taken the poetry of Mevna, but little of his liberality. Dryden, Pref. to All for Love.

The fate of love is such
That still it sees too little or too much. Dryden.
Much suffering heroes next their honour claim;
Those of less noisy and less guilty fame,
Fair virtue's silent train. Pope, Temple of Fame.

2. More than enough; a heavy service or burthen.

Thou think it is much to tread the coast
Of the salt deep. Shakespeare, Tempest.
He thought not much to clothe his enemies.

Milton, P. L.
This gracious act the ladies all approve,
Who thought it much a man should die for love,
And with their misters join'd in close debate. Dryden.

3. Any assignable quantity or degree.

The waters covered the chariots and horsemen;
there remained not so much as one. Exod. xiv. 28.
We will cut wood out of Lebanon as much as thou shalt need. 2 Chron. ii. 16.

The matter of the universe was created before the flood; and if any more was created, then there must be as much annihilated to make room for it. Burnet, Theory.

Who is there of whom we can with any rational assurance, or perhaps so much as likelihood, affirm, here is a man whose nature is renewed, whose heart is changed. South.

4. An uncommon thing; something strange.

It was such that one that was so great a lover of peace should be happy in war. Bacon, Hen. VII.

It is much, if men were from eternity, that they should not find out the way of writing all that long duration which had past before that time. Tillotson.

5. To make MUCH OF. To treat with regard; to fondle; to pamper.

Though he knew his discourse was to entertain him from a more straight parley, yet he durst not but kiss his rod, and gladly make much of that entertainment which she allotted unto him. Sidney.

The king understanding of their adventure, suddenly fails to take a pride in making much of them, extolling them with infinite praises. Sidney.

When thou comest first Thou stork'd'st, and mad'st as much of me; and would'st give me
Water with berries in't. Shakespeare, Tempest.

MUCH at one. Nearly of equal value; of equal influence.

Then prayers are vain as curses, much at one
In a slave's mouth, against a monarch's power. Dryden.

MUCH is often used in a kind of composition with particles both active and passive; when it is joined with a passive, as much loved, it seems to be an adverb; when it is joined with an active, as much enduring, it may be more properly considered as a noun.

MUCH'EL, adj. for muckle or mickle. [mycel, Saxon.] Much.

He had in arms abroad won muckle fame,
And fill'd far lands with glory of his might. Spenser, F. Q.

MUCHNESS. n. s. [from much.] Quantity. It is sometimes, in low language, used for quality: "much of a muchness," i. e. much of the same kind.

This sluggish humour is condemned long ago for a misempower of time. And surely it is not alone very dangerous, in regard to the quantity and sameness of time which it filcheth; but also as regard of the quality and goodness: for it ordinarily feeds gluttoniously on the very fat of time; it eats the very flower of the day; and consumes the first fruits of our hours, even the morning season.

Whately, Redemption of Time, (1634), p. 30.
MUCHWHAT. adv. [much and what.] Nearly.

The motion being conveyed from the brain of man to the fancy of another, it is there received;
and the same kind of strings being moved, and muchwhat after the same manner as in the first instrument. Glanville, Scorpia.

The bigness of her body and bill, as likewise the form of them, is muchwhat as follows.

Morc, Adv. against Aethiops.
If we will disbelieve every thing, because we cannot know all things, we shall do muchwhat as wisely as he who would not use his legs because he had no wings to fly. Locke.

Unless he can prove celibatism a man or a woman, this Latin will be muchwhat the same with a solocism. Aiturbury.

MUC'ID, adj. [mucidus, Latin; macre, Fr.] Slimy; musty.

MUC'IDNESS. n. s. [from mucid.] Sliminess; mustiness. Ainworth.

MUC'ILAGE. n. s. [mucilage, French.] A mixture or viscous mass; a body with a slimy or viscous sufficient to hold it together.

Dissolution of gum tragacanth, and oil of sweet almonds, do comingle, the oil remaining on the top till they be stirred, and make the mucilage somewhat more liquid. Bacon.

Your alumnus need more with a broom than the seeds clog not together, unless you will separate it from the mucilage, for then you must a little bruise it wet. Boyle.

Both the ingredients improve one another; for the mucilage adds to the lubricity of the oil, and the oil preserves the mucilage from inspissation.

Ray on Creation.
MUCILAGINOUS. adj. [mucilagineus, Fr. from mucilage.] Slimy; viscous; soft with some degree of tenacity.

There is a twofold liquor prepared for the inunction and lubrication of the heads or ends of the bones; an oily one, furnished by the marrow;
and a mucilaginous supplied by certain glandules seated in the articulations. Ray on Creation.

There is a sort of magnetism in all, not mucilaginous but resinous gums, even in common rock. Green, Comed. Sac.

MUCILAGINOUS glands.

Mucilaginous glands are of two sorts:
some are small, and in a manner miliary glands; the other sort are conglomerated, or many glandules collected and planted one upon another. Quincy.

MUCILAGINOUSNESS. n. s. [from mucilaginous.] Sliminess; viscosity.

MUCK† n. s. [moex, Saxon; muck, Su.
Goth. fimus.]

1. Dung for manure of grounds.
Hale out thy muck, and plow out thy ground. Tusser.

It is usual to help the ground with muck, and likewise to recomfort with muck put to the roots;
but the water it with muck water, which is like to be more forcible, is not practised. Bacon, Nat. Hist.

The swine may see the pearl, which yet be values but with the ordinary muck. Glanville, Apology.

There are, who
Rich foreign mold on their ill-natur'd land
Induce laborious, and with fattening muck Besmear the roots. Philips.

Morning insects that in much begun,
Shine, buzz, and fly-low in the setting sun. Pope.

2. Any thing low, mean, and filthy. Dr.
Johnson says, citing only the example from Spenser. The word may be rather intended simply for a heap, from the Saxon, muck.

Reward of worldly much does foully bleed,
And low abuse the high heroic spirit
That joys for crowns. Spenser, F. Q.

Your gathering sire so long heap muck together,
That their kind sons, to rid them of their care, Wish them in heaven. Bacon & Ft. Spens. Cerate.

A huge mass of treasure — the fatal muck
We quarrell'd for. Bacon & Ft. Spens. Cerate.

3. To run a MUCK, signifies, I know not from what derivation, to run madly, and attack all that we meet. Dr. Johnson.
— Tavernier says, certain Java lords, on a particular occasion, called the English traitors, and drawing their poisoned daggers cried a mucka upon the English!
killing a great number of them, before they had time to put themselves in a posture of defence. Voyages, vol. ii. p. 202.

Again he tells us, that a Banta-mois, newly come from Mecca, was upon the design of mogua; that is, in their language, when the rascality of the Mahometans return from Mecca, they presently take their axe in their hand, which is a kind of poniard, the blade whereof is half poisoned, with which they run through the streets, and kill all those which are not of the Mahomenetan law, till they be killed themselves.
Ibid. p. 199. Rev. Mr. Pegge, Cent. Mag.
vol. xxxviii. p. 283. — The inhabitants of the islands to the eastward of Bengal, such as Sumatra, Burnee, Banco, and the coast of Malay, are very famous for cock-fighting, in which they carry gaming to a much greater excess than the customs of Europe can admit. They stake first their property; and when by repeated losses all their money and effects are gone, they stake their wives and children. If fortune still frowns, so that nothing is left, the losing gamester begins to chew or eat what is called bang, which I imagine to be the same as opium; when it begins to operate, he disfigures himself and furnishes himself with such weapons as he can get, the more deadly, the fitter for his purpose;
and the effect of the opium increasing,
he at length becomes mad. This madness is of the furious kind; and when it seizes him, he rushes forth, and kills whatever comes in his way, whether man or beast, friend or foe; and commits every outrage which may be expected from a man in such circumstances. This is what the Indians call a-muck. Cent. Mag. vol. xl. p. 564. —
A-mocka, or a-muck, (for so the word should be written,) is used in the Malay language, adverbially, as one word, and signifies, if we may so write, killingly.

† He runs a-muck, i. e. he runs with a savage intent to kill whosoever he meets." Malone, Dryden's Prose-Works, Add. and Emend. p. 155.

Frontless and satire-proof he scow'rs the streets,
And runs an Indian muck all he meets.

Dryden.

Satire's my weapon, but I'm too discreet
To run a muck, and tilt at all meet. Pope, Hor.
MUCK.* adj. Moist; wet; Lincolnshire.
Grose.

To MUCK. v. a. [from the noun.] To manure with muck; to dung.
Thy garden plot lately wet trenched and muck'd
Would now be twifallow'd. Tuam.

MUCKENDER.* n. s. [mouchoir, French; mocadero, Spanish; mucunium, low Lat. Dr. Johnson. — It is, in some places, called muckinger; and in Barre's old dictionary muckier. The root is the Lat. mucus; old French mucos, whence mucoudan, an old word for mouchoir. A handkerchief.

Be of good comfort; take my muckinder,
And dry thine eyes. B. Jonson, Tale of a Tub.
For thy dull fancy a muckinder is fit,
To wipe the slabbings of thy snotty wit. Dorset.
To MUCKEN.* v. a. [from muck, a heap; mucy, Sax. muckiere, Ital. to heap up; mucka, Icel.] To heap up; to get or save meanly; a word used by Chaucer, and still retained in conversation.
That gold, and that money, shieth, and yereb better renouwe to them that dispenden it, than to thilke folke that muckeren it.

Chaucer, Boeth. ii. p. 5.

Pease that he can muckey and ketchie.
Chaucer, Tr. and Cras. iii. 1361.
MUCKERER.* n. s. [from muck.] One that muckers; a miser; a niggard.
Avarice maketh alwaies muckers to bea hated.

Chaucer, Boeth. ii. p. 5.

MUCKHEAP.* n. s. [muck and heap.] A dunghill.

A very midden or muckheap of all the grossest errors and heresies of the Roman church.
Pemier, Satyr. Triump. over Novelty, (1619,) p. 518.
MUCKHILL.* n. s. [muck and hill.] A dunghill.
Old Euclio — as he went from home, seeing a crow sret upon the muck-hill, returned in all haste, taking it for an ill sign his money was digged up.
Burton, Anat. of Mel. p. 116.
Hiserto amongst you I have liv'd,
Like an unsavoury muck-hill to myself.

B. Jonson, Every Man out of his Humour.

MUCKINGER.* See MUCKENDER.
MUCKMIDDEN.* n. s. [muck and midden.] A dunghill. Used in the north of England. See MIDDEN.

MUCKINKS. n. s. [from mucky.] Nastiness; filth.

MUCKLE. adj. [mycel, Saxon.] Much.
MUCKWEAT. n. s. [muck and weat; in this low word, muck signifies wet, moist.] Profuse sweat.

MUCKWORM. n. s. [muck and worm.] 1. A worm that lives in dung.

2. A miser; a curmudgeon.
Worms suit all conditions;
Misers are muckworms, with worms' houses.
And death-watches physicians. Swift, Miscell.
Mucky. adj. [from muck.] Nasty; filthy.
Mucky filth his branching arms outstays,
And with uncomely weeds the gentle wave ascends.

Spenser, F. Q.

MUCOUS. adj. [mucosus, Latin.] Slimy; viscidous.

The salamander being cold in the fourth, and moist in the third degree, and having also a mucous humidity above and under the skin, may a while endure the flame. Brown.
About these the nerves and other vessels make a fine web, covered over with a mucous substance, to moisten these papillæ pyramidales.
Cheyne, Philos. Principles.

MUCOUSNESS. n. s. [from mucous.] Slime; viscosity.

MUCRO. n. s. [Latin.] A point.
The mucro, or point of the heart, inclineth unto the left, by this position it giving way unto the ascension of the midriff. Brown, Vulg. Err.

MUCRONATED. adj. [mucro, Lat.] Narrowed to a sharp point.
Gems are here shot into rows consisting of six sides, and mucronated or terminating in a point. Woodward.

MUCULENT. adj. [from mucus, Lat.] Viscous; slimy. Diet.

MUCUS. n. s. [Latin.] It is more properly used for that which flows from the papillary processes through the os cribriforme into the nostrils; but it is also used for any slimy liquor or moisture, as that which daubs over and guards the bowels and all the chief passages in the body; and it is separated by the mucilaginous glands.

Quincy.
In the action of chewing, the mucus mizeth with the aliment; the mucus is an humour different from the spitte, and the great quantity of air which it contains helps to dissolve the aliment. Arbutnot on Aliments.

MUD.* n. s. [moder, German; modd, Su. Goth. cænum.] The slime and uliginous matter at the bottom of still water.
The purest spring is not so free from mud.
As I am clear from treason. Shakespeare, Hen. VI.

Water in mud doth putrefy, as not able to preserve itself. Bacon, Nat. Hist.
The channel was dried up, and the fish left dead and stinking in the mud. L'Esrange.
The force of the fluid will separate the smallest particles, so as to leave vacant interstices, which will be again filled up by particles carried on by the succeeding fluid, as a bank by the sand of the current, which must be reduced to that figure which gives least resistance to the current. Arbutnot.

A fountain in a darksome wood,
Nor stain'd with falling leaves nor rising mud.

Addison.

To MUD. v. a. [from the noun.] 1. To bury in the slime or mud.

I wish
Myself were muddied in that oozy bed,
Where my son lies. Shakespeare, Tempest.

2. To make turbid; to pollute with dirt; to dash with dirt; to foul by stirring up the sediment.

I shall not stir in the waters which have been already muddied by so many contentious equivies. Chenille, Scops.

MUDDILY. adv. [from muddy.] Turbidity; with foul mixture.

Lacius writ not only loosely and muddyly, with little art, and much less care, but also in a time which was not yet sufficiently purged from barbarism. Dryden.

MUDDINESS. n. s. [from muddy.] Turbidity; foulness caused by mud, dregs, or sediment.

Our next stage brought us to the mouth of the Tiber: the season of the year, the muddiness of the stream, with the many green trees hanging over it, put me in mind of the delightful image that Virgil has given when Æneas took the first view of it. Addison on Italy.

Turn the bottle upside down; by this means you will not lose one drop, and the froth will conceal the muddiness. Swift, Direct. to Servants.

To MUDDLE. v. a. [from mud.]

1. To make turbid; to foul; to make muddy.

The neighbourhood told him, he did ill to muddle the water and spoil the drink. L'Esrange.

Yet let the goddess smile or frown,
Broad we shall eat, or white or brown;
And in a cottage, or a court,
Drink fine champagne, or muddled port. Prior.

2. To make half drunk; to cloud or stupefy.

I was for five years often drunk, always muddled; they carried me from tavern to tavern. Arbutnot, Hist. of J. Bull.

Epicurus seems to have had his brain so muddled and confounded, that he scarce ever kept in the right way, though the main maxim of his philosophy was to trust to his senses, and follow his nose. Beattie, Sermon.

To MUDDLE.* v. n. To contract filth; to be in a dirty or confused state.

He never muddles in the dirt. Swift.
His summum bonum is muddling in particulars. Gericke.

MUDDLE.* n. s. [from the verb.] A confused or turbid state; a vulgar expression.

MUDDY. adj. [from mud.]

1. Turbid; foul with mud.

A woman mudd' is like a fountain troubled,
Muddy, ill-scenting, thick, bereft of beauty. Shakespeare.

Her garments, heavy with their drink,
Pull'd the poor wretch from her melodious lay
To muddy death. Shakespeare, Hamlet.

Carry it among the whistlers in Dutchet mead, and there empty it in the muddy ditch close by the Thames. Shakespeare.

Who can a pure and crystal current bring
From such a muddy and polluted spring?

Sandy, Persol.

I strove in vain the infected blood to cure,
Streams will run muddy where the spring's impure. Rowe, Comm.

Till by the fury of the storm full blown,
The muddy bottom o'er the clouds is thrown.

Dryden.

Out of the true fountains of science painters and statues are bound to draw, without amusing themselves with dipping in streams which are often muddy, at least troubled; I mean the manner of their masters, after whom they creep. Dryden.

2. Impure; dark; gross.

There's not the smallest orb which thou behold'st,
But in his motion like an angel sings,
Still quivering to the young-ey'd cherubims;
Such harmony is in immortal sounds;
But whilst this muddy vesture of decay
Doth grossly close us in, we cannot hear it. Shakespeare.

If you chuse, for the composition of such ornament, such ingredients as do make the spirits a little more gross or muddy, thereby the imagination will fit the better. Bacon.

3. Soiled with mud.

His passengers
Expoy'd in muddy weeds, upon the miry shore. Dryden.

4. Dark; not bright.

The black

A more inferior stain seeks,
Leaving the fiery red behind,
And mingles in her muddy cheeks. Swift, Miscell.

5. Cloudy in mind; dull;

Do'st think I am so muddy, so unsettled,
To appoint myself in this vexation.

Yet, I,

A dull and muddy-mettled rascal, peak,
Like John-a-dreams, unpergent in my cause,
And can say nothing. Shakespeare, Hamlet.

To MUDDY, v. a. [from mud.] To make muddy; to cloud; to disturb.

The people muddied,
Thick and unwholesome in their thoughts and whippers.

Excess, either with an apoplexy, knocks a man on the head; or with a fever, like fire in a strong-water-soup, burns him down to the ground; or if it flames not out, charks him to a coal; muddies
the best wit, and makes it only to flutter and froth high. Greene, Outland. Sacr.

MUDDY-HEADED.* adj. [muddy and head.] Having a cloudy understanding.

Many boys are muddy-headed, till they be clarified with age; and such afterwards prove the best. Fuller, Holy State, p. 100.

MUNDUCKER. n. s. [mud and suck.] A sea fowl.

In all water-fowl, their legs and feet correspond to that way of life; and in munduckers, two of the toes are somewhat joined, that they may not easily sink. Derham.

MUNDALL. n. s. [mud and wall.]

1. A wall built without mortar, by throwing up mud and suffering it to dry.

If conscience contract rust or soil, a man may as well expect to see his face in a mundwall, as that such a conscience should give him a true report of his condition. South.

2. [Apiaster.] A bird so called.

MUNDWALLED. adj. [mud and wall.] Having a mud-wall.

As folks from mud-walled retirement
Bring landlords pepper corn for rent;
Present a turkey, or a hen,
To those might better spare them ten. Prior.

To MUR, v. a. a. [mur, Fr.]

1. To moul; to change feathers; to change. See To MEW.

Their nakedness with sackcloth let them hide,
And mure the vestments of their silken pride.
Quarles, Hist. of Jonah, (1620), II. 3.

2. To low as a cow; usually pronounced moo, though mure seem to be the orthography. [mur, old French; mueren, Germ.; magro, Lat.]

MURF. n. s. [murf, Scdisch.] A soft cover for the hands in winter.

Feel but the difference, soft and rough,
This a gantlet, that a murf. Cleveland.

What! no more favours, nor a ribbon mare,
Not fan, nor murf? Shocking.

The lady of the spotted murf began. Dryden.
A child that stands in the dark upon his mother's murf, says he stands upon something, he knows not what. Locke.

MUFFIN.* n. s. A kind of light cake.

To MUFFLE, v. a. [from mouffle, French; a winter glove. Dr. Johnson.—Rather from the old French muffle, "la partie inferieure de la tête de quelques animaux." Lacourbe. "Muffle, snout or muzzle." Cotgrave. The original meaning is to conceal part of the face; not to cover from the weather, as Dr. Johnson has given it; nor is there any occasion for his second distinction of to blindfold; most of the examples under which belong to the first.]

1. To conceal part or the whole of the face; "to muffle the mouth." Barret.

Alas that love, whose view is muffled still,
Should without eyes see pathways to his ill.

We've caught the woodcock, and will keep him muffled. Shakespeare, All's Well.

Loss of sight is the misery of life, and usually the fore-runner of death: when the malefactor comes once to be muffled, and the fatal cloth drawn over his eyes, we know that he is lost from his execution. South.

Bright Lucifer
That night his heavenly form obscur'd with tears;
And since he was forbid to leave the skies,
He muffled with a cloud his mournful eyes.

His muffled feature speaks him a recluse,
His ruins prove him a religious house. Cleveland.

You must be muffled up like ladies. Dryden.
The face lies muffled up within the garret.

2. To wrap; to cover.

Halbutius muffled in his noble cloak,
Like an old druid from his hollow oak. Young.

3. To conceal; to involve; to wrap up.

This is one of the strongest examples of a personation that ever was: although the king's manner of showing things by pieces, and by dark lights, hath so muffled it, that it hath left it almost as a mystery. Bacon, Hen. VII.

No muffling clouds, nor shades infernal, can
From his inquiry hide offending man. Stanley, Parnass.

Our understandings lie grovelling in this lower region, muffled up in mists and darkness. Glanville, Scopia.

The thoughts of kings are like religious groves,
The walks of muffled gods. Dryden, Dan. Sebastian.

One, muffled up in the infallibility of his sect, will not enter into a debate with a person that will question any of those things which to him are sacred. Locke.

They were in former ages muffled up in darkness and superstition. Arbuthnot, Hist. of J. Bull.

To MUFFLE, v. n. [moufflen, moufflen, Dutch. The true word is muffle; which is still in use. See To MAFLE.]

To speak inarticulately; to speak without clear and distinct articulation.

The freedom or aptness and vigour of pronouncing, as to the Bocce Romana, and giving somewhat more of aspiration; and the closeness and muffling, and lateness of speaking, render the sound of speech different. Holder.

MUFFLER, n. s. [from muffle.]

1. A cover for the face.

Fortune is painted with a muffer before her eyes, to signify to you that fortune is blind.

Mr. Hales has found out the best expedients for preventing immediate suffocation from tainted air, by breathing through mufflers, which imbibe these vapours. Arbuthnot on Air.

2. A part of a woman's dress, by which the face was partially, or almost wholly, covered; a kind of mask.

There is no woman's gown big enough for him; otherwise he might put on a hat, a muffer, and a handkerchief, and so escape. Shakespeare, M. Wives of Windsor.

The goddess Anergoma was with a muffer upon her mouth placed upon the altar of Volupta, to represent, that those persons who bear their sickness and sorrows without murmure, shall certainly pass from sorrow to pleasure.

Bp. Taylor, Holy Dying, § 4. ch. 3.

The Lord will take away your tinkling ornaments, chains, bracelets, and muffers. Isa. iii. 19.

MUGGI, n. s. [a Turkish word.] The high priest of the Mahometans.

The Indians have their brachman, the Turks their muggi. Volney, Diggers Day, p. 190.

I tell thee, muggi,
Good feasting is devout, and thou our bread,
Hast a religious ruddy countenance. Dryden.

MUG, n. s. [Skinner derives it from mugil, Welsh, warm; implying that our mug is a cup for warming drink.]

The word is of no great age in our language; and is not enumerated among the many quaint appellations of pots and glasses which are to be found in Hey-wood's Drunkard Opened, 1635. It is a word coined perhaps in sport. In Young's Description of Drunkenness, 1617, it is said, "I have seen a company amongst the very woods and forrests drinking for a muggle. Sixe determined to trye their strengths who could drinke most glasses for a muggle. The first drinks a glasse of the mug, the second two, the next three, and so every one multieth till the last taketh six." sign.
E. 4. b. What this muggle means I know not; and therefore am unable to pronounce mug as connected with it.]
A cup to drink in.

Ab Boreybe, why didst thou stay so long?
The mugs were large, the drink was wound strong. Gay.

MUGGARD.* adj. Sullen; displeased.
Exmore dialect. Grose. Probably a corruption of mugger, as used in huggermugger; morchel, Dan. darkness.

MUGGY, { adj. [corrupted from much, MUGGISH, } for damp.]

1. Moist; damp; mouldy.

Cover with muggy straw to keep it moist. Mortimer.

2. Thick; close; misty; [from moky, which see.]

MUGGLETO'NIAS.* n. s. One of a sect of enthusiasts formed about the year 1657 by Lodowick Muggleton, a journeyman taylor, who set up for a prophet.

The Seekers, a sect in those times, renounced all ordinances; and so did the sect of the Muggletonia.
Grey, Notes on Hudibras.

MUGHOUSE, n. s. [mug and house.] An ale house; a low house of entertainment.

He has the confidence to say that there is a mug-house near Long-Acre, where you may every evening hear an exact account of dissenes of this kind. Tristram, No. 18.

Our sex has dar'd the squalidness clerks to meet,
And purchas'd fame in many a well fought street.
Tickell.

MUGIL.* n. s. [mugil, Lat.] A name for the mullet.

In common constructions, mugil is rendered a mullet, which, notwithstanding, is a different fish from the mugil described by authors.

See T. Browne, Miscell. p. 104.
It is thought wonderful among the sciences, that

MUL

magü, of all fates the swiftest, is found in the belly of the brute, of all the slowest.

Idy. Campaign.

MUGIENT. adj. [mugiens, Lat.] Bellowing.

That a bitter maketh that mugiens noise or bumping, by putting its bill into a reed, or by putting the same in water or mud, and after a while releasing the air, but suddenly excluding it again, is not easily made out.

Brown.

MUGWORT. n. s. [mugwort, Saxon; artemisia, Latin.]

The flowers and fruit of the mugwort are very like those of the wormwood, but grow erect upon the branches.

Miller.

Some of the most common simples with us in England are coufly, hogle, Paul's betony, and mugwort.

Warton.

MULATTO. n. s. [mulata, Spanish; mulet, French; from mulus, Lat.] One begot between a white and a black, as a mule between different species or animals.

Purgatory, which is a device to make men be mulatas, as the Spaniard calls half Christians.

Dr. Taylor, Diss. from Popery, ch. ii. § 3.

Mulatas are not Ethiopians.

MULBERRY. n. s. [morangio, Saxon; MULBERRY tree, n. [morus, Latin.]

1. The mulberry tree hath large, round, roundish leaves; the male flowers; or katkins, which have a calyx consisting of four leaves, are sometimes produced upon separate trees, at other times at remote distances from the fruit on the same tree: the fruit is composed of several protuberances, to each of which adhere four small leaves; the seeds are roundish, growing singly in each protuberance; it is planted for the delicacy of the fruit. The white mulberry is commonly cultivated for its leaves to feed silkworms, in France and Italy, though the Persians always make use of the common black mulberry for that purpose.

Miller.

Mortino, archbishop of Canterbury, was content to use morus as a tree, with something like a mulberry tree called morus in Latin, out of a tin.

Camden, Rem.

2. The fruit of the tree.

The ripest mulberry.

That will not hold the handling. Shakespeare, Coriol. A body black, round, with small grain-like tubercles on the surface; not very unlike a mulberry.

Woodward on Fossils.

MULCH. n. s. [perhaps a corruption of mull.] Rotten or crumbled dung. See MULL.

If mulch be used, it should be thoroughly rotten, and almost reduced to mould.

Adelphi Transmutans, xv. 138.

MULCT. n. s. [mulcta, Latin.] A fine; a penalty: used commonly of pecuniary penalty.

Due you then Agave Hellenæ, with all her treasure, here

Restore to us, and pay the mulct that by your vows is due.

Chapman.

Because this is a great part, and Eusebius hath said nothing, we will by way of mulct or pain, lay it upon him.

Bacon.

Look humble upward, see his will disclose The forfeit first, and then the fine impose;

A mulct thy poverty could never pay, Had not eternal wisdom found the way. Dryden.

MUL

To MULCT. † v. a. [mulcto, Latin; mulctier, French.] To punish with fine or forfeiture.

Marriage without consent of parents they do not make void, but they mulct it in the inheritance for the children of such marriages are not admitted to inherit above a third part of their parents' inheritance.

Bacon, New Atlantis.

All fraud must be banished out of their markets; or, if it does to intrude, soundly punished, and mulcted with due satisfaction.

By. Hall, Cases of Conscience, D. 1. C. 7.

MULCTUARY. † adj. [from mulct.] Punishing with fine or forfeiture.

He wishes fewer laws, as they were better observed; and for those [that] are mulctuary, he undertakes their institution not to be like briars, and springs, to catch every thing they lay hold of; but like sun-marks, — to avoid the shipwreck of ignorant passengers.

Oberbury, Chancel. (1637), sign. N. 4. b.

Fines, or some known mulctuary punishments upon other crimes.

Temple, Intr. Hist. of Eng. p. 172.

MULE. † n. s. [mül, Saxon; mule, mulet, French; mula, Latin.] An animal generated between a he ass and a mare; or sometimes between a horse and a she ass.

You have among you many a purchased slave, Which, like your asses, and your dogs, and mules, You use in abject and in slavish part. Shakespeare. Five hundred asses yearly took the horse, Producing mules of greater speed and force.

Sandys.

Those effluvia in the male seed have the greatest stroke in generation, as is demonstrable in a mule, which doth more resemble the parent, that is, the male, than the female.

Ray.

Twelve young mules, a strong laborious race.

Pope.

MULETEER. † n. s. [mulctier, French; mulo, Latin.] Mule-driver; horse-boy.

These muleteers,

Like peasant foot-boys, do they keep the walls, And dress not take up arms like grottiere.

Shakespeare.

Your ships are not well manned, Your mariners are muleteers, reapers. Shakespeare.

About a quarter of an hour farther, we came up with our muleteers; they having pitched our tents, before they had gone so far as we intended.

MULIEBRITY. † n. s. [muliebris, Lat.] Womanhood; the contrary to virility; the manners and character of woman.

The ladies of Rhodes, hearing that you have lost

A capital part of your lady-wares, Have made their petition to Cupid,

To plague you above all others,

As one prejudicial to their muliebrity.

Soliman and Perseda, (1599).

MULISH. † adj. [from mule.] Like a mule; obstinate as a mule. Modern.

The curls invented for the mulish mouth Of head-strong youths were broken. Cooper, Teut.

MULL. † n. s. [M. Goth. muld; Su. Goth. mull.] Dust; rubbish. See MULLOCK.

That other cove of straw and mull With stones may be fill'd also;

Thus be they full both two.

Greene, Conf. Am. B. 5.

To MULL. † v. a. [molitus Latin.]

1. To soften and dissipate, as wine is when burnt and sweetened.

Hanmer.

Peace is a very apoplexy, lethargy, Mull, d. deaf, sleepy, insensible. Shakespeare, Coriol.

MUL

2. To heat any liquor, and sweeten and spice it.

Drink new cyder mull'd with ginger warm.

Gay.

MULLERIN. n. s. [verbascom, Latin.] A plant.

Miller.

MULLER. † n. s. [mouleur, French; from mola, Icel. to crumble, to break into small pieces.] A stone held in the hand with which any powder is ground upon a horizontal stone. It is now often called improperly muller.

The best grinder is the porphyry, white or green marble, with a muller or upper stone of the same, cut very even without flaws or holes; you may make a muller also of a flat pebble, by grinding it smooth at a grindstone.

Pencman.

MULLET. † n. s. [mulus, Lat.; mulet, Fr.] A sea fish.

Care must be taken, lest, being deceived by the identity of names, we take our English mulet to be the mulus of the ancients.

Ray, Dict. Triling. p. 25.

Of carps and mullets why prefer the great? Yet for small turbot such esteem profess.

Pope.

MULLIGRUB. † n. s. Twisting of the guts; sometimes allusion. Dr. Johnson from Ainsworth. — Sick of the mulligrub; low spirited; having an ungainly sickness.

Grose, Class. Dict. Dr. Jamieson defines the Scottish mulligran, mulligrub, or mulligrub, the act of whining, complaining, or murmuring; and cites the Icel. mogla, murmur, and grawn, the countenance, q. d. such whining as distorts the countenance; or, as including two ideas nearly connected, grunnia, murmuring and grunting. He finds another apparent etymon in the Teut. muglen, to mutter, with the Germ.

grob, great, q. d. a great complaint or muttering. Whether this be the origin or not, the word certainly seems to have been old in English, as a contemptuous expression; though Dr. Johnson could find no example of it.

What's the matter?

Whether go all these men members? these physicians?

Whose dogs lie sick of the mulligrub?

Bacon, and Fl. Mon. Thomas.

MULLION. n. s. [moulure, French.] A division in a window frame: a bar; a munnion, or munion, which is commonly, and perhaps correctly, pronounced mullion.

To MULLION. † v. a. [from the noun.] To shape into divisions in a window.

Such is the fabric of our ancient churches and cathedrals. The slender pillars imitate the taper trunk of a tree. The curve of the arches is from the delicate branching of the boughs in a wood or grove. The mullion'd lacework of the windows, the like, intercepting the dubious light, as in a real grove. Statley, Palgrave, Scenery, (1768), p. 18.

MULLOCK. † n. s. Rubbish. Dr. Johnson from Ainsworth. — This is an old word, the same as mull; and yet used in several places, signifying, dirt, rubbish, or ashes. See MULL.

The mullion on an heap yepweed was

Chancer, Chan. Yeom. Tabl.

MULSE. n. s. [mulsum, Lat.] Wine boiled and mingled with honey.

Diet.

MULTIPRESENCE. n. s. [multus and præsentia, Lat.] The power or act of being present in more places than one at the same time.

This cleverest tale of transubstantiation was surely brought into the world, and upon the stage, by that other fable of the multipresence of Christ's body.

MULTISCIOUS. adj. [multiscius, Latin.] Having variety of knowledge.

MULTISILIGUOUS. adj. [multus and siligua, Latin.] The same with cornuculate: used of plants, whose seed is contained in many distinct seed-vessels.

MULTISONOUS. [multisonus, Latin.] Having many sounds.

MULTISYLLABLE. n. s. [multus, Latin, and syllable,] A polysyllable; a word of many syllables.

Which is to be observed, not only in the length of sentences, but of words; among which a multisyllable better answers a monosyllable precedent, than a monosyllable a multisyllable.

Instruct. for Oratory, (1692), p. 38.

MULTITUDE. n. s. [multitudo, French; multitudo, Latin.]

1. The state of being many; the state of being more than one.

2. Number collective; a sum of many; more than one.

It is impossible that any multitude can be actually infinite, or so great that there cannot be a greater.

3. A great number, loosely and indefinitely. It is a fault in a multitude of preachers, that they utterly neglect method in their harangues.

4. A crowd or throng; the vulgar.

He the vast hissing multitude admires. Addison.

MULTITUDINOUS. adj. [from multitudo.] 1. Having the appearance of a multitude.

Will all great Neptune's ocean wash this blood clean from my hand? No, this my hand will rather Thy multitudinous nose incurious, / Making the green one red. Shakespeare, Macbeth.

2. Manifold.

At once pluck out / The multitudinous tongue, let them not lick / The sweet that is their poison. Shakespeare.

3. Belonging to a multitude.

There was another parsing speech, which was to have been presented in the person of a youth, and accompanied with divers gentlemen's younger sons of the country; but, by reason of the multitudinous press, was hindered. B. Jonson, Entertainments.

MULTIVAGANT. adj. [multivagus, Lat.] MULTIVAGOUS. adj. That wanders or strays much abroad.

MULTIVIOUS. adj. [multus and via, Lat.] Having many ways; manifold.

MULTOCULAR. adj. [multus and oculus, Lat.] Having more eyes than two.

Fies are multocular, having as many eyes as there are perforations in their cornea.

Darwin, Physico-Theol.

MOLTURE. n. s. [molture, Fr. from molo, Lat. to grind.] A grist, or grinding; the corn ground; is also the toll, or fee, that is due for grinding. Cotgrave, and Sherwood. Moller, the toll of a mill; used in the north of England. Grose. This old English word is common in Scotland.

VOL. II.

MUM. interj. [Of this word the supposed original is mentioned in mome: it may be observed, that when it is pronounced it leaves the lips closed.]

Mumme, Danish, a mask; whence nummers and maskers are the same. [Upton.] A word denoting prohibition to speak, or resolution not to speak; silence; hush.

But to his speech he answered not 'whit,' / But stood still mute, as if he had been dumb, / No sign of sence did shew, no common wit, / As one with griefe and anguish over-cum, / And unto every thing did answer none. Shakespeare, F. Q.

Mum then, and no more proceed. Shakespeare, Tempest.

Well said, master; mum / and gaze your fill. Shakespeare.

Intrust it under solemn vows, / Of mum, and silence, and the rose. Hudibras.

MUM. adj. Silent.

The citizens are mum, say not a word. Shakespeare, Rich. III.

They rage with wrath, they daily fret and fume; / Ruthful revenge then always hath in sute, / And right in time makes might both mum and mute. Mir. for Mag. p. 312.

The mum club is an institution of the same nature, and as great an enemy to noise.

Addison, Spect. No. 9.

MUM-BUDGET. interj. [mum and budget.] "I come to her in white, and cry mum; she cries, budget; and by that we know one another." Shakespeare, Merr. Wives of Windsor. "To play mumbudget, demure court, Fr." which Cotgrave renders "to be gravelled, put to silence or a nonplus." An expression denoting secrecy as well as silence; used in a contemptuous or ludicrous manner.

I thought he laught not merrier than I, when I got this money;

But mumbudget for Carinagous I egipt. Damon and Pythias, sign. C. iii. b.

To MU'MMIFY. v. a. [mummy, and fit, Latin.] To preserve as a mummy; to make a mummy of.

Thy virtues are
The spices that embalm thee; thou art far
More richly laid, and shalt more long remain
Still mummified within the hearts of men,
Than if to lift thee in the rolls of fame
Each marble spoke thy shape, all brass thy name.
J. Hall, Poems (1646), p. 50.

MU'MMY. † n. s. [mumie, French; mumia, Latin; derived by Salmasius from ammum, Latin, by Bochart, from the Arabic mumia, mineral wax, perhaps from its consistency; but the Arabians term it mumia; whence, it may be, embalmed bodies came to be called mummies, from their being preserved with this pissasphalt; and this we are the more apt to believe, since the true asphalt, or bitumen Judaicum, was very scarce. Greenhill, Art of Embalming, 1705, p. 277.]

1. A dead body preserved by the Egyptian art of embalming.

We have two substances for medicinal use under the name of mummy: one is the dried flesh of human bodies embalmed with myrrh and spice; the other is the liquor running from such mummies when newly prepared, or when affected by great heat, or by damp: this is sometimes of a liquid, sometimes of a solid form, as it is preserved in vials, or suffered to dry: the first kind is brought in large pieces, of a friable texture, light and spongy, of a blackish brown colour, and often black and clammy on the surface; it is of a strong but not agreeable smell; the second, in its liquid state, is a thick, opaque, and viscous fluid, of a blackish and a strong, but not disagreeable smell, in its indurated state it is a dry, solid substance, of a fine shining black colour and close texture, easily broken, and of a good smell: this sort is extremely dear, and the first sort so cheap, that we are not to imagine it to be the ancient Egyptian mummy. What our druggists are supplied with is the flesh of any bodies the Jews can get, who fill them with the common bitumen so plentiful in that part of the world, and adding aloes, and some other cheap ingredients, send them to be baked in an oven till the juices are exhaled, and the embalming matter has penetrated.

Hill, Mat. Med.
It is strange how long carcases have continued uncorrupt, as appeareth in the mummies of Egypt, having lasted some of them three thousand years.

Bacon, Nat. Hist.
Sav'd by spice, like mummies, many a year.
Old bodies of philosophy appear. Pope, Dunciad.

2. The liquor which distils from mummies; any gum.

The work—
Was died in mummy, which the skillful Conserv'd of maidens' hearts. Shakespeare, Othello.
In or near this place is a precious liquor of mummy growing:—a moist, redolent gum it is, sovereign against poisons.

Like a tame mumping squirrel with a bell on. Otway.

2. To talk low and quick.

3. [In cant language.] To beg. Ainsworth.

4. To deceive; to cheat.

I'm resolved hereafter to bend my thoughts wholly for the service of the nursery, and mump your proud players! D. of Buckingham, Rehearsal.
He watches them like a youngling brother, that is afraid to be mump'd of his suit.

Wycherley, Love in a Wood.

MU'MPER. n. s. [In cant language.] A beggar.

To MUMP. v. n.

1. To chatter; to make mouths; to grin like an ape.

Thou world of marmosets and mumping apes,
Unmake; put off thy feigned, borrowed shapes.
Morison, Scourge of Vill. (1599), lib. 9.

The ghost knocks; Harlequin opens the door, and, seeing the apparition, runs backward in a fright, whips up a dash of vermicelli, with which he retreats under the table: the ghost enters, sits down at table, talks to Don John, while Harlequin mumps below, with such buffoonery as excites the mirth of the whole audience.

Drummond, Trav. (Leti 1744), p. 35.

2. To implore notice by making a face of distress; to beg with a false pretence. A cant word.

They had no way left for getting rid of this mendacious perseverance, but by sending for the beadle, and forcibly driving our embassy of shreds and patches, with all its mumping cant, from the inhospitable door of cannibal castle.

The doors are all shut up; the wealthier sort,
With arms across, and hats upon their eyes,
Walk to and fro before their silent shops. Dryden.

- To MURMUR. v. n. [murmur, Latin; murmur, French.]

1. To give a low shrill sound.

The murmuring surge
That on the unnumber'd isle pebbles chafes,
Can scarce be heard so high. Shakspeare, P. Lear.
Amid an isle around whose rocky shore
The forests murmur, and the surges roar,
A godless guards in her enchanted dome. Pope.

The busy bees with a soft murmuring strain,
Invite to slumber the lab'ring wains. Dryden.

2. To grumble; to utter secret and sullen discontent; with at before things, and against before persons.

The good we have enjoy'd from heaven's free will;
And shall we murmur to endure the ill? Dryden.

Murmur not of your sickness, for thereby you will sin against God's providence. Wale, Prop. for Death.

The good consequences of this scheme, which will execute itself without murmuring against the government, are very visible. Bayly.

- MURMURATION. n. s. [murmuratio, Lat.]

- MURMURER. n. s. [from murmur.] One who repines; one who complains sullenly; a grumbler; a repiner; a complainer.

Heaven's peace be with him!
That's christian care enough; for living murmurer!

There's plenty of rebuke. Shakspeare, Hen. VIII.
The murmurer is turned off to the company of those doleful creatures, which were to inhabit the ruins of Babylon. Gen. of the Tongue.

Still might the discontented murmurer cry
Ah hapless fate of man! ah wretch doom'd once to die. Blackmore, Creation.

- MURMURING. n. s. [from murmur.]

1. A low sound; a continued murmur; a confused noise.

A cloud of cumbrous goats doe him molest,
All striving to infixe their feeble stings,
That from their noyance he so where can rest;
But with his cleavelike hands their tender wings
He brasheth oft, and oft death mar their murmurings. Spenser, F. Q.

His voice was hoarse and hollow, yet so strong,
As when you hear the murmuring of a throng
In some vast arch'd hall; or like as when
A lordly lion anger'd in his den Grumbles within the earth. Dryden, David and Goliath.

2. Complaint half suppressed.

Do all things without murmuring and disputing. Plat. II. 14.

At his return to the court he found no change in faces, but another murmuring for the loss of so many gallant gentlemen. Folton, D. of Buckingham.

Murmuring is a secret discontented muttering one to another of things that we dislike, or persons that we detestate; and the very word in all languages seems as harsh upon our ears, as the sin is harmful upon our souls. Wm. Williams, Christ of Truth, p. 228.

- MURMURINGLY. adv. [from murmuring.]

With a low sound; mutteringly. Sherwood.

- MURMUROUS. adj. [from murmur.] Exciting murmur.

Skinner, and Ainsworth.

- MURR. n. s. A catarrh. Obsolete. Dr. Johnson notices this word in the etymology of murrain.

I never saw nor knew more than this; and that but since I caught this murr. Gascoigne, Tr. of Ariosto's Despaynes, (1566).

- MURRAIN. n. s. [The etymology of this word is not clear; mur is an old word for a catarrh, which might well answer to the glanders; muscaria, low Latin. Skinner derives it from moris, to die. Dr. Johnson.—Minshew derives it, with greater probability, from the Greek μῦσος, to waste, to consume; whence the old French marrane, "sorte de maladie epidemique." Roq. Gloss. Our word was formerly written murra.] The plague in cattle.

Away rag'd rams, care I what muscarin kill.

Sidney.

Some trials would be made of mixtures of water in ponds for cattle, to make them more salubrious, or to keep them from muscarin.

The muscadine stays for the bride at church.

Amin, Hist. of the Two Madis, &c. (1609).

MUSCLE. n. s. [muscle, Fr. musculus, Lat. musculus, Sax.]

1. Muscle is a bundle of thin and parallel plates of fleshy threads or fibres, inclosed by one common membrane; all the fibres of the same plate are parallel to one another, and tied together at extremely little distances by short and transverse fibres: the fleshy fibres are composed of other smaller fibres, inclosed likewise by a common membrane: each lesser fibre consists of very small vesicles or bladders, into which we suppose the veins, arteries, and nerves to open, for every muscle receives branches of all those vessels, which must be distributed to every fibre: the two ends of each muscle or the extremities of the fibres are, in the limbs of animals, fastened to two bones, the one movable, the other fixed; and therefore, when the muscles contract, they draw the movable bone according to the direction of their fibres. Quincy.

The instruments of motion are the muscles, the fibres whereof, contracting themselves, move the several parts of the body.

Locke.

2. A bivalve shell-fish.

Of shell-fish, there are wrinkles, limpets, cockles and muscles. Carver, Surv. of Cornwall.

MUS'ET.* n. s. [in hunting.] The place through which the hare goes to relief.

Dr. Johnson from Bailey.—Musiet is a gap in a hedge. Cotgrave in V. Trouvez.

The purblind hare,—
How he outruns the wind, and with what care
He cranks and crows, with a thousand doubles:
The many musies through which he goes,
Are like a labyrinth to musie his foes. Shakespeare, Fern. and Adon.

MUSEUM.* n. s. [musaeum.] A repository of learned curiosities.

Our scholars will often write musaeum for musaeum; as Mr. Thoreley, in the account he has given us of his collection of rarities, and others; but the Greek word is musaeion, i. e. musaeum, in English. Pagge, Anonym. v. 49.

MUSHROOM. n. s. [mouchroom, French.]

1. Mushrooms are by curious naturalists esteemed perfect plants, though their flowers and seeds have not as yet been discovered: the true champion or mushroom appears at first of a roundish form like a button, the upper part of which, as also the stalk, is very white, but being opened, the under part is of a livid flesh colour, but the fleshy part, when broken, is very white; when they are suffered to remain undisturbed, they will grow to a large size, and explicate themselves almost to a flatness, and the red part underneath will change to a dark colour: in order to cultivate them, open the ground about the roots of the mushrooms, where you will find the earth very often full of small white knobs, which are the off-sets or young mushrooms; these should be carefully gathered, preserving them in lumps with the earth about them, and planted in hot beds.

Miller.

2. An upstart; a wretch risen from the dunghill.

Mushrooms come up in a night, and yet they are unknown; and therefore such as are upstarts in state, they call in reproach mushrooms.

Bacon, Nat. Hist.

The praise of Bacchus then the sweet musician sung: Of Bacchus ever fair and ever young. Dryden.

MUS'ING. n. s. [from music.] Meditation; contemplation.

If we did think His contemplation were above the earth, And fix'd on spiritual objects, he should still dwell in his musings. Shakspeare, Hen. VIII.

Wisdom and knowledge — are sweet as the wakened musings of delightful thoughts which not only dew the mind with perfumes that ever refresh us, but raise us to the mountains that give us view of Canaan; and shows us rays and glimpses of the glory that shall after crown us. Yet it is the object only that makes these good unto men, when God is the ocean that all his streams make way unto. Feltham on Eccles. II. 11. Men of learning are wont to be vitiated, that they use to be so much affected with the pleasant musings of their own thoughts, as to abhor the roughness and toil of business.

Sp. Hist. R. S. p. 335.

MUSK.† n. s. [muschio, Italian; musc, Fr. from the Arab. moscha, whence μύσκη or μύσκη, Gr. Barb. V. Meursii Gloss.]

A dry, light, and friable substance of a dark blackish colour, with some tinge of a purplish or blood colour in it, feeling somewhat smooth or unctuous; its smell is highly perfumed, and too strong to be agreeable in any large quantity: its taste is bitterish: it is brought from the East Indies, mostly from the kingdom of Bantam, some from Tonquin and Cochín China: the animal which produces it is of a very singular kind, not agreeing with any established genus: it is of the size of a common goat but taller: the bag which contains the musk is three inches long and two wide, and situated in the lower part of the creature's belly. Let not, like Narvis, every error pass;

The musty wine, foul cloth, or grossy glass. Pope.

4. Dull; heavy; wanting activity; wanting practice in the occurrences of life.

Xantippe, being married to a bookish man who has no knowledge of the world, is forced to take his affairs into her own hands, and to spirit him up now and then, that he may not grow musty and unfit for conversation. Addison, Spect.

MUTABIL'ITY. n. s. [mutabilité, French;

mutabilitas, Latin.]

1. Changeableness; not continuance in the same state.

The mutability of that end, for which they are made, maketh them also changeable. Hooker.

My fancy was the air, most free,

And full of mutability,

Big with chimeras. Suckling.

Plato confesses that the heavens and the frame of the world are corporeal, and therefore subject to mutability. Swift, feat.

MUTABLE. adj. [mutabilis, Latin.]

1. Subject to change; alterable.

Of things of the most accidental and mutable nature, accidental in their production, and mutable in their continuance, yet God's providence is as certain in him as the memory is or can be in us.

Bosch, Serm.

2. Inconstant; unsettled.

For the mutable rank — amongst many,

Let them regard me, as I do not falter.

Shakespeare, Coriol.

I saw thee mutable

Of fancy, fear'd lost one day thou would'st leave me. Milton, P. L.

MUT'ABLENESS. n. s. [from mutable.]

Changeableness; uncertainty; instability.

Sherwood.

MUTATION. n. s. [mutation, French; mutatio, Latin.] Change; alteration.

His honour

Was nothing but mutation, say, and that

From one bad thing to worse. Shaksp. Cymbeline.

The vicissitude or mutations in the superior globe are no fit matter for this present argument.

Bacon, Ess.

To make plants grow out of the sun or open air is a great mutation in nature, and may induce a change in the seed. Bacon.

MUTE. adj. [old Fr. mut, muet; Latin mutus; Greek μῦθος.] Chaucer writes our word mut.]

1. Silent; not vocal; not having the use of voice.

Why did he reason in my soul implant,

And speech, the effect of reason? To the mute

My speech is lost; my reason to the brute. Dryden.

Mute solemn sorrow, free from female noise,

Such as the majesty of grief distresses. Dryden.

2. Having nothing to say.

Say she be mute, and will not speak a word,

Then I'll commend her volubility. Shakespeare.

And silence was in heav'n. Milton, P. L.

The whole perplex'd ignoble crowd,

Mute to my questions, in my praises loud,

Echo'd the word. Prior.

MUTE. n. s.

1. One that has no power of speech.

Either our history shall with full mouth

Speak freely of our acts; or else our grave,

Like Turkish mute, shall have a tongueless mouth. Shakespeare.

Your mute I'll be;

When my tongue blabs, then let mine eyes not
see. Shakespeare.

He that never hears a word spoken, no wonder if he remain speechless; as one must do, who from an infant should be bred up amongst mut, and have no teaching. Gold.

Let the figure, to which art cannot give a voice, imitate the mut in their actions. Dryden, Dufrenoy.

2. A letter which without a vowel can make no sound.

Grammarians note the easy pronunciation of a mute before a liquid, which doth not therefore necessarily make the preceding vowel long.

Holzer, Elem. of Speech.

TO MUTE. v. n. [mutis, Fr.] To dung as birds.

Mine eyes being open, the sparrows mut

warm dung into mine eyes. Tob. ii. 10.

Or the least bird from muting on my head. B. Jonon.

MUTE. n. s. [from the verb.] The dung of birds.

An ancient oshel

Was rais'd by him, found out by Fisk;

On which was written, not in words,

But hieroglyphic mute of birds

Many rare pithy saws! Hudibras, ii. iii.

MU'TELY. adv. [from mute.] Silently; not vocally.

Driving dumb Silence from the portal door,

Where he had mutely sat two years before. Milton, Pac. Ex.

MUTENESS. n. s. [from mute.] Silence;
aversion to speak.

Who knows not that the bashful muteness of a virgin may oft-times hide all the unliveliness, and natural shyness, which is really unfit for conversation?

Milton, Doct. and Disc. of Div. L. 3.

TO MUTILATE. v. a. [mutiler, French; mutilo, Latin.] Our word was considered by P. Heylin, in 1656, as uncouth and strange. It is, however, in the dictionary of Cotgrave, long before that time; and was much in use before the Restoration.] To deprive of some essential part.

Such fearing to concede a monstrosity, or mutulate the integrity of Adam, preventively conceive the creation of thirteen ribs. Brown, Vulg. Err.
Sylburgius justly complains that the place is mutilated. Edling, poet.

Among the mutilated poets of antiquity there is none whose fragments are so beautiful as those of Sappho. Addison.

Aristotle's works were corrupted, from Strabo's account of their having been mutilated and consumed with moisture. Baker.

MUTILATE. adj. [from the verb.] Deprived of some essential part.
The maimed, mutilated obedienc.

Hammond, Of Conscience, § 69.

come out perfect in their generations. Brown.

MUTILATION. n. s. [mutilation, French;
mutilatio, from mutilo, Latin.] Deprivation of a limb, or any essential part.

This alteration [from Hoshah to Jehoshah] was not made by a verbal mutation, as when Jacob was called Israel; or by any literary change, as when Sarsai was called Sarah; nor yet by diminution or mutilation; but by addition; as when Abram was called Abraham. Forster on the Creed, Art. 2.

The subject had been oppressed by infirmities, mutulations, pillories, and banishments. Clarendon.

Mutilations are not transmitted from father to son, the blind hereditary such as can see; cripples, mutilate in their own persons, do come out perfect in their generations. Brown.

MUTILATOR. n. s. [mutilator, Latin.]
One that mangles, or deprives of some essential part.

The Ebionites were mutulators of the sacred text. Quart. Rev. i. 225.

MUTINE. n. s. [mutin, French.] A mu-tineer; a mover of insurrection. Not in use.

In my heart there was a kind of fighting,
That would not let me sleep; my heartought I lay Worse than the mutines in the bilboes. Shakespeare, Hamlet.

Like the mutines of Jerusalem,
Be friends a while. Shakespeare, A. John.

TO MUTINE. v. n. [mutiner, French.
This is the old word. Hickes derives mutiny from mut, a meeting.] To rise in mutiny.

Upon all occasions ready to mutine and rebel.
Barton, Anst. of Mel. To the Reader.

The soldiers so mutined, that at last the generals were constrained to emburghise themselves and come home to England. Ld. Herbert, Hen. VIII. p. 24.

Against this decree all the whole faction of cligy-men fretted and mutined.
Bp. Hall, Nov. of the Marr. Clergy, p. 294.

MUTINEER. n. s. [from mutin, French.
Our word was formerly written mutiner, full as often as mutineer; and is so in our old lexicography.] A mover of sedition; an opposer of lawful authority.

The war of the duke of Urbino, head of the Spanish mutineers, was unjust. Bacon, War with Spain.

Set wide the muffs's garden-gate;
For there our muffers appoint to meet.

They have cashiered several of their followers as muffers, who have contradicted them in political conversations.

MUTUO.* n. s. [from to mule.] The dung of birds.

With hooting wild
Thou cussiest upstart; and our holy things, Fest, table, pulpit, they be all defil'd
With thy broad mutings.

More, The Tale of the South, ii. 119.
The bird not able to digest the fruit,
from her incoverted muting ariseth this.

MUTINOUS. adj. [mutiné, French.] Ser-tious; busy in insurrection; tur-bulently.

It tauntingly replied
To the discontented members, the mutinous parts,
That envied his receipt.

The laws of England should be administered, and the mutinous severely suppressed.
Lend me your guards, that if persuasion fail,
Force may against the mutinous prevail.

My ears are deaf with this impatient crowd;
Their wants are now grown mutinous and loud.

MUTINOUSLY. adv. [from mutinous.] Seditionally; turbulently.

A woman, a young woman, a fair woman, was to govern a people in nature mutinously proud, and always before used to hard governments.

Men imprudently often, audaciously and main-nately sometimes, employ their zeal for persons.

MUTINOUSNESS. n. s. [from mutinous.] Seditionalness; turbulence.

TO MUTINY v. n. [mutiner, French.] To rise against authority; to make insurrection; to move sedition.

The spirit of my father begins to mutiny against this servitude.

The people mutiny, the fort is mine,
And all the soldiers to my will incline.

When Camar's army mutinied, and grew troublesome, no argument could appease them.

MUTINY. n. s. [from the verb.] Insurrection; sedition.

The king fled to a strong castle, where he was gathering forces to suppress this mutiny.

I the war,
Their mutinies and revolts, wherein they shew'd
Most valour, spoke not for them.

In most strange postures We've seen him set himself.
— There is a mutiny in his mind.

Of heaven were falling, and these elements
In mutiny had from her axle torn
The steadiest earth.

Soldiers grow pernicious to their master who becomes their servant, and it is danger of their mutinies, as much as any government of seditions.

TO MUTTER. v. n. [mutire, mutare, Latin. Dr. Johnson. — Su. Goth. mutra;
Icel. "tala i matr, susurrare." Serenius.] To grumble; to murmur.

What would you ask me, that I would deny,
Or stand so muttering on?

They may trespass, and not do as they please;
no man dare accuse them, so much as mutter against them.

Wizards that peep, and that mutter.

Bold Britons, at a brave bear-garden fray,
Are rous'd; and clattering sticks cry, play, play,

Mean time your filthy foreigners will stare,
And mutter to himself, ha, gens barbare!
And it is well he mutters, well for him;

Our butchers else would tear him limb from limb.

When the tongue of a beautiful female was cut out, it could not forbear muttering.

TO MUTTER. v. a. To utter with imperfect articulation; to grumble forth.

Amongst the soldiers this is muttered,
That here you maintain several factions.

A kind of men, so loose of soul,
That in their sleep will mutter their affairs.

Your lips have spoken lies, your tongue hath muttered perverseness.

A hateful prattling tongue,
That blows up jealousies, and heightens fears,
By muttering poisonous whispers in men's ears.

MUTTER. n. s. [from the verb.] Murmur;
obscure utterance.

Without his rod rever'd,
And backward matters of discovering power,
We cannot free the lady.

MUTTER-† n. s. [from mutter.] Grumbler; murmurer.

The words of a mutterer are as wounds going into the innumerate part of the belly.

MUTTERING. n. s. [from mutter.] Murmur; utterance of a low voice.

The magicians came with wicked dispositions, to act themselves against Moses, and used all their wicked arts and incantations, mutterings, and diabolical ceremonies.

MUTTERINGLY. adv. [from muttering.] With a low voice; without distinct articulation.

MUTTON. n. s. [mouton, French.]
1. The flesh of sheep dressed for food.

The fat of roasted mutton or beef, falling on the birds, will waste them.

2. A sheep. Now only in ludicrous
language.

Here's too small a pasture for such store of muttons.

The flesh of muttons is better tasted where the sheep feed upon wild thyme and wholesome herbs.

Within a few days were brought out of the country two thousand muttons.

MUTTONFIST. n. s. [mutton and fist.] A hand large and red.

Will he who saw the soldier's muttonfist,
And saw those maul'd, appear within the list
To witness truth?

MUTUAL. adj. [mutuel, French; mutuus, Latin.] Reciprocal; each acting in return or correspondence to the other.

Note a wild and wanton herd, Fetching mad bounds, bellowing and neighing
loud,

If thy perchance but hear a trumpet sound,
You shall perceive them make a mutual stand,
By the sweet power of music.

What should most excite a mutual flame,
Your rural cares and pleasures are the same.

MUTUALLY. adv. [from mutual.] Reci-procally; in return.

He never bore
Like labour with the rest; where the other instruments

Did see, and hear, devise, instruct, walk, feed,
And mutually participate.

Dear love I bear to fair Anne Page,
Who mutually hath answer'd my affection.

The tongue and pen mutually assist one another, writing what we speak, and speaking what we write.

Pellucid substances act upon the rays of light at a distance, in refracting, reflecting and infecting them, and the rays mutually assist the parts of these substances at a distance for heating them.

They mutually teach, and are taught, that lesson of vain confidence and security.

May I the sacred pleasures know
Of strict amity, nor ever want
A friend with whom I mutually may share
Gladness and anguish.

MUTUALITY. n. s. [from mutual.] Reci-procation.

Villanous thoughts, Roderigo! when these mutualities so marshall the way, hard at hand comes the incorporate confusion.

MUTUATION.* n. s. [mutuatio, Latin.]
The act of borrowing.

Here is a sale, there a lending: — In both there seems to be a valuation of time; which, whether in case of mutation or sale, may justly be suspected for unlawful.

Jps. Hall, Cases of Cons. D. I. C. 4.

MUTUATIOUS.* adj. [mutuatitius, Lat.]
Borrowed; taken from some other.

Her goodly wares of necessary uses, of pardons and indulgences, of the mutuatious good works of their pretended holy men and women.

MUX.* n. s. [a corruption of mucl.] Dirt.
Exmore dialect.

MUX.* adj. [from the corrupt word mucl.]
Dirty; gloomy.

MUZZLE. v. n. [muscau, French. Dr.
Johnson.] To muzzle our word, in conformity to its French origin, was at first written muzzle, and then muzzle. See Barret's Alv. 1580. in V. MUZZLE, and Chaucer: "With muzzle fast ybound."

Kn. Tale.

1. The mouth of any thing; the mouth of a man in contempt.

But ever and anon turning her muzzle toward me, she threw such a prospect upon me, as might well have given a surfeit to any weak lover's stomach.

Huygens has proved, that a bullet continuing in the velocity with which it leaves the muzzle of the cannon, would require twenty-five years to pass from us to the sun.

If the poker be out of the way, or broken, stir the fire with the tongs; if the tongs be not at hand, use the muzzle of the bellows.

2. A fastening for the mouth, which hinders to bite.

The fifth Harry from curbed licence plucks
The muzzle of restraint; and the wild dog
Snall flesh his tooth on ev'ry innocent.

Greyhounds, snowy fair,
And tall as stags, ran loose, and cours'd around his chair;

With golden muzzle all their mouths were bound.

TO MUZZLE. v. n. To bring the mouth near.

The bear muzzles, and smells to him, puts his nose to his mouth and to his ears, and at last leaves him.

TO MUZZLE. v. a.
1. To bind the mouth.

This butcher's cur is venom-mouth'd, and to muse
Have not the power to muzzle him; therefore best
Not wake him in his slumber.

Shakespeare, Hen. VIII.

The bear, the boar, and every savage name,
Wild in effect, though in appearance tame,
Lay waste thy woods, destroy thy blisful bowers,
And muzzled though they seem, the auster devour.

Dryden.

Through the town with slow and solemn air,
Led by the nostril, walks the muzzled bear.

Gray, Paut.

2. To fondle with the mouth close. A low word.

The nurse was then murmuring and cooing of the child.

L'Estrange.

3. To restrain from hurt.

My dagger muzzled
Lest it should bite its master, and so prove,
As ornaments oft do, too dangerous.

Shakespeare, Wint. Tale.

My'zyx.* adj. [a corruption from to muse] or from the French mazzard. Absent; forgetful; dreaming; bewildered by thought; bewildered by liquor. A low expression.

My. pronoun possessive. [See MYSE.] Belonging to me. My is used before a consonant, and mine anciently and properly before a vowel. My is now commonly used indifferently before both. My is used when the substantive follows, and mine when it goes before: as, this is my book; this book is mine.

Her feet she in my neck doth place.

Spenser.

I conclude my reply with the words of a Christian poet.

Bp. Bramhall.

If my soul had free election

To dispose of her affection.

Walker.

I shall present my reader with a journal.

Addison.

My'nschen. n. s. [mýnchen, Saxon.] A nun.

Diid.

My'nster.* n. s. [my'nster, Dutch.] Sir, my lord or master; a knight; [the Dutch]; among us, it usually means a Dutchman.

Our connoisseurs in their seal all became my'nsters.

Conduyt.

My'ography. n. s. [μυρογραφία.] A description of the muscles.

My'ology. n. s. [μυσολογία, French; μύς, a muscle, and λόγος, discourse, Greek.] The description and doctrine of the muscles.

To instance in all the particulars, were to write a whole system of myology.

My'ope.* n. s. [μυωπε, French; μύω, Greek; claudens oculos, from μύω, to close or shut, and ὤψ, the eye.] A short-sighted person. It is sometimes myopa, in the singular number; and myope is uncommon.

Upon the same principle we may account for the shortighted to often rarely shutting their eye-lids, from whence they were formerly denominated myopes.

Adams on Vision.

My'opy. n. s. [μυωπία.] Shortness of sight.

My'riad.† n. s. [μυρία.]

1. The number of ten thousand.

Thou seest, brother, how many thousands, or rather how many myriads, that is, ten thousands, of the Jews there are which believe.

Pearson on the Creed, Art. 2.

2. Proverbially any great number.

Assembly thou,
Of all those myriads, which we lead, the chief.

Milton, P. L.

Are there legions of devils who are continually designing and working our ruin? there are also myriads of good angels who are more cheerful and officious to do us good.

Tillotson.

Safe sits the goddess in her dark retreat;
Around her, myriads of ideas wait,
And endless shapes.

Prior.

My'rimidon. n. s. [μυρμιδών.] Any rude ruffian; so named from the soldiers of Achilles.

The mass of the people will not endure to be governed by Clodius and Curio, at the head of their myrmidons, though these be ever so numerous, and composed of their own representatives.

Swift.

Myro'balan. n. s. [myrobalanus, Latin.] A fruit.

The myrobalans are a dried fruit, of which we have five kinds: they are fleshy, generally with a stone and kernel, having the pulpy part more or less of an austere acid taste: they are the production of five different trees growing in the East Indies, where they are eaten preserved.

Hill.

The myrobalan hath parts of contrary nature; for it is sweet, and yet astringent.

Bacon, Nat. Hist.

Myro'bolist. n. s. [μυροβόλος and μυροβόλος.] One who sells unguents.

MYRRH. n. s. [myrrhā, Latin; myrrhe, French.] A gum.

Myrrh is a vegetable product of the gum resin kind, sent to us in loose granules from the size of a pepper-corn to that of a walnut, of a reddish brown colour, with more or less of an admixture of yellow: its taste is bitter and acid with a peculiar aromatic flavour, but very nauseous: its smell is strong, but not disagreeable: it is brought from Ethiopia, but the tree which produces it is wholly unknown. Our myrrh is the very gum known by the ancients under the same name.

Hill, Mat. Med.

The myrrh sweet-bleeding in the latter word.

Spenser, F. Q.

I dropt in a little honey of roses, with a few drops of tincture of myrrh.

Warren, Surgery.

My'rthorism. adj. [myrtus, Latin, and form.] Having the shape of myrtle.

MYRTLE. n. s. [myrtus, Latin; myrte, French.] A fragrant tree sacred to Venus.

The flower of the myrtle consists of several leaves disposed in a circular order, which expand in form of a rose; upon the top of the foot-stalk is the ovary, which has a short star-like cup, divided at the top into five parts, and expanded; the ovary becomes an oblong umbilicated fruit, divided into three cells, which are full of kidney-shaped seeds.

Miller.

There will I make thee beds of roses,
With a thousand fragrant posies;

14

A cup of flowers, and a garble
Imbroil'd with all leaves of myrtle.

Marlow.

I was of late as petty to his ends,
As is the mouse drow on the myrtle leaf

To his grand sea.

Shakespeare, Ant. and Cleop.

Demetrius would have Concord like a fair virgin, holding in one hand a pomegranate, in the other a bundle of myrtle; for such is the nature of these trees, that if they be planted though a good space one from the other, they will meet, and with twining one embrace the other.

Pantheon.

Nor can the muse the gallant Siding pass
The plume of war! with early laurels crown'd,
The lover's myrtle and the poet's bay.

Thomson, Summer.

MYSE'LE. n. s. [mysē and sef.]

1. An emphatical word added to I: as, I myself do it, that is, not I by proxy; not another.

As host,

I should against his murderer shut the door,

Not bear the knife myself.

Shakespeare, Macbeth.

2. The reciprocal of I, in the oblique case.

They have misused another pain, against which I should have been at a loss to defend myself.

Swift, Examiner.

3. I is sometimes omitted, to give force to the sentence.

Myself shall mount the rostrum in his favour,

And try to gain his pardon.

Addison.

MYSTAGOGUE.† n. s. [μυσταγωγός, mystagogos, Latin; mystagogue, French.] One who interprets divine mysteries: also one who keeps church relics, and shews them to strangers.

Cockeram.

The mystagogue taught them, that Jupiter, Mercury, Bacchus, Venus, Mars, and the whole rabble of licentious deities, were only dead mortals.

Warburton, Div. Legat. ii. § 4.

MYSTÉRIAL.* adj. [from mystery.] Containing a mystery or enigma.

Beautiful and love, whose story is mystical,

In yonder palm-tree and the crown imperial,

He, from the rose and lily so delicious,

Promise a shade, shall ever be propitious

To both the kingdoms.

B. Jonson, Masques.

MYSTÉRIARCH. n. s. [μυστήριον and ἀρχή.] One presiding over mysteries.

MYSTÉRIOUS. adj. [mysterietes, French; from mystery.]

1. Inaccessible to the understanding; awfully obscure.

God at last

To Satana, first in sin, his doom apply'd,

Through in mysteries learn'd.

Milton, P. L.

Then the true Son of knowledge first appear'd,
And the old dark mysterious clouds were clear'd.

Desham.

2. Artfully perplexed.

Those princes who were distinguished for mysterious skill in government, found, by the event, that they had ill consulted their own quiet, or the happiness of their people.

Swift.

MYSTÉRIOUSLY. adv. [from mysterious.]

1. In a manner above understanding.

2. Obscurely; enigmatically.

Our duty of preparation continued in this one word, try or examine, being after the manner of mysterious, mysterious and secret descent, there is reason to believe that there is in it very much to try.

Bp. Taylor, Worsh. Communicant.

Each stair mysteriously was meant.

Milton, P. L.

MYSTÉRIOUSNESS. n. s. [from mysterious.]

1. Holy obscurity.

My purpose is, to gather together into an union

all those several portions of truth, and differing apprehensions of mysteries.

Bp. Taylor, Worthy Communicant.

2. Artful difficulty or perplexity.

To MYSTERIZE, v. a. [from mystery.] To explain as enigmas.

Mystifying their enigmas, they make the particular ones of the twelve tribes accommodable unto the twelve signs of the zodiac. Brown, Vulg. Err.

MYSTERY, † n. s. [μυστήριον; mysterē, Fr.] 1. Something above human intelligence; something awfully obscure.

They can judge as fully of his worth, As I can of those mysteries which heaven Will not have earth to know. Shakespeare, Coriol.

Upon holy days, let the matter of your meditations be according to the mystery of the day; and to your ordinary devotions of every day, add the prayer which is fitted to the mystery. Bp. Taylor.

If God should please to reveal unto us this great mystery of the Trinity, or some other mystery in our holy religion, we should not be able to understand them unless he would bestow on us some new faculties of the mind. Baill.

2. An enigma; any thing artfully made difficult.

To thy great comfort in this mystery of ill opinions, here's the twin-brother of thy letter.

Shakespeare, M. Wives of Windsor.

Important truths still let your fables hold, And moral mysteries with art unfold. Graville.

3. A trade; a calling; in this sense it should, according to Warburton, be written mistry, from mestier, French, a trade. Dr. Johnson.—Mystery is a specious and easy corruption of mastery or mastery, the English of the Latin magisterium, or artificium; in French, maistrise, mestier, metrie. Warnton, Hist. of Eng. Poet. iii. xxxvii. Chaucer writes it miestre.

In youth he learned hodge a good mistry: He was a wel good wright, a carpenter.

Chaucer, C. T. Prol.

And that which is the noblest mystery, Brings to reproach and common infamy.

Spenser, Husb. Tale.

Instruction, manners, mysteries and laws, Degrees, observances, customs, and trades, Decide to your confounding contraries. Shakespeare.

4. [Mistere, old French.] A kind of ancient dramatick representation.

Dramatick poetry, in this and most other nations of Europe, owes its origin, or at least its revival, to those religious shows, which in the dark ages were usually exhibited on the more solemn festivals. At those times they were wont to represent, in the churches, the lives and miracles of the saints, or some of the more important stories of Scripture. And as the most mysterious subjects were frequently chosen, such as the Incarnation, Passion, and Resurrection of Christ, &c. these exhibitions acquired the general name of mysteries.

Rp. Percy, Ess. on the Orig. of the English Stage.

MYSTICAL, † adj. [mysticus, Lat.]

1. Sacredly obscure.

Let God himself that made me, let not man that knows not himself, be my instructor concerning the mystical way to heaven. Hobbs.

From salvation all kind being excluded this way, God hath revealed a way mystical and supernatural. Hobbs.

2. Involving some secret meaning; emblematical.

Ye five other wandering fires I that move In mystical dance, not without song, surround His praise, who out of darkness call'd up light. Milton, P. L.

It is Christ's body in the sacrament and out of it; but in the sacrament not the natural truth, but the spiritual and mystical.

Bp. Taylor, Worthy Communicant.

It is plain from the Apocalypse, that mystical Babylon is to be consumed by fire. Barnet, Th. of the Earth.

3. Obscure; secret.

Last new fears disturb the happy state, Know I have search'd the mystical rolls of fate. Dryden.

MYSTICALLY, † adv. [from mystical.] In a manner, or by an act, implying some secret meaning; emblematically.

These two in thy sacred bosom hold, Till mystically join'd but one they be. Dennis.

Unto which I conceive the prophet Isaiah to allude, in that passage touching the city of Tyre, representing there mystically the church of Rome. Mort, Antid. against Idolatry, ch. 10.

MYSTICALNESS, n. s. [from mystical.] Involvement of some secret meaning.

MYSTICISM, \ n. s.* [from mystick.] The pretences of the mysticks; fanaticism.

How much nobler a field of exercise, in the devout and aspiring soul, are the scrupulous entertainments of mysticism and extasy, than the mean and ordinary practice of a mere earthly and common virtue! Cowenry, Phil. to Hyd. Conv. 1.

This ingenious man — has spent a long life in hunting after, and with an incredible appetite devouring, the trash dropt from every species of mysticism. Warburton, Doc. of Grace, p. 306.

MYSTICK, \ n. s.* One of an old fanatic sect, pretending to talk and think of religion in a manner above the understanding of common Christians; dissipating all due composure and recollection of mind, and laying open the heart to all the wild extravagances of frantick enthusiasm.

It is this way of thinking and talking in religion, that, I suppose, has given rise to what is called mystical theology; the teachers whereof have accordingly been styled mysticks.

Cowenry, Phil. to Hyd. Conv. 1.

MYTHICAL, \ adj.* [μυθικός, Greek.] FA-MYTHICK, † bulous.

The account we have of them so far from being mythick or unintelligible, is most plainly written for our admittance.

Shuchford on the Creation, (1758.) Pref. p. v.

MYTHO'GRAPHY, \ n. s.* [μῦθος, fable, and γραφία, to write, Gr.] A writer of fables.

The statues of Mars and Venus I imagined had been copied from Fulgentius, Boccaccio's favourite mythographer.

Warnton, Hist. E. P. Add. li. sign. e. s.

MYTHOLOGICAL, † adj. [from mytho- MYTHOLOG'ICK, † logy.] Relating to the explication of fabulous history.

The original of the conceit was probably hieroglyphical, which after became mythological and by tradition stole into total verity, which was but partially true in its covert sense and morality.

Brown, Vulg. Err.

A relation, which her masters of the mythological pronounia expressed, we may suppose, by giving them in marriage to each other.

Cowenry, Phil. to Hyd. Conv. s.

MYTHOLOGICALLY, † adv. [from mythological.] In a manner suitable to the system of fables.

The relating mythologically physical or moral truths concerning the origin and nature of things, was not perhaps, as modern writers too hastily imagine, the customary practice of Menes's age, but rather began after his times.

Shuchford on the Creat. Pref. p. vii.

MYTHOLOGIST, n. s. [from mythology.] A relater or expounder of the ancient fables of the heathens.

The grammarians and mythologists seem to be altogether unacquainted with his writings. Creech. It was a celebrated problem among the ancient mythologists, What was the strongest thing, what the wisest, and what the greatest? Norris, Miscel.

To MYTHOLOGIZE, † v. n. [from mythology; mythologizer, French. Cotgrave.] To relate or explain the fabulous history of the heathens.

He mythologizeth upon that fiction.

Fatherly, Aethon. (1692.) p. 320.

They mythologized that five gods were now born, Osiris, Orus, Typho, Isis, and Nephtis.

Shuchford on the Creat. Pref. p. x.

MYTHOLOGY, n. s. [μῦθος, and λογία; mythologia, French.] System of fables; explication of the fabulous history of the gods of the heathen world.

The modesty of mythology deserves to be commended: the scenes there are laid at a distance; it is once upon a time, in the days of yore, and in the land of Utopia. Bentley.

NÆV

N, A semivowel, has in English an invariable sound: as, no, name, net; it is sometimes after m almost lost, as, condemna, contra.

To NAB† v. a. [nappa, Swedish.] To catch unexpectedly; to seize without warning. A word seldom used but in low language.

Old cussack, we'll nab you.

Duke of Warion, Song.

NAB. * n. s. The summit of a rock or mountain. North. Ray, and Grose. See the third sense of NAP.

NABOB. * n. s. [nobob, a nobleman, "in the language of the Mogul's kingdom, which hath mixt with it much of the Persian." Sir T. Herbert, Trav. p. 99.] The title of an Indian prince; sometimes applied to Europeans who have acquired great riches in the East Indies.

Among the princes dependent on this nation in the southern part of India, the most considerable at present is commonly known by the title of the nabob of Arcot.

Burke, Sp. on the Nabob of Arcot's Deba.

NACHE.* See NATCH.

NACKER, NACKER† n. s. [concha margaritifera, Lat. nacre, Fr. "nacre de perles." Cotgrave.] A shell that contained a pearl.

NACKER. * n. s. A collar-maker; a harness-maker. Norfolk. Lemon, and Grose.

NADIR† n. s. [Arabic. Dr. Johnson. "Zenith, saith Christianismus, quem Arabes scribunt zenith, vertex capitis est, seu polus horizontalis: punctum verticis oppositum appellatur nadir, quasi dicus, punctum simile: est enim illud quod alter polus horizontalis, nobis depressus." Bedwell's Arabian Trudgman, 1615. p. 99.] The point under foot directly opposite to the zenith.

As far as four bright signs comprise,
The distant zenith from the nadir lies. Creech.

NÆVE. * n. s. [reve, Fr. nevus, Lat.] A spot. This is one of the words which Dryden has been blamed for using, and is supposed to have introduced into our language. It is certainly a bad word; yet was in use long before his employment of it: and it was a favourite expression of his contemporary, Aulrey.

Warts, nerves, inequalities, roughness.

Burton, Anst. of Metempsych. P. III. § 2.
So many spots, like nevus on Venus' wall.

Dryden on the Death of Lt. Hastings
I am sorry so great a wit should have such a nevus.

Aulrey, Of Cullingworth, Anecd. ii. 286.
He was a tall, lean, and bold man; but his nevus was, that he was daimly proud.

Aulrey, Of Sir W. Raleigh, Anecd. ii. 509.

NAI

NAFF. n. s. [mergus cirrhatus.] A kind of tufted sea-bird.

1. A small horse. A horse in familiar language.

A hungry lion would fain have been dealing with good horse-flesh; but the nag would be too fleet. L'Estrange.

Thy nags, the leanest things alive,

So very hard thou lov'st to drive. Prior.

2. A paramour; in contempt.

Your ribaud nag of Egypt
Holts sails, and flies. Shakespeare, Ant. and Cleop.

NA'GUY. * adj. [nagg, Su. Goth. rixa, contentio. Spiegel.] Contentious; disposed to quarrel. A northern word; and perhaps used in other parts. See also KNAGGY.

NA'ID. * n. s. [Naiade, Fr. Naïas, Lat.] A water-nymph.

You nymphs, call'd Naiads, of the wandering brooks,

With your sedge'd crowns, and ever harmless looks,
Leave your crisp channels. Shakespeare, Tempest.

What though nor fabled Dryad haust their grove,

Nor Naiads near their fountains rove. Shenstone.

NAIL. n. s. [naegel, Saxon; nagel, Germ.]

1. The hard crust or horny substance at the ends of the fingers and toes.

My nails can reach unto thine eyes. Shakespeare.
The measured scepter in th' Æthiopian square,

Can imitate in brass, the nails and hair;
Expert to trifle. Dryden.

The nails of our fingers give strength to those parts in the various functions they are put to; and defend the numerous nerves and tendons that are under them. Rey.

2. The talons of birds; the claws or paws of beasts.

3. A spike of metal by which things are fastened together.

As one nail by strength drives out another;
So the remembrance of my former love

Is by a newer object soon forgotten. Shakespeare.

An equivocal word used for the nail of the hand or foot, and for an iron nail to fasten any thing.

The loudstone mines in the shore of India, are so placed in abundance and vigour, that it proves an adventure of labour to pass those coasts in a ship with iron nails. Brown.

A beechen nail
Hung by the handle, on a driven nail. Dryden.

So many spots, like nevus on Venus' wall.

Dryden on the Death of Lt. Hastings
I am sorry so great a wit should have such a nevus.

Aulrey, Of Cullingworth, Anecd. ii. 286.
He was a tall, lean, and bold man; but his nevus was, that he was daimly proud.

Aulrey, Of Sir W. Raleigh, Anecd. ii. 509.

NAI

4. A stud; a boss.

For not the deak with silver nails,

Nor bureau of expence,

Nor standish well japan'd axils

To writing of good sense. Swift.

NAK

5. A measure of length; two inches and a quarter.

6. On the nail. Readily; immediately; without delay. I once supposed it from a counter studded with nails, but have since found in an old record, solere super ungum. It therefore means into the hand.

We want our money on the nail,

The banker's ruin'd if he pays. Swift.

To NAILE† v. a. [naeglian, Sax.]
1. To fasten with nails; to fasten as with nails.

How shall they come to thee, whom thou hast nailed to their bed? Donne, Dev. (1694, p. 50.

To the cross he nail'd thy enemies,
The law that is against thee, and the sins
Of all mankind, with him are crucify'd.

He clasp'd his hand upon the wounded part.
The second shaft came swift and unexpect'd.

And pierc'd his hand, and nail'd it to his side. Milton, P. L.

2. To stud with nails.

Those stars which nail heaven's pavement.

In golden armour glorious to behold,
The rivets of your arms were nail'd with gold. Dryden.

NA'ILER. n. s. [from nail.] One whose trade is to forge nails; a nail-maker.

NA'ILERY. * n. s. [from nail.] A manufactory for nails.

Near the bridge is a large alum-house, and a vast nailetry. Pennant.

NA'IVETE. * n. s. [French.] Simplicity; ingenuousness.

Is not that naïveté and good humour, which his admirers celebrate in him, owing to this, that he has continued all his days an infant; but one that unapphly has been taught to read and write?
Gray, Lett. to Bentley, (1770.)

To NAKE. * } v. a. [benacan, Sax.] To
To NA'KEN. } make naked; to expose.

Not now in use. Holcot.

Come, be ready, now thy sword.

Turner, Revenger's Tragedy.

NAKED† adj. [naquath, Goth. nacob, Saxon, from na-cenneb, newly born. Wachter.]

1. Wanting clothes; uncovered; bare.

A philosopher being asked in what a wise man differed from a fool? answered, Send them both naked to those who know them not, and you shall perceive. Bacon.

He pitying how they stood Before him naked to the air, that now
Must suffer change; —

As father of his family, he clad
Their nakedness with skins of beasts. Milton, P. L.

2. Unarmed; defenceless; unprotected.

I had I serv'd my God with half the zeal
I serv'd my king, he would not in mine age,
Have left me naked to mine enemies.

Shakespeare, Hen. VIII.

Ungrateful men,
Behold my bosom naked to your words,
And let the man that's injur'd strike the blow.

3. Plain; evident; not hidden. [nuda veritas." Hor.]

The truth appears so naked on my side,
That any purblind eye may find it out.

4. Mere; bare; wanting the necessary additions; simple; abstracted.

Not that God doth require nothing unto happiness at the hands of men, saving only a naked belief, for hope and charity we may not exclude;
but that without belief all other things are as nothing, and it is the ground of those other divine virtues.

NA'KEDLY.† adv.
1. Without covering.

Numberless things, which we pass by in their common dress, shock us when they are nakedly represented.

2. Simply; merely; barely; in the abstract.

Though several single letters nakedly considered,
are found to be articulations only of spirit or breath,
and not of breath vocalized; yet there is that property in all letters of spines, to be conjoined in syllables.

3. Discoverably; evidently.

So blinda the sharpness comes of the wise
This overblindinging Sharpe on high,
And dazzleth all their clearest sighted eyes,
That they see not how nakedly they lie.

NA'KEDNESS.† n. s. [nakebnyte; Sax.]

1. Nudity; want of covering.

My face I'll grime with filth;
And with presented nakedness out-face
The winds and persecutions of the sky,

2. Want of provision for defence.

Ye are spies; to see the nakedness of the land
you are come.

3. Plainness; evidence; want of concealment.

Why seekest thou to cover with excuse
That which appears in proper nakedness?

4. The nakedness of which opinion will not permit me to keep any longer theoporeon.

NALL. n. s. An awl, such as collar-makers or shoemakers use.

Whole bridle and saddle, whitelather and nail,
With collars and harness.

NA'NBYPAMY.* adj. Having little affected prettinesses. Ash. A cant term, or rather a term of contempt.

NAME.† n. s. [nama, Gothic; nama,
Saxon; naem, Dutch.]

1. The discriminative appellation of an individual.

What is thy name?
—Thou'lt be afraid to hear it.

—No: though thou call'st thyself a hotter name
Than any is in hall.

—My name's Macbeth.

He called their names after the names his father had called them.

Thousands there were in darker fane than dwell,
Whose names some nobler poem shall adorn.

2. The term by which any kind of species is distinguished.

What's in a name? That which we call a rose,
By any other name would smell as sweet.

If every particular idea that we take in, should have a distinct name, names must be endless.

3. Person.

They list with women each degenerate name,
Who does not heard life for future fame.

4. Reputation; character.

The king's army was the last enemy the west had been acquainted with, and had left no good name behind.

5. Renown; fame; celebrity; eminence; praise; remembrance; memory; distinction;
honour.

What men of name resort to him?
Sir Walter Herbert, a renowned soldier;
And Rice ap Thomas with a valiant crew,
And many others of great name and worth.

Visit eminent persons of great name abroad;
to tell how the life agreeth with the fame.

Here rest thy bones in rich Hesperia's plains,
Thy name, 'tis all a ghost can have, remains.

A hundred knights
Approv'd in fight, and men of mighty name.

These shall be towns of mighty fame,
Though now they lie obscure, and lands without a name.

Bartolus is of great name; whose authority is as much valued amongst the modern lawyers, as Papinian's was among the ancients.

Power delegated; imputed character.

In the name of the people,
And in the power of us the tribunes, we Banish him.

7. Fictitious imputation.

When Ulysses with fallacious arts,
Had forg'd a treason in my patron's name,
My kinsman fell.

8. Appearance; not reality; assumed character.

I'll to him again in the name of Brook;
He'll tell me all his purpose.

There is a friend which is only a friend in name.

9. An opprobrious appellation.

The husband
Bids her confess; calls her ten thousand names;
In rain she kneels.

Like the watermen of Thames,
I row by and call them names.

To NAME.† v. a. [namjan, Goth. naman,
Sax. and namen is our old verb.]

1. To discriminate by a particular appellation imposed.

I mention here a son of the king's whom Floriol
I now name to you; and with speed so pace
To speak of Perdita.

Thou hast had seven husbands, neither thou named after any of them.

His name was called Jesus, which was so named of the angel before he was conceived.

Thus was the building left Ridiculous, and the work, Confusion, nam'd.

2. To mention by name.

Accusation not thy mouth to swearing, neither use thyself to the naming of the Holy One.

My tongue could name what'er I saw.

Those whom the fables name of monstrous size,

3. To specify; to nominate.

Did my father's golden seek'd thy leg?
He whom my father nam'd? Your Edgour.

Bring me him up whom I shall name.

Let any one name that proposition, whose terms or ideas were either of them innate.

4. To utter; to mention.

Let my name be named on them.

5. To entitle.

Celestial, whether among the thrones, or nam'd
Of them the highest.

NA'MELESS.† adj. [nameleaz, Saxon.]

1. Not distinguished by any discriminative appellation.

On the cold earth lies th' unregarded king,
A headless carcass, and a nameless thing.

Fram'd of many nameless stars.

Thy reliques, Rowe, to this fair shrine we trust,
And sacred, place by Dryden's awful dust;
Beneath a rude and nameless stone he lies,
To which thy tomb shall guide enquiring eyes.

2. One of which the name is not known or mentioned.

Little credit is due to accusations of this kind, when they come from suspected, that is, from nameless pens.

Such imagery of greatness ill became
A nameless dwelling, and an unknown name.

NA'MELY. adv. [from name.] Particularly;
specially; to mention by name.

It can be to nature no injury, that of her we say the same which diligent beholders of her works have observed; namely, that she provideth for all living creatures nourishment which may suffice.

Which of these sorrows is he subject to?
To name of these, except it be the last;

Nobody, some love that drew him oft from home.

The council making remonstrances unto queen Elizabeth, of the continual conspiracies against her life; and namely, that a man was lately taken, who stood ready in a very suspicious manner to do the deed; advised her to go less abroad rarely attended. But the queen answered, that she had rather be dead, than put in custody.

For the excellency of the soul, namely, its power of dividing in dreams; that several such divinations have been made, none can question.

Solomon's choice does not only instruct us in that point of history, but furnishes out a very fine moral to us, namely, that he to apply his heart to wisdom, does at the same time take the most proper method for gaining long life, riches, and reputation.

NA'MER.† n. s. [from name.] One who calls or knows any by name.

NA'MESAKE. n. s. One that has the same name with another.

Nor does the dog-fish at sea much more make out the dog of land, than that his cognominal, or near-kind in the bassens. Brown, Vulg. Err.

One author is a male snapper; it is impossible for them to discover beauties; they have eyes only for blemishes: they can indeed see the light, as is said of their namesakes; but immediately shut their eyes. Addic.

NAPKIN, or NAKKE'EN. n. s. A kind of light cotton, first manufactured at Nanking, in China.

NAP.† n. s. [hnappan, Saxon, to sleep.] 1. Slumber; a short sleep. A word ludicrously used.

Mopsa sat swallowing of sleep with open mouth, making such a noise, as anybody could lay the sleeping of a nap to her charge. Sidney.

Let your bounty take a nap, and I will awake it anon. Shakespeare.

The sun had long since in the lap Of Thetis, taken out his nap. Hudibras.

So long as I'm at the forge, you are still taking your nap. L'Estrange.

2. [Knappa, Saxon; nopp, Sax. Goth.] Down; villous substance.

Amongst those leaves she made a butterfly With excellent device and wondrous flight; The velvet nap which on his wings doth lie, The silken down with which his back is dignified. Spenser, Naiads.

Jack Cade the clothier means to dress the Commonwealth, and set a new nap upon it. Shakspeare.

Plants, though they have no prickles, have a kind of downy or velvet rind upon their leaves; which down or nap cometh of a subtil spirit in a soft or fat substance. Bacon.

Ah! where must needs poor seek for aid, When dust and rain at once his coat invade? His only coat! he must defend confus'd with rain Roughens the nap, and leaves a mingled stain. Swift.

3. A knop; a protuberance; the top of a hill. [gnypa, Icel. snæp, Sax.]

Between this intrenchment and the innermost one, is no space of ground at all, but only a deep trench and a high wall, including a large level piece of ground, which is higher than any other part of this fortification, it being the nap of the hill. Corvus, Surv. of Cornwall.

To NAP.† v. n. [hnappan, Saxon.] To sleep; to drowse or secure; to be supinely careless.

Wishes the housewife tardied, all they nappied and slept. Wright, St. Mat. xxx.

See how he nappeth, see, for cackles bones, As he would fall from his horse atones. Chaucer, Mancip. Prolog.

They took him napping in his bed. Hudibras.

A wolf took a dog napping at his master's door. L'Estrange.

What is seriously related by Helmont, that fowl lieen, stays in a vessel that hath water in it, will in twenty-one days' time turn the wheat into mire; without conjecture, one may guess to have been the philosophy and information of some housewife, who had not so carefully covered her wheat, but that the mice could come at it, and were there taken napping just when they had made an end of their good cheer. Brady.

NAP' TAKING. n. s. [nap and take.] Surprise; seizure; a sudden; unexpected onset, like that made on men asleep.

Nap-taking, assaults, uprisings, and fringes have in our forefathers' days, between us and France, been common. Corvus.

NAP' E.† n. s. [Of uncertain etymology. Skinner imagines it to come from nap, the hair that grows on it; Junius, with his usual Greek sagacity, from νάπη, a hill; perhaps from the same root with knob. Dr. Johnson.—That is from cnap, Sax. a ny protuberance; hnappr, Icel. globus.] The joint of the neck behind.

Turn your eyes towards the napes of your necks, and make but an interior survey of your good stives. Shakespeare.

Demition dreamed, the night before he was slain, that a golden bead was growing out of the nape of his ock. Bosca.

NAP'ERY.† n. s. [naperia, Ital. nappa, a table-cloth, a napkin; nappe, French, naparia, low Lat. from mappa, Lat. The Scotch use naiprie, which Dr. Jamieson has noticed with this remark: "Dr. Johnson mentions napery, but without any authority; the word being scarcely known in English." It happens, however, (though Dr. Johnson indeed could find no example,) that this word is common in English, and supported by indisputable authority.] Linen for the table; linen in general.

Some her husband's own goods, Some a pillow of down, Some of the napery: And all this shille they make For the good ale sake. Sholton, Poems, p. 185.

What use was there of a towel, where was no water? She that made a fountain of her eyes, Made precious napery of her hair: that better fish shamed the linen in the Pharisee's chest. Bp. Hall, Contempl. B. 4.

Ye may see it is a servingman's fresh napery. Overbury, Character, sign. E. 3.

He did not use meat on table-cloth; — out of mere necessity; because they had not meat nor napery. Gayton on D. Quix. p. 95.

A gentleman that loves clean napery. Shirley, Hyde Park.

NAP'HEW. n. s. [nappu, Lat.] An herb. NAP'ITHA.† n. s. [naphtha, Lat. naphte, Fr. Cotgrave. In the Persian language, neft, or naphth. See Sir T. Herbert's Trav. p. 182. and Hole's Remarks on the Arabian Nights' Entert. p. 170.]

Naphtha is a very pure, clear, and thin mineral fluid, of a very pale yellow, with a cast of brown in it. It is soft and oily to the touch, of a sharp and unplesant taste, and of a briak and penetrating smell; of the bituminous kind. It is extremely ready to take fire.

Hill, Mat. Med. Strabo represents it as a liquation of bitumen. It swims on the top of the water of wells and springs. That found about Babylon is in some springs whitish, though it be generally black, and differs little from petroleum.

Woodward. This naphte is an oily or fat liquid substance; in colour not unlike soft white clay.

Sir T. Herbert, Trav. p. 182. From the arched roof Pendant by subtle magic, many a row Of heavy lamps, and burning censers, fed With naphtha and sulphur, yielded light As from a sky. Milton, P. L.

NAP'PINES. n. s. [from nappu.] The quality of having a nap.

NAP'KIN.† n. s. [from nap; which etymology is oddly favoured by Virgil, "Tonsique ferunt mantilia villis," naperia, Italian. Dr. Johnson — It is rather a corruption, as napery is, of the Latin mappa, a cloth. See NAFERY.

1. A cloth used at table to wipe the hands.

By art were woven napkins, shirts, and coats, inconsumptible by fire. Brown, Vulg. Err.

The same matter was woven into a napkin at Leuwin, which was cleansed by being burnt in the fire. Widdius.

Napkins Hellogabalus had of cloth of gold, but they were more commonly of linen, or soft wool. Arbuthnot.

2. A handkerchief. This sense is retained in Scotland, and in some parts of the north of England.

I am glad I have found this napkin; — This was her first remembrance from the Moor. Shakespeare.

NAP'PLESS.† adj. [from nap.] Wanting nap; threadbare.

Were he to stand for consul, ne'er would he Appear? the market place, nor on his part The napless virtue of humility. Shakspeare, Coriol.

His only coat, Eldent of things! and napless, as an heath Of small extent by fleecy myriads graz'd. Shamton, Eccl. P. III.

NAP'RY.† adj. [from nap. Lye derives it from nappu, Saxon, a cup. Dr. Johnson. — Sereinus has given the same derivation, nappu, Germ. nap, Goth. a cup; defining nappu, inebriating. So Sherwood renders nappu ale, bente forte, i. e. very strong. Dr. Johnson calls it, from nap, frothy, spumy; whence apples and ale are called lamb-wool. So we say the foaming bowl, i. e. having the liquor in it frothing, rising as it were with a head. Some have thought it referring to nap, in another sense, as producing sleep.]

1. An old epithet applied to ale. Nappy ale, good and stale, in a brown bowl, Which did about the board merryly trowle. Old Ball. The King and Miller of Mansfield.

When I my thresher heard, With nappy beer I to the barn repair'd. Gay, Past.

2. Hair; full of down.

Cotgrave, and Sherwood.

Tulce.

NAR'RATIVELY.* adv. [from narrative.] By way of relation.

The words of all judicial acts are written narratively, unless it be in sentences wherein dispositive and enacting terms are made use of.

Aspliff, Parergon.

NARRA'TOR.* n. s. [narrateur, Fr.; from narro, Lat.] A teller; a relater.

He is but a narrator of other men's opinions, suspending his own judgement.

Manning, App. to Ctes. (1625), p. 5.

Consider whether the narrator be honest and faithful, as well as skillful; whether he hath no peculiar gain or profit by believing or reporting it.

Watts, Logic.

NAR'RATORY.* adj. [narratus, Lat.] Giving a relation of things.

Letters, though they be capable of any subject, yet constantly they are either narrative, observatory, consolatory, &c.

Hamlet, Lett. i. l. 1.

NAR'ROW.* adj. [neapey, napu, nappu,
Sax. from nyp, near. — Dr. Johnson.]
And so Serenius. Junius considers neapu, as the participle contracted, from nyppan, to straighten, to contract into
1. a small compass. And so Mr. H. Tooke.

2. Not broad or wide, having but a small distance from side to side.

Edward from Belgia,
Hath pass'd in safety through the narrow seas.

Shakspeare.

The angel stood in a narrow place, where was no way to turn either to the right hand or to the left.

Nem. ii. 96.

In a narrow-bottom'd ditch cattle cannot turn.

Morison.

By being too few, or of an improper figure and dimension to do their duty in perfection, they become narrow and incapable of performing their naive function.

Blackmore.

2. Small; of no great extent; used of time as well as place.

From this narrow time of gestation may ensue
a smallness in the excretion; but this is oftenest no infirmity.

Brown.

Though the Jews were but a small nation, and confined to a narrow compass in the world, yet the size of letters and languages is truly to be ascribed to them.

Watts.

3. Covetous; avaricious.

To narrow breasts he comes all wrapt in gain,

To swelling hearts he shines in honour's fire.

Sidney.

4. Contracted; of confined sentiments;
ungenerous.

He is a narrow-minded man, that affects a triumph in any glorious study. B. Jonson, Discoveries.

Love first invented verse, and form'd the rhyme,
The motion measur'd, harmoniz'd the chime,
To liberal acts enlarg'd the narrow-soul,

Soft'n'd the fierce, and smail'd the coward bold.

Dryden, Cym. and Iph.

Nothing more shakes any society than men divisions between the several orders of its members, and their narrow-hearted repining at each other's gain.

The greatest understanding is narrow. How much of God and nature is there, whereof we never had any idea?

The hopes of good from those whom we gruffly would produce a very narrow and stinted charity.

South.

A salamander grows familiar with a stranger at first sight, and is not so narrow-spirited as to observe, whether the person she talks to, be in brooches or in petticoats.

Aspliff.

It is with narrow-soul'd people as with narrow-neck'd bottles; the less they have in them the more noise they make in pouring it out.

Sefti, Miscel.

5. Near; within a small distance.

But Menebrous to the head his arrow dove,
Then made a glancing shot, and miss'd the dove;
Yet miss'd to narrow, that he cut the cord
Which fasten'd by the foot the sliding bird.

Dryden.

6. Close; vigilant; attentive.

The orb he room'd
With narrow search; and with inspection deep Consider'd ev'ry creature, which of all
Most opportune might serve his wiles.

Milton, P. L.

beams should not be fessenc'd in the walls of the house.

I Kings, vi. 6.

By reason of the great contumacy of Brazil, the need defecteth toward the land twelve degrees; but at the Straits of Magellan, where the land is narrow'd, and the sea on the other side, it varieth about five or six.

Brown.

A government, which by alienating the affections, lining the opinions, and crossing the interests of the people, leaves out of its compass the greatest part of their consent, may justly be said, in the same degree it loses ground, to narrow its bottom.

Toulce.

2. To contract; to impair in dignity of extent or influence.

One science is incomparably above all the rest,
where it is not by corruption narrow'd into a trade,
for men or ill ends, and secular interests; I mean, theology, which contains the knowledge of God and his creatures.

Locke.

3. To contract in sentiment or capacity of knowledge.

Demosthenes does contract and narrow our fi-cilities, so that we can apprehend only those things in which we are conversant.

Gaw. of the Tongue.

How hard it is to get the mind, narrow'd by a scanty collection of common ideas, to enlarge itself to a more copious stock.

Locke.

Lo! every field of sun returns to thee;
Bounded by nature, narrow'd of still by art;
A trifling head, and a contracted heart.

Pope.

4. To confine; to limit.

I most find fault with his narrowing too much his own bottom, and his uowary supping the foundation on which he stands.

Watts.

By admitting too many things at once into one question, the mind is dazzled and bewildered;
whereas by limiting and narrowing the question,
you take a fuller survey of the whole.

Watts, Logic.

Our knowledge is much more narrow'd, if we confine ourselves to our own solitary reasonings, without much reading.

Watts.

To NARROW.* v. n.

1. To be diminished with respect to breadth or wideness; to grow narrow;
in opposition to widen; as, the road or way narrows.

The height of buildings, and narrowness of streets, keep away the sun beams.

Barton, Anat. of Med. p. 360.

In our Gothic cathedrals, the narrowness of the arch makes it rise in height, or run out in length.

2. Want of extent; want of comprehension.

That prince, who should be so wise and godlike, as by established laws of liberty to secure protection and encouragement to the honest industry of mankind, against the oppression of power, and narrowness of party, will quickly be too hard for his neighbours. Locke.

3. Confined state; contractedness.

The most learned and ingenious society in Europe, confess the narrowness of human attainments. Glauville.

Clasp vulgar arts, whose narrowness affords No flight for thoughts, but poorly sticks at words. Dennham.

The Latin, a severe and compendious language, often expresses that in one word, which either the barbarity or the narrowness of modern tongues cannot supply in more. Dryden.

4. Meanness; poverty. [neanperge, Sax. angustia, angustus.]

If God will fit thee for this passage, by taking off thy load and emptying thy bags, and so suit the narrowness of the fortune, and the narrowness of the way thou art to pass, is there any thing but mercy in all this? South.

5. Want of capacity.

Such is the poorness of some spirits, and the narrowness of their souls; and they are so nailed to the earth. Harell, instruct. For. Trav. p. 198.

Another disposition in men, which makes them improper for philosophical contemplations, is not so much from the narrowness of their spirit and understanding, as because they will not take time to extend them. Burnet, Theology.

NAS. [from ne nas, or has nas.] Obsolete.

For pity'd it was call'd not nas, South.

But scorn'd been deeds of fond foolery. Spenser.

NATION, n. s. [nation, French; natio, Latin.]

1. A people distinguished from another people; generally by their language, original, or government.

If Edward III. had prospered in his French war, and compelled with English the towns which he won, as he began at Calais driving out the French, his successors holding the same course, would have filled all France with our nation. Relsh.

A nation properly signifies a great number of families derived from the same blood, born in the same country, and living under the same government. Temple.

2. A great number; emphatically.

When our battle I the field have won Spread o'er with glantly shapes, which once were men;

A nation crush'd! a nation of the brave!

A realm of death! and on this side the grave!

Are there, said I, who from me had survey'd, This human chaos, carry miles away! Young.

NATIONAL. adj. [national, French; from nation.]

1. Public; general; not private; not particular.

They in their earthly Canaan plac'd, Long time shall dwell and prosper, but when Shakspeare, Hamlet.
National interrupt their public peace.

Such a national devotion inspired men with sentiments of religious gratitude, and swells their hearts with joy and exultation.
    Milton, P. L.

The astonishing victories our armies have been crowned with, were in some measure the blessings returned upon that national charity which has been so conspicuous.
    Addison.

God, in the execution of his judgements, never visits a people with public and general calamities, but where their sins are public and national too.
    Rogers.

2. Biggoted to one's own country.

NATIONALITY. n. s. [from national.]
National character.

Let our friendship, let our love, that nationality of British love be still strengthened.

Hemans, Lett. (dat. 1661), l. 18.
He could not but see in them that nationality, which I believe no liberal Scotsman will deny.

Bonnet, Tour to the Heb. p. 11.

To NATURALIZE. v. a. [from national.]
To distinguish nationally. This is a very modern word, like denationalize.
It is in use; but I have mislaid an example of it.

NATIONALLY. adv. [from national.] With regard to the nation.

The term adulterous chiefly relates to the Jews, who being nationally exposed to God by covenant, every sin of theirs was in a peculiar manner spiritual adultery.
    South.

NATIONALNESS. n. s. [from national.]
Reference to the people in general.

NATIVE. adj. [native, Latin; nativus, Fr.]

1. Produced by nature; natural; not artificial.

She more sweet than any bird on bough,
Would oftentimes amongst them bear a part,
And strive to pass, as she could well enough.
Their native music by her skillful art.
    Spenser.
This doctrine doth not enter by the ear,
But of itself is native in the breast.
    Davies.

2. Natural; such as is according to nature;
original.

The members, retired to their homes, resume the native sedateness of their temper.
    Swift.

3. Conferred by birth; belonging by birth.

But ours is a privilege ancient and native,
Hangs not on an ordinance, nor grows legislative;
And first, 'tis to speak whatever we please.
    Dryden.

4. Relating to the birth; pertaining to the time or place of birth.

If these men have defeated the law, and outrun native punishment; though they can outstrip mine, they have no wings to fly from God himself.
    Shakspeare, Hen. V.

Many of our bodies shall, no doubt,
Find native graves.
    Shakspeare, Hen. V.

5. Original; that which gave being.

I have now seen death! is this the way
I must return to native dust? O night
Of terror, foul, and ugly to behold!
    Milton, P. L.

6. Born with; co-operating with; congenial.

The hand is not more native to the heart,
The head more instrumental to the mouth,
Than the throne of Denmark to thy father.
    Shakspeare, Hamlet.

NATIVE. n. s.

1. Born in any place; original inhabitant.
Make no extirpation of the natives, under pretence of planting religion. God surely will no way be pleased with such sacrifices.
    Bacon, Adv. to Villiers.

Tully, the humble mushroom scarcely known,
The lowly native of a country town.
    Dryden, Jun.

There stood a monument to Tacitus the historian, to the emperors Tacitus and Florianus, natives of the place.
    Addison.

Our natives have a fuller habit, squarer, and more extended chests, than the people that be beyond us to the south.
    Blackmore.

2. Offspring.
The accusation,
All cause unborn, could never be the native
Of our so frank donation.
    Shakspeare, Coriol.

NATIVELY. adv. [from native.]

1. Naturally; not artificially.

We wear hair which is not natively our own.
    By. Taylor, Artific. Handson. p. 77.
There is something to natively grant good and in a person that is truly devout, that an awkward man may as well pretend to be gentle, as an hypocrite to be pious.
    Trotter, No. 211.

2. Originally.

I take two names given to Christ—to be na-tively Chaldee words. Lightfoot, Mosaic. p. 118.
This goodness of God natively proceeded from his will, as thought and truth proceedeth from his mind.
    Sheffield, Learned Disc. p. 184.

NATIVENESS. n. s. [from native.] State of being produced by nature.

NATIVITY. n. s. [from nativus, Fr.]

1. Birth; issue into life.

Concluding ever with a thanksgiving for the nativity of our Saviour, in whose birth the births of all are only blessed. Bacon.
They looked upon those as the true days of their nativity, wherein they were freed from the pains and sorrows of a troublesome world.
    Nelson.

2. Time, place, or manner of birth.

My husband and my children both,
And you the calendars of their nativity,
Go to a gospol's feast. Shakspeare, Com. of Err.
They say there is divinity in odd numbers,
either in nativity, chance, or death.
    Shakspeare, M. W. of Windsor.

When I vow, I weep; and vows so born,
In their nativity all truth appears.
    Shakspeare, Mid. N. Dream.

Thy birth and thy nativity is of Canaan.
    Ezek. xvi. 3.

3. State or place of being produced.

Thou, in their dark nativity, the deep
Shall yield us, pregnant with infernal flames.
    Milton, P. L.

NATON. n. s. A sort of black salt imported from Egypt.

NATURAL. adj. [naturalis, Latin; natur-
ated, Fr.]

1. Produced or effected by nature; not artificial.

There is no natural motion of any particular heavy body, which is perpetual, yet it is possible from them to contrive such an artificial revolution as shall constantly be the cause of itself.
    Wilkins, Delectus.

2. Illegitimate; not legal.
This would turn the vein of that we call natural,
—to that of legal propagation; which has ever been encouraged as the other has been disfavoured by institutions.
    Temple.

3. Bestowed by nature; not acquired.

If there be any difference in natural parts, it should seem that the advantage lies on the side of children born from noble and wealthy parents.

4. Not forced; not farfetched; dictated by nature.

I will now deliver a few of the properest and natural considerations that belong to this piece.
    Watson.

5. Following the stated course of things.
If solid piety, humility, and a sober sense of themselves, is most prevalent in that sex, it is the plain and natural consequence of a vain and corrupt education.
    Law.

6. Consonant to natural notions.
Such unnatural connections become, by custom, as natural to the mind as sun and light; fire and warmth go together, and so seem to carry with them as natural an evidence as self-evident truths themselves.
    Locke.

7. Discoverable by reason, not revealed.
I call that natural religion, which men might know, and should be obliged unto, by the meer principles of reason, improved by consideration and experience, without the help of revelation.
    Wilkins.

8. Tender; affectionate by nature.

To leave his wife, to leave his babes,
He wants the natural touch.
    Shakspeare, Macbeth.

9. Unaffected; according to truth and reality.

What can be more natural than the circumstances in the behaviour of those women who had lost their husbands on this fatal day.
    Addison.

10. Opposed to violent; as, a natural death.

NATURAL. n. s. [from nature.]

1. An idiot; one whom nature debars from understanding; a fool.

That a monster should be such a natural.

Take the thoughts of not out of that narrow compass he has been all his life confined to, you will find him no more capable of reasoning than a perfect natural.
    Locke.

2. Native; original inhabitant. Not in use.

The inhabitants and naturals of the place,
should be in a state of freedom.

Oppression in many places, wears the robes of justice, which dominating over the naturals will not spare strangers, and strangers will not endure it.
    Raleigh, Essay.

3. Gift of nature; nature; quality. Not in use.

The wretched are the contentments of all helps;
such as presuming on their own natural, deride diligence, and mock at terms when they understand not things.
    B. Jonson.

To consider them in their pure natural, the earl's intellectual faculties were his stronger part,
and the duke, his practical.
    Watson.

NATURALISM. n. s. [from natural.] Mere state of nature.

These frolicsome, revelling, and thoroughly natural people, who give a full swing to their desires and appetites:— Those spirited and wanton cross-women, as they call themselves, who are striving with speed and slattery to come up to the naturalism and lawless privileges of the first class.
    By. Lavengro, Monks and Con. and 2nd. p. 63.

Lord Bolingbroke died in 1751, and his philosophical works were published in 1753. Every one knows the principles and presumption of that unhappy nobility. He was of that sect, which, to avoid a more odious name, chooses to distinguish itself by that of naturalism.
    Hurt, Life of By. Warburton.

NATURALIST.† n. s. [naturaliste, French. Cotgrave.] A student in physics, or natural philosophy.

Admirable artifice! wherever Galen, though a mere naturalist, was so taken, that he could not but adjudge the honour of a hymn to the wise Creator. Mare.

It is not credible, that the naturalist could be deceived in his account of a place that lay in the neighbourhood of Rome. Addison on Italy.

NATURALITY.* n. s. [naturalité, Fr.]

Naturalness. Not in use.

This distinction will be found of most general use, for as much as there is such an intricate mixture of naturality and preternaturality in age.

Smith on Old Age (1666), p. 153.

NATURALIZATION. n. s. [from naturalizer.]

The act of investing aliens with the privileges of native subjects.

The Spartans were nice in point of naturalization; whereby while they kept their companies, they stood firm; but when they did spread, they became a windfall. Incon.

Encouragement may be given to any merchants that shall come over and turn a certain stock of their own, as naturalization, and freedom from customs the two first years. Tenple.

Enemies, by taking advantage of the general naturalization act, invited over foreigners of all religions. Swift.

TO NATURALIZE.† v. a. [naturalizer, Fr. Cotgrave.]

1. To adopt into a community; to invest with the privileges of native subjects.

The lords informed the king, that the Irish might not be naturalized without damage to themselves or the crown. Davies.

2. To make natural; to make easy like things natural.

He rises from 'till his hammer and anvil; Smith has naturalized his labour to him.

NATURALLY. adv. [from natural.]

1. According to the power or impulses of unassisted nature.

Our sovereign good is desired naturally; God, the author of that natural desire, hath appointed natural means whereby to fulfil it; but man having utterly disabled his nature unto these means, hath had other revealed, and hath received from heaven a law to teach him, how that which is desired naturally, must now supernaturally be attained. Hooker.

If sense be not certain in the reports it makes of things to the mind, there can be naturally no such thing as certainty of knowledge. South.

When you have once habituated your heart to a serious performance of holy intercession, you have done a great deal to render it incapable of quite a different way, and to make it naturally delight in the happiness of mankind. Love.

2. According to nature; without affectation; with just representation.

These things so in my song, I naturally may show;

Now as the mountain high, then as the valley low; Here fruitful as the mead; there, as the heath bare;

Then, as the gloomy wood, I may be rough, tho' rare. Dryden.

That part Was aptly fitted, and naturally perform'd. Shakspeare.

This answers fitly and naturally to the place of the abyss before the deluge, incline'd within the earth. Burnet.

The thoughts are to be measured only by their propriety; that is, as they flow more or less naturally from the persons and occasions. Dryden.

3. Spontaneously; without art; without cultivation: as there is no place where what naturally grows.

NATURALNESS. n. s. [from natural.]

1. The state of being given or produced by nature.

The naturalness of a desire, is the cause that the satisfaction of it is pleasure, and pleasure importunes the will; and that which importunes the will, puts a difficulty on the will refusing or forbearing it. South.

2. Conformity to truth and reality; not affectation.

He must understand what is contained in the temperance of the eyes, in the naturalness of the eyebrows. Dryden.

Horace speaks of these parts in an ode that may be reckoned among the finest for the naturalness of the thought, and the beauty of the expression. Addison.

NATURE. n. s. [natura, Latin; nature, French.]

1. An imaginary being supposed to preside over the niterial and animal world. Thou, nature, art my goddess; to thy law My services are bound. Shakspeare, K. Lear.

When it was said to Anaxagoras, the Athenians have condemned you to die; he said, and nature them. Bacon.

Let the postilion nature mount, and let The coachman art be set. Cowley.

Heaven bestows At home all riches that wise nature needs. Cowley. Simple nature to his hope was giv'n, Beyond the cloud topt hill as humble heav'n's. Page.

2. The native state or properties of any thing, by which it is discriminated from others.

Why leap'd the hills, why did the mountains shake? What ail'd them their fix'd natures to forsake? Cowley.

Between the animal and rational province, some animals have a dark resemblance of the influxes of reason: so between the corporeal and intellectual world, there is man participating much of both natures. Hale, Orig. of Mankind.

The nature of brutes, besides what is common to them with plants, doth consist in having such faculties, whereby they are capable of apprehending external objects, and of receiving pain or pleasure from them. Wakins.

3. The constitution of an animated body.

Nature, as it grows again to 'rd earth, Is fashion'd for the journey, dull and heavy. Shakspeare.

We're not ourselves, When nature, being oppress'd, commands the mind.

To suffer with the body. Shakspeare, K. Lear.

4. Disposition of mind; temper.

Nothing could have subdued nature To such a lowness, but his unkind daughters. Shakspeare.

A credulous father, and a brother noble, Whose nature is so far from doing harme, That he suspects none; on whose foolish honesty My practices ride easy. Shakspeare, K. Lear.

5. The regular course of things.

My end Was wrought by nature, not by vile offence. Shakspeare.

6. The compass of natural existence.

If their dam may be judge, the young ages are the most beautiful things in nature. Glenville.

7. The constitution and appearances of things.

The works, whether of poets, painters, moralists, or historians, which are built upon general nature, live for ever; while those which depend for their existence on particular customs and habits, a partial view of nature, or the fluctuation of fashion, can only be coeval with that which first raised them from obscurity. Keynolds.

8. Natural affection, or reverence; native sensations.

Have we not seen The murdering son ascend his parent's bed, Through violated nature force his way, And stain the sacred womb where once he lay? Page.

9. The state or operation of the material world.

His sliding nature: fast in fate, Left from the human will. Page.

10. Sort; species.

A dispute of this nature caused mischief in abundance betwixt a king and so archbishop. Dryden.

11. Sentiments or images adapted to nature, or conformable to truth and reality.

Only nature can please those tastes which are unprejudiced and refined. Addison.

Nature and Homer were, he found, the same. Page.

12. Physics; the science which teaches the qualities of things.

Nature and nature's laws lay hid in night, God said, Let Newton be, and all was light. Page.

13. Of this word, which occurs so frequently, with significations so various, and so difficultly defined, Boyle has given an explication, which deserves to be epitomised.

Nature sometimes means the Author of Nature, or natura naturans; as, nature hath made man partly corporeal and partly immaterial. For nature in this sense may be used the word Creator.

Nature sometimes means that on whose account a thing is what it is, and is called, as when we define the nature of an angle. For nature in this sense may be used essence or quality.

Nature sometimes means what belongs to a living creature at its nativity, or accrues to it by its birth, as when we say, a man is noble by nature, or a child is naturally forward. This may be expressed by saying, the man was born so; or, the thing was generated such.

Nature sometimes means an internal principle of local motion, as we say, the stone falls, or the flame rises by nature; for this we may say, that the motion up or down is spontaneous, or produced by its proper cause.

Nature sometimes means the established course of things corporeal; as, nature makes the night succeed the day. This may be termed established order, or settled course.

Nature means sometimes the aggregate of the powers belonging to a body, especially a living one: as when physicians say, that nature is strong, or nature left to herself will do the cure. For this may be used, constitution, temperament, or structure of the body.

Nature is put likewise for the system of the corporeal works of God; as there is no phœnix or chimera in nature. For nature thus applied, we may use the word, or the universe.

Nature is sometimes indeed commonly taken for a kind of semideity. In this sense it is best not to use it at all.
Boyle, Free Eng. into the Received Notion of Nature.

To NAVIGATE. v. a. To endow with natural qualities. We have long ceased to use the verb, but we retain the participle in good-natured, ill-natured, and other compounds.

He whiche natureth every kynde,
The myghty God, so as I fynde,
Of man, whiche is his creature,
Hath so devyded the nature.

Greene, Conf. Am. B. 7.

NAU'GHTY. n. s. [from nature.] The state of being produced by nature. Not used.

This cannot be allowed, except we impute that unto the first cause which we impose not on the second; or what we deny unto nature we impute unto nature.

Brown.

NA'VAL. adj. [naval, Fr. navalis, Lat.]

1. Consisting of ships.

Encamping on the main.

Our naval army had besieged Spain;
They that the whole world's monarchy design'd,
Are to their ports by our bold fleet confin'd.

Waller.

As our high vessels pass their watery way,
Let all the naval world dost homage pay.

Prior.

2. Belonging to ships.

Masters of such numbers of strong and valiant men, as well as of all the naval stores that furnish the world.

Temple.

NA'VALS. n. s. pl. Used by Clarendon for naval affairs; perhaps by no other writer.

It was a day of signal triumph, the action of it having much surpassed all that was done in Cromwell's time, whose navies were much greater than had ever been in any age.

Ld. Clarendon, Life, ii. 507.

NA'VARCHY. n. s. [navarchus, Lat. captain of a ship.] Knowledge of managing ships.

Navarchy, and making models for buildings and riggings of ships.

See Mr. Petty, Adv. to Hartlib, (1648), p. 6.

NAVE. n. s. [nav, Sax.]

1. The middle part of the wheel in which the axle moves.

Out, out, thou strumpet fortune! all you gods
In general synod take away her power;
Break all the spokes and fellyes from her wheel,
And bow the round nave down the hill of her o'.

As low as to the fiends. Shakespeare, Hamlet.

In the wheels of waggons the hollows of the axles-tree, by their swift rotations on the ends of the axle-traces, produce a heat sometimes so intense as to set them on fire.

Rap.

2. [From navis, nave, old Fr.] The middle part of the church distinct from the aisles or wings.

It comprehends the nave or body of the church, together with the chancel. Ayliffe, Parergon.

NA'VEL. n. s. [navela, navel, Sax.]

1. The point in the middle of the belly, by which embryos communicate with the parent.

Imbricatus addit

His javeline at him, and so ript his navel, that the wound,
As suddenly it shut his eyes, so open'd on the ground.

At power'd his entrails. Chapman.
As children, while within the womb they live,
Feed by the navel: here they feed not so. Dante.

The use of the navel is to continue the infant unto the mother, and by the vessels thereof to convey its aliments.

Brown.

Me from the womb the midwife muse did take,
She cut my navel.

Cowley.

There is a superintending providence, that naive animals will hunt for the test before they are quite gotten out of the secundine, and parted from the navelstring.

Derham.

2. The middle; the interior part.

Being press'd to the war,
Even when the navel of the state was touch'd,
They would out tread the gates. Shelton, Corid.

Within the sanct of this hideous room,
Immur'd in cyprus shades, a voracious dwells.

Milton, Comus.

NA'VELGALL. n. s.

Navelgall is a bruise on the top of the chine of the back, behind the saddle, right against the navel, occasioned either by the saddle being split behind, or the stuffing being wanting, or by the crupper buckle sitting down in that place, or some hard weight or knobs lying directly behind the saddle.

NA'VELOWORT. n. s. [cotyledon.] A plant. It hath the appearance of houseleek.

Miller.

NA'VEF. n. s. [navus, Lat. navet, naveau, French.] A plant. It agrees in most respects with the turnep; but has a lesser root, and somewhat warmer in taste.

In the isle of Ely the species, which is wild, is very much cultivated, it being the cole seed from which they draw the oil.

Miller.

NAUFRAGE. n. s. [naufnage, old Fr. naufragium, Lat.] Shipwreck. Cockeram.

Guilt of the ruin and naufrage, and perishing of infinite subjects.

Bacon, Speech at taking his Place in Chancery.

NAU'FRAGOUS. adj. [from naufragus, Lat.] Cruising shipwreck.

That tempestuous, and oft naufragous sea, wherein youth and handsomeness are commonly tossed with no less hazard to the body than the soul.

Bp. Taylor, Arif. Handson, p. 33.

NAUGHT. adj. [naht, naphite, Saxon; that is, ne ought, not anything.] Bad; corrupt; worthless: it is now hardly used but in ludicrous language.

With them that are able to put a difference between things naught and things indifferent in the church of Rome, we are yet at controversy about the manner of removing that which is naught.

Hooker.

Thy sister's naught: Oh Regan! she both tied Sharp-tooth'd unkindness like a vulture here.

Shakespeare.

NAUGHT. n. s. Nothing. This is commonly, though improperly, written naught. See AUGHT, NOUGHT, and OUGHT.

Be you contented

To have a son set your decrees at naught,
To pluck down justice from your awful bench.

Shakespeare.

NAU'GHTLY. adv. [from naughtly.] Wickedly; corruptly.

NAU'GHTINESS. n. s. [from naughtly.] Wickedness; badness. Slight wickedness or perverseness, as of children.

No remembrance of naughtiness delights but mine own; and methinks the accusing his traps might in some manner excuse my fault, which certainly I loth to do.

Sidney.

Idleness, the lane of body and mind, the nurse of naughtiness. Burton, Anat. of Mel. p. 63.

NAU'GHTLY. adv. [from naught.] Badly; corruptly.

Thus did I for want of better wit,
Because my parents naughtily brought me up.

Mr. For Mag. p. 237.

NAU'GHTY. adj. The same with naught.

1. Bad; wicked; corrupt.

A prince of great courage and beauty, but fostered up in blood by his naughty father. Sidney.

These naughty times

Put bars between the owars and their rigths.
How far that little candle throws his beams!
So shines a good deed in a naughty world.

Shakespeare.

2. It is now seldom used but in ludicrous censure.

If gentle slumbers on thy temples creep,
But, naughty man, thou dost not mean to sleep,
Beake thee to thy bed.

Dryden.

NAU'VICULAR. adj. [navicularis, Latin; naviculaire, Fr.] In anatomy, the third bone in each foot that lies between the astragalus and ossa cuneiformia. Dict.

NA'VIGABLE. adj. [navigable, French; navigabilis, Latin.] Capable of being passed by ships or boats.

The first-peopled cities were all founded upon these navigable rivers or their branches, by which the one might give succour to the other.

Many have motioned to the council of Spain, the cutting of a navigable channel through this small isthmus, to so shorten their common voyages to China, and the Molucces.

Hygh.

Almighty Jove surveys

Earth, air, and shores, and navigable seas.

Dryden.

NA'VIGABLENESS. n. s. [from navigable.] Capacity to be passed in vessels.

To NA'VIGATE. v. n. [navigo, Lat. naviger, French.] To sail; to pass by water.

The Physicians navigated to the extremities of the western ocean.

Arbutnot on China.

To NA'VIGATE. v. a. To pass by ships or boats.

Drusus, the father of the emperor Claudius, was the first who navigated the northern ocean.

Arbutnot on China.

NAVIGATION. n. s. [navigation, French, from navigare.]

1. The act or practice of passing by water. Our shipping for number, strength, mariners, and all things that appertain to navigation, is as great as ever.

Bacon.

The landstee is that great help to navigation.

Merc.

Rude as their ships, was navigation then,
No useful compass or meridian known;
Coasting, they kept the land within their ken,
And knew no north but when the polestar shone.

Dryden.

When Pliny names the Pæni as inventors of navigation, it must be understood of the Phœnicians, from whom the Carthaginians are descended.

Arbutnot on China.

2. Vessels of navigation.

Though you untie the winds, and let them fight Against the churches; though the yeast waves
Confound and swallow navigation up.

Shakespeare, Macbeth.

NA'VIGATOR. n. s. [navigateur, French, from navigare.] Sailor; seaman; traveller by water.

By the numbering of navigators, that sea is not three hundred and sixty fath deep.

Breweard.

The rules of navigators must often fail. Brown.
The contrivance may seem difficult, because the submarine navigators will want winds, tides, and the sight of the heavens.

Wilkins, Math. Magic.
This terrestrial globe, which before was only a globe in speculation, has since been surrounded by the boldness of many navigators. Temple.

NAU'LAGET† n. s. [naufrage, French, Cotgrave; from naufragum, Lat.] The freight of passengers in a ship.

NAU'MACHY† n. s. [naumachie, French; naumachia, Latin.] A mock sea fight. Cockeram.

And now the naumachic begins.
Close to the surface.

Loveless, Luc. Penth. (1650.) p. 43.

NAU'SCOPY. * n. s. [ναύς and σκόπεω, Greek.] The art of discovering the approach of ships, or the neighbourhood of lands, at a considerable distance. Dr. Maty.

NAU'SEA. * n. s. [Latin; nauſia, Greek, from ναῖο, a ship.] Sea-sickness; any sickness.

The sickness and nausea, usual in other cases of the like nature, being marvellously in this transferred to the by-standers. Dudley.

To NAU'SEATE† v. n. [from nauſeo, Latin.] To grow squeamish; to turn away with disgust.

We are apt to nauseate at very good meat, when we know that all will do drew it. Bp. Reynolds on the Passions, ch. 59.

Don't over-fatigue the spirits, lest the mind be seized with a lassitude, and nauseate, and grow tired of a particular subject before you have finished it. Watts on the Mind.

To NAU'SEATE v. a.

1. To loath; to reject with disgust.

While we single out several dishes, and reject others, the selection seems arbitrary; for many are cry'd up in one age, which are decayed and nauseated in another. Brown.

Old age, with silent pace, comes creeping on.
Nauseates the praise, which in her youth she won,
And hates the muse by which she was undone. Dryden.

The patient nauseates and loaths wholesome foods. Blackmore.

Those bonds, as stomachs, are not sure the best, which nauseate all, and nothing can digest. Pope.

2. To strike with disgust.

His leg got his hold and turned from her, as if he were nauseated, then gave her a lash with his tail. Swift.

NAU'STIOUS. adj. [from nauſios, Latin; nauſiosus, French.] Loathsome; disgusting; regarded with abhorrence.

Those tricks, wherein children take delight,
Grow nauſious to the young man's appetite;
And from those games, your youth requires
To exercise their minds, our age retires. Denham.

Food of a wholesome juice is pleasant to the taste and agreeable to the stomach, till hunger and thirst be well appeased, and then it begins to be less pleasant, and at last even nauſious and loathsome. Ray.

Old thread-bare phrases will often make you go out of your way to find and apply them, and are nauſious to rational hearers. Swift.

NAU'STIOUSLY. adv. [from nauſiosus.] Loathsome; disgustfully.

This, though cunningly concealed, as well knowing how nauſiously that drug would go down in a lawful monarchy, which was prescribed for a rebellious commonwealth, yet they always kept in reserve. Dryden.

Their satire's praise;
So personally and so unlike they paint. Garth, Disps.

NAU'STIOUSNESS. n. s. [from nauſiosus.] Loathsome; quality of raising disgust.

The nauſiousness of such company disgusts a reasonable man, when he sees he can hardly approach greatness but as a moated castle; he must first pass through the mud and filth with which it is encompassed. Dryden, Daringbold.

NAUTICAL† adj. [nauticus, Lat.] Pertaining to sailors.

He elegantly shewed by whom he was drawn, which depicted the nautical compass with art and magnificence. Comden.

How did thy senses quail,
Seeing the shadows so swart and red round about Hearing confused shoutings of the nautic rout!
Fanshawe, Poems, (1676.) p. 268.

NAUTILUS. n. s. [Latin; nautilus, Fr.] A shell fish furnished with something analogous to oars and a sail.

Learns of the little nautilus to sail,
Spread the thin oar and catch the driving gale. Pope.

NAU'VY. * n. s. [navy, naves, old French; navis, Latin.] An assemblage of ships, commonly ships of war; a fleet.

We met of shippes a grete nene,
Full of people that wolde in to Irlonde. Old Morality of Hycke-Scorner.

On the western coast rideth a puissant navy.
Shakespeare, Rich. III.

Lery money, and return the same to the treasurer of the navy for his majesty's use. Clerendon.

The narrow seas can scarce their navy bear,
Or crowded vessels can their soldiers hold. Dryden.

NAWL. * n. s. An Awl. See NALL.

The master was appointed to bore their cars through with a nawl, and so to mark them for perpetual servants. Fabrycius, Aethon. (1628.) p. 120.

NAY.† adv. [Goth. ne; Saxon, na, or ne.]

1. No; an adverb of negation.

Disputes in wrangling spend the day,
Whilst one says only yes, and t' other nay. Denham.

2. Not only so, but more. A word of amplification.

Good men always profits by his endeavour, yes, when he is absent; nay, when dead, by his example and memory; so good authors in their stile. B. Jonson, Discoveries.

He catechised the children in his chamber, giving liberty nay, invitation, to as many as would, to come and hear. Felt, Life of Hammond.

This is then the ally of Ovid's writings, which is sufficiently recommended by their other excellencies; nay, this very fault is not without its beauties; for the most severe censor cannot but be pleased. Dryden.

If a son should strike his father, not only the criminal but his whole family would be rooted out, nay, the inhabitants of the place where he lived, would be put to the sword, nay, the place itself would be razed.  Addison, Spectator.

3. Word of refusal.

They have beaten us openly uncondemned, being Romans, and have cast us into prison; and now do they thrust us out privily? nay verily; but let them come themselves and fetch us out. Acts, xvi. 37.

The fact made several excuses, but the stark word would be said nay; so that at last he promised to come. L' Etranger.

He that will not when he may,
When he would he shall have nay. Old Proverb.

NAY. * n. s. Denial; refusal. See DENAY.

There is a faire beede there also, which she determineth to sell, and would have you to have the first nay of it.

Radclyffe, Letters, (L. Mar. 26. 1613.)
There was no nay, but I must in,
And take a cup of ale. W. Browne.

To NAY. v. a. To refuse. Obsolete.

The state of a cardinal — was naid and denaid him. Holinshed, Chron. of Eng. p. 630.

NA'WARD. * n. s. [nay and ward.] Tendency to denial. This word has been given by Dr. Johnson as a third illustration of nayward, but Shakespeare's expression is certainly nayward, as Mr. Mason also has noticed.

But I'd say, he had not,
And I'll be sworn, you would believe my saying,
Honest or you lean to the nayside. Shakespeare, Wint. Tale.

NA'WARD.† n. s. [nay and word.]

1. A proverbial reproach; a bye word.

If I do not gull him into a nayward, and make him a common recreation, do not think I have wit enough to his straight in my bed. Shakespeare, The Night.

2. A watch word. Not in use.

I have spoke with her; and we have a nayward now to know one another. I come to her in white, and cry mum; the cries budget; and by that we know one another.

Shakespeare, M. Wives of Windsor.

NE† adv. [Saxon.] This particle was formerly of very frequent use, both singly and by contraction in compound words: as, nil for ne will or will not; nas for ne has or has not; nis for ne is or is not.]

1. Neither.

His warlike shield all cover'd closely was,
No night of mortal eye be ever seen,
Not made of steel, nor of enduring brass. Spenser, F. Q.

2. Not.

Yet who was that Belphage, he ne wist. Spenser, F. Q.

But when the saw at last, that he ne would
For ought or might be wonne unto her will,
She turn'd her love to hatred manifold. Jh. v. ix. 30.

NEAF.† n. s. [nef, Icelandic; nafve, Sw. Goth.] A fin. It is retained in Scotland, and the north of England.

See NEIF.

Give me thy nef, Monsieur Mustardseed. Shakespeare.

To NEAL† v. a. [anælan, Saxon; to heat; neelen, old French; to enamel.] To temper by a gradual and regulated heat.

The workmen let it cool by degrees in such restlings of fire, as they call their nealing beds; lest it should shiver by a violent succeeding of air in the room of fire. Dugly.

This did happen for want of the gloves being gradually cooled or nealed. Hagley.

If you fit, engrave, or punch upon your steel, neal it first, because it will make it softer, and consequently work easier. The common way is to give it a blood-red heat in the fire, then let it cool of itself. Mason, Mech. Ex.

To NEAL v. n. To be tempered in fire.

Reduction is chiefly effected by fire, wherein if they stand and melt, the imperfect metals vapour away. Bacon.

NEAP. * n. s. [neap-plot, Saxon. Skinner derives it from neap, naxtyz, want, poor; implying, I suppose, that a neap is when the water flows not copious.]

Low tide. Seamen use the expression "deep neap."

The mother of waters, the great deep, hath lost nothing of her ancient bounds. Her motion of ebbing and flowing, of high springs and dead neaps, are as constant as the changes of the moon.
Hobart on Providence.

NEAP.† adj. Low; decrecent. Used only of the tide. See the substantive.

The waters are in perpetual agitation of flux and reflux; even when no wind stirs, they have their neap and spring tides. Bo. Hist. Rom. p. 66.
How doth the sea constantly observe its ebb and flows, its springs and neap-tides, and still retain its saltness, so convenient for the maintenance of its inhabitants. Ray.

NE'APED.* adj. [from neap.] Wanting sufficient depth of water. Spoken of ships. The same as beneped. See BENEPEAD.

NEAPOLITAN.* n. s. A native of the kingdom of Naples.

O Staphano! two Neapolitanis 'scap'd.
Shakespeare, Tempest.

NEAPOLITAN.* adj. Belonging to Naples.
When a Neapolitan cavalier has nothing else to do, he gravely shuts himself up in his closet, and falls a tumbling over his papers to see if he can start a law-suit, and plague any of his neighbours.
Addison, in Italy.

NEAR.† prep. [nep, Saxon, from neah, nigh; Su. Goth. and Belg. naer.] At not great distance; close to; nigh; not far from. It is used both of place and time.

I have heard thee say,
No grief did ever come so near thy heart,
As when thy lady and thy true love died. Shakspeare.
Thou thought'st to help me, and such thanks I give,

As one near death to those that wish him live,
Shakspeare.
With blood the dear alliance shall be bought,
And both the people near destruction brought.

To the warlike steed thy studies lend,
Near Tia's flood the rapid wheels to guide.
Dryden.

This child was very near being excluded out of the species of man, barely by his shape. Locke.

NEAR.† adv.

1. Almost.
Whose fame by every tongue is for her minerals hurld,
Near from the mid-day's point throughout the western world. Dryden.

2. At hand; not far off. Unless it be rather in this sense an adjective.
Thou art near in my mouth, and far from their reins. Jer. xii. 2.
He serv'd great Hector, and was ever near,
Not with his trumpet only, but his spear.
Dryden, Æn.

3. Within a little.
Self-pleasing and humorous minds are so sensible of every restraint, as they will go near to think their girdles and garters to be bonds and shackles. Bacon, Ess.

This eagle shall go near, one of us or other,
to take you for a lure. L'Estrange.

He that paid a bushel of wheat per acre, would pay now about twenty-five pounds per annum; which would be near about the yearly value of the land.
The Cassilian would rather have died in slavery than paid such a sum as he found would go near to ruin him. Addison.

4. By relation or alliance.

The earl of Armagnac, near knit to Charles,
A man of great authority in France, Proffers his only daughter to your grace in marriage. Shakespeare, Hen. VI. p. 1.

NEAR.† adj.

1. Not distant in place, or time. [Sometimes it is doubtful whether near be an adjective or adverb.]

This city is near to five unto. Gen. xii. 30.
Accidents, which however dreadful at a distance,
at a nearer view lost much of their terror. Felt.
The will free from the determination of such desires, is left to the pursuit of nearer satisfactions.
Locke.

After he has continued his doubling in his thoughts, and enlarged his idea as much as he pleases, he is not one jot nearer the end of such addition than at first setting out. Locke.

Whether thy nearer liv'd to the blest times,
When man's Redeemer bled for human crimes;
Whether the hermits of the desert taught
With living practice, by example taught. Harte.

2. Advanced towards the end of an enterprise or disquisition.

Unless they add somewhat else to define more certainly what ceremonies shall stand for best, in such sort that all churches in the world should know them to be the best, and so know them that there may not remain any question about this point; we are not a whit the nearer for that they have hitherto said. Hooker.

3. Direct; straight; not winding.
Taught to live the surest way. Milton.
To measure life, learn them belimes, and know
Tow'd solid good what leads the nearest way. Milton.

4. Close; not rambling; observant of style or manner of the thing copied.

Hamlet's Carol, in the Italian, is the nearest, the most poetical, and the most sonorous of any translation of the Æneid. Yet though he takes the advantage of blank verse, he commonly allows two lines for one in Virgil, and does not always hit his sense. Dryden.

5. Closely related.
If one shall approach to any that is near of kin to him. Lat. xviii. 6.

6. Intimate; familiar; admitted to confidence.

If I had a suit to master Shallow, I would humour his men with the imputation of being near their manner. Shakespeare.

7. Touching; pressing; affecting; dear.
Every minute of his being thrusts Against my near't of life. Shakespeare, Macbeth.
He could never judge that it was better to be deceived than not, in a matter of so great and near concernment. Locke.

8. Paraisimonious, inclining to covetousness;
as, a near man.

A near and hard and hocking chapman shall over buy good flesh. Hales (of Eton), Sermon, on 1 Cor. vi. 15. p. 30.

NEAR hand. Closely; without acting or waiting at a distance.

The entering near hand into the manner of performance of that which is under deliberation, hath overturned the opinion of the possibility or impossibility. Bacon, Holy War.

To NEAR*. v. a. [naederen, Teut.] To approach; to be near to.

Give up your key
Unto that lord that nears you.

Heywood, Royal King.
To NEAR*. v. n. To draw near. A naval expression; as, the vessels neared fast,
i. e. drew near to each other.

NEARLY. adv. [from near.]

1. At no great distance; not remotely.

Many are the enemies of the priesthood; they are diligent to observe whatever may nearly or remotely blamish it. Atterbury.

2. Closely; pressingly.

Nearly it now concerns us, to be sure
Of our omnipotence. Milton, P. L.
It concerneth them nearly, to preserve that government which they had trusted with their money.
Swift.

3. In a niggardly manner.

NEARNESS. n. s. [from near.]

1. Closeness; not remoteness; approach.
God, by reason of nearness, forbade them to be like the Canaanites or Egyptians. Hooker.

Delicate sculptures be helped with nearness, and gross with distance; which was well seen in the controversy between Phidias and Alcmenas about the statue of Venus. Wotton.

Those blessed spirits that are in such a nearness to God, may well be all fire and love, but you at such a distance cannot find the effects of it.

Drapp.
The best rule is to be guided by the nearness, or distance at which the repetitions are placed in the original. Pope.

2. Alliance of blood or affection.

Whether there be any secret passages of sympathy between persons of near blood; as, parents, children, brothers and sisters. There be many reports in history, that upon the death of persons of such nearness, men have had an inward feeling of it. Bacon, Nat. Hist.

3. Tendency to avarice; caution of ex-pendence.

It shews in the king a nearness, but yet with a kind of justness. So these little grains of gold and silver, helped not a little to make up the great heap. Bacon, Hen. VII.

NEARLYGHTED.* adj. [near and sight.]
Shortsighted; applied to one who distinguishes objects only which are near.
A common colloquial expression.

NEAT.† n. s. [near, neat, neut, neut, Sax.
naet, Icel. The Scotch use naet and nolt;
and the former is old English also:
"Goodly naet, both fat and bigge with bone," Churchyard's Worth, of Wales, 1578. And so noetherd is in the north of England a noetherd. Naet is used in the Isle of Man.]

1. Black cattle; oxen. It is commonly used collectively.

The steer, the heifer, and the calf,
Are all call'd neat. Shakespeare, Wint. Tale.

neat's tongue, and marbled meat. Bacon, Nat. Hist.

His droves of asses, camels, herds of neat,
And flocks of sheep, grew shortly twice as great.
Saunders.

What care of neat, or sheep is to be had,
I sing, Meccenas. Mary, Virgil.
Some kick'd until they can feel, whether
A shoe be Spanish or neat's leather. Hudibras.
As great a drover, and as great
A critic too, in hog or swine. Hudibras.
Set it in rich mould, with neat's dung and lime. Mortimer.

2. A single cow or ox.

Who both by his calf and his lamb will be known,
May well kill a neat and a sheep of his own.

Thacker.
Go and get me some repeat. —
What say you to a neat's foot? —
'Tis passing good; I pray thee, let me have it.

Shakespeare.
NEAT.† adj. [naet, Su. Goth. nitidus;
net, French; nitidus, Latin.]

1. Elegant, but without dignity.

The thoughts are plain, yet admit a little quickness and passion; the expression humble, yet as pure as the language will afford; neat, but not flowery; easy, and yet lively. Pope.

2. Cleanly.

Herbs and other country messes,
Which the neat-handed Phyllis dresses.

If you were to see her, you would wonder what poor body it was, that was so surprisingly neat and clean. Lamb.

3. Pure; unadulterated; unmingled; now used only in the cant of trade, but formerly more extensive.

Tins of sweet old wines, along the wall
Near and divine drink. Chapman.

When the best of Greece lies down, mixe ever, at our choice,

My good old ardent wine, with small; and our inferior mutes

Drink even that mist wine measured too; thou drinkest without these crutes

Our old wine, neat. Chapman.

NEATHEED. n. s. [neatly, neat, Saxon.] A cowkeeper; one who has the care of black cattle. Bracton, bubulcus.

There nethered, with cur and his horns,

NECESSARIAN. n. s. One of those who are advocates for the doctrine of philosophical necessity. More properly necessitarian. But it is a bad word, and has no useful meaning. Dr. Priestley employs it.

NECESSARIES. n. s. [from necessary.] Things not only convenient but needful; things not to be left out of daily use. Quibus dolet natura negatis.

The supernatural necessities are, the preventing, assisting, and renewing grace of God, which we suppose God ready to accord to the revelation of his will, to the hearts of all that with obedient humble spirits receive and sincerely embrace it.

We are to ask of God such necessities of life as are needful to us, while we live here. Hammond on Fundamentals.

The right a son has, to be maintained and provided with the necessities and conveniences of life, out of his father's stock, gives him a right to succeed to his father's property for his own good. Locke.

NECESSARILY. adv. [from necessary.]

1. Indispensably.

I would know by some special instance, what one article of Christian faith, or what duty required necessarily unto men's salvation there is, which the very reading of the word of God is not apt to notify. Hosier.

Every thing is endowed with such a natural principle, whereby it is necessarily inclined to promote its own preservation and well-being. Wills.

2. By inevitable consequence.

They who recall the church unto that which was at the first, must necessarily set bounds and limits unto their speeches. Hosier.

3. By fate; not freely.

The church is not of such a nature as would necessarily, once begun, preserve itself for ever. Pearson.

They subjected God to the fatal chain of causes, whereas they should have resolved the necessity of all inferior events into the free determination of God himself; who executes necessarily, that which he first proposed freely. South.

NECESSARINESS. n. s. [from necessary.]

The state of being necessary.

NECESSARY. adj. [necessarius, Latin.]

1. Needful; indispensably requisite.

Being it is impossible we should have the same sanctity which is in God; it will be necessary to declare what is this holiness which maketh men to be accounted holy ones, and called saints. Pearson.

All greatness is in virtue understood;

'Tis only necessary to be good. Dryden, Aureng.

A certain kind of temper is necessary to the pleasure and quiet of our minds, consequently to our happiness; and that is holiness and goodness. Tillotson.

The Dutch would go on to challenge the military government and the revenues, and reckon them among what shall be thought necessary for their barrier. Swift.

2. Not free; fatal; impelled by fate.

Death, a necessary end,
Will come, when it will come. Shakespeare.

3. Conclusive; decisive by inevitable consequence.

They resolve us not, what they understand by the consent of the world; whether a literal and formal commandment, or a commandment inferred by any necessary inference. White.

No man can shew by any necessary argument, that it is naturally impossible that all the relations concerning America should be false. Tillotson, Pref.

NECESSARY. n. s. A privy.

The boatmen make use of this part of the beach as a necessary. Scrimshaw, Trav. through Spain, L. 14.

TO NECESSITATE. v. a. [from necessitas, Latin.] To make necessary; not to leave free; to exempt from choice.

Host thou proudly merited the goal thou hast done to the own strength, or impudently sins and follies to the necessitating and inevitable decree of God. Dryden, Rules for Deceit.

The marquis of Newcastle being pressed on both sides, was necessitated to draw all his army into York. Clerendon.

Man seduc'd,
Against his Maker: no decree of mine
Concurring to necessitate his fall. Milton, P. L.

Not our necessitated. Milton, P. L.

Neither the Divine Providence, or his determinations, persuasions, or inflexions of the understanding, or will of rational creatures doth deceive the understanding, or pervert the will, or necessitate, or incline either to any moral evil. Hale.

The politician never thought that he might fall dangerously sick, and that sickness necessitate his removal from the court. South.

The Eternal, when he did the world create
And other agents did necessitate;
So what he order'd they by nature do;
Thus light thinks moan, and heavy downward go,
Man only boasts an arbitrary state. Dryden.

The performance of any person may owe our veneration; his power, our fear; and his authority arising thence, a servile and necessitated obedience; but love can be produced only by kindness. Rogers.

NECESSITATION. n. s. [from necessitate.]

The act of making necessary; fatal compulsion.

This necessity, grounded upon the necessitation of a man's will without his will, is so far from lessening these difficulties which flow from the fatal destiny of the Stoicks, that it increaseth them. Bromhall against Hobbes.

Where the law makes a certain heir, there is a necessitation to one; where the law doth not name a certain heir, there is no necessitation to one, and there they have power or liberty to choose. Bromhall against Hobbes.

NECESSITATED. adj. [from necessity.] In a state of want. Not used.

This ring was mine, and when I gave it Helen, I bade her, if her fortunes ever stood Necessitated to help, that by this token I would relieve her. Shakespeare, All's well.

NECESSITOUS. adj. [necessitosus, French.] Cotgrave.] Pressed with poverty.

They who were envied, found no satisfaction in what they were envied for, being poor and necessitous. Clerendon.

In legal suits, and righting himself on those who, though not perfectly insolvent, are yet very necessitous, a good man will not be hasty in going to extremities. Kettwell.

There are multitudes of necessitous heirs and penurious parents, persons in pinching circumstances, with numerous families of children. Arbutnot.

NECESSITOUSNESS. n. s. [from necessitous.] Poverty; want; need.

Universal peace is demonstration of universal plenty, for where there is want and necessitousness, there will be quarrelling. Burnet, Theory.

NECESSITUDE. n. s. [from necessitudo, Latin.]

1. Want; need.

The mutual necessities of humane nature necessarily maintain mutual offices in kind.

Hale, Orig. of Mankind.

2. Friendship.

NECESSITY. n. s. [necessitas, Lat.]

1. Cogency; compulsion; fatality.

Necessity and chance

Approach not use; and what I will is fate.

Milton, P. L.

Though there be no natural necessity, that such things must be so, and that they cannot possibly be otherwise, without implying a contradiction; yet may they be so certain as not to admit of any reasonable doubt concerning them.

Wilkins.

2. State of being necessary; indispensableness.

Urge the necessity, and state of times.

Shakespeare, Rich. III.

Racine used the chorus in his Esther, but not that he found any necessity of it: it was only to give the ladies an occasion of entertaining the king with vocal music.

Dryden.

We see the necessity of an augmentation, to bring the enemy to reason.

Addison.

3. Want; need; poverty.

The art of our necessities is strange,

That can make vile things precious.

Shakespeare, K. Lear.

The cause of all the distractions in his court or army, proceeded from the extreme poverty, and necessity his country was in.

Clarendon.

We are first to consult our own necessities, but then the necessities of our neighbours have a Christian right to a part of what we have to spare.

L'Estrange.

4. Things necessary for human life.

These should be hours for necessities,

Not for delights; times to repair our nature

With comforting repose, and not for us

To waste these times.

Shakespeare, Hen. VIII.

Great part of the world are free from the necessities of labour and employment, and have their time and fortunes in their own disposal.

Law.

5. Cogency of argument; inevitable consequence.

There never was a man of solid understanding, whose apprehensions are sober, and by a positive inspection advised, but that he hath found, by an irrefragable necessity, one true God and everlasting being.

Raleigh, Hist.

Good-nature, or benevolence and candour, is the product of right reason; which of necessity will give allowance to the fallings of others.

Dryden.

6. Violence; compulsion.

Never shall

Our heads get out; if once within we be,
But stay compell'd by strong necessity.

Chapman.

NECK.† n. s. [Sax. hnecca, necca, collum; feel. hnecke, Su. necke, occiput; ab. Icel. and Sueh. ant. hninga, inclinare, (to bow, to bend.) Serenius.]

The part between the head and body.

He'll best Aufidius' head from his henn's neck.

Shakespeare, Coriol.

And tread upon his neck.

Brown, Vulg. Err.

The length of the face twice exceedeth that of the neck.

His clapp'd her leathern wing against your towers.

Dryden.

And thrust out her long neck, even to your doors.

Dryden.

I look on the tucker to be the ornament and defence of the female neck.

Addison.

2. A long narrow part.

The access of the town was only by a neck of land, between the sea on the one part, and the harbour water on the other.

Bacon.

Thou walk'st as on a narrow mountain's trail,

A dreadful height, with scanty room to tread.

Dryden.

3. On the NECK. Immediately after; from one following another closely.

He depos'd the king,

And, on the neck of that, laid the whole state.

Shakespeare.

The second way to aggregate sin, is by addition of sin to sin, and that is done sneaky ways; first by committing one sin on the neck of another; as David sinned, when he added murder to adultery.

Perkins.

Instantly on the neck of this came news, that Ferdinand and Isabella had concluded a peace.

Dan.

To break the NECK of an affair. To hinder any thing from being done; or, to do more than half.

NECKTIE. n. s. A gorget; hand-

NECKTIE. n. s. A kerchief for a woman's neck.

NECKBEEF. n. s. [neck and beef.] The coarse flesh of the neck of cattle, sold to the poor at a very cheap rate.

They'll sell (as cheap as neckbeef) for counters.

Swift.

NECKCLOTH. n. s. [neck and cloth.] That which men wear on their necks.

Will she with buswife's hand provide thy meat,

And every Sunday more thy neckcloth plait? Gay.

NECKED. adj. [from neck.] Used in composition, figuratively and literally; having a neck.

Stiff-neck'd pride oar art nor force can bend.

The first [horse] —

Dauntless at empty noises, lofty-neck'd.

Dryden, Georg.

NECKLACE. n. s. [neck and lace.] An ornamental string of beads or precious stones, worn by women on their necks.

Ladies, as well then as now, wear statues in their ears.

Both men and women wear turbans, chains, or necklaces of silver and gold set with precious stones.

Arbuthnot on Const.

Or lose a heart, or necklace, as a ball.

Pope.

NECKLACED. adj. [from necklace.] Marked as with a necklace.

The hooded and the necklaced maids.

Sir H. Jones.

NECKLAND. n. s. [neck and land.] A long narrow part of land. See NECK.

Promontories and necklands which butt into the sea, what are they but solid necks?

Hobart on Providence, p. 32.

NECK-VERSE. n. s. The verse which was anciently read to entitle the party to be benefitted of clergy; said to be the beginning of the fifty-first Psalm, "Misereere mei, &c."

They have a sanctuary for thee, to save thee, you and a neck verse, if thou caust read but a lyric lately, thought it be never so surely.

Twiss, Obs. of a Christian Man, fol. 69. a.

If a monk had been taken for stealing of bacon,

For burglary, murder, or rape;

If he could but rehearse, (well prompt), his neck verse,

He never could fall to escape.

Brit. Apollo, (1710), vol. iii. No. 72.

NECKWEED. n. s. [neck and weed.] Hemp; in ridicule.

NECROLOGY. n. s. [necropsy and logy, Gr.; necrologie, Fr.] An account of persons deceased.

NECROMANCY. n. s. [necropsy and mancy, Gr. Sometimes corruptedly written by old authors negeomancy; and thus Cotgrave calls it, in French also, "nigromance, one who practises the black art;" mistakenly alluding to niger, black, as part of the etymology; but it is certainly from necropsy, a dead person.] One who by charms can converse with the ghosts of the dead; a conjurer; an enchanter.

There shall not be found among you — a charmer, or a consulter with familiar spirits, or a wizard, or a necromancer, [to old translations, that seek advice or counsel of the dead, or that seeketh to the dead.]

Deut. xviii. 11.

I am employed like the general who was forced to kill his enemies twice over, whom a necromancer had raised to life.

Swift, Miscell.

NECROMANCY. n. s. [necropsy and mancy; necromance, French.]

1. The art of revealing future events, by communication with the dead.

The resurrection of Samuel is nothing but popular in the practice of necromancy and popular conception of ghosts.

Brown.

2. Enchantment; conjuration.

It was by necromancy,

By carcases and conjuration.

Shelton, Poems, p. 161.

He did it partly by necromancy, wherein he was much skilled.

Abbot, Disc. of the World.

This palace standeth in the air,

By necromancy placed there,

That it no tempests needs to fear.

Dryden.

NECROMANTICAL. adj. [from necro-

NECROMANTIC. adj. mancy. Old in our language; though Dr. Johnson has not noticed either form of this adjective.] Belonging to necromancy; performed by enchantment.

Add by him stanzas that necromantic chaire, In which he makes his diabolical invocations, And bids the fiends that shall obey him fly.

Merry Ditt. of Edmondston, (1617), Prol.

Some necromantic trick.

Hemmond, Works, iv. 506.

His necromantic prophecies.

Sir T. Brown, Miscell. p. 177.

Strange effects performed by necromantic arts.

Hallwell, Melamp. p. 59.

Thy necromantic forms, in vain,

Hunt us on the tented plain.

Warton, Ode 13.

NECROMANTICALLY. adv. [from necro-

NECROMANTICALLY. adv. mancy.] By charms; by conjuration.

Lambs were solemnly burned before it; and then, after some diabolical exorcisms necromantically performed, the head shall prove foul.

Gregory, Pastoral, (1650), p. 199.

NECROMANTICK. n. s. Trick; conjuration.

With all the necromanticks of their art.

NECTAR. n. s. [necropsy, Gr. nectar, Lat. and Fr.] Pleasant liquor, said to be drank by the heathen deities; any pleasant liquor.

What will it be,

When that the watry palate tastes indeed

Love's thrice reputed nectar?

Shakespeare, Tr. and Cren.

Zephyr, in the spring,

Gently distills his nectar-dropping showers.

Dryden, Sonnet.

Thy nectar-dropping mouth, thy sugar'd nose,

More, Cypris's complexion, (1647),

In heaven the trees

Of life ambrosial fruitage bear, and vines

Yield nectar.

Milton, P. L.

Thus having spoke, the nymph the table spread,

Ambrosial cakes with nectar rosy red.

Pope, Odyss.

NECTAR·REAL.* } adj. [from nectar.] Sweet.
NECTAR·BEAN. } as nectar, resembling nectar.

A nectarean, a balsam kiss.

Durton, Annot. of Med. p. 535.

The nectarean fragrance

Hourly there meets

An universal spray of all sweets.

Crashaw, Poems, p. 151.

NECTAR·ED. adj. [from nectar.] Tinged with nectar; mingled with nectar;
abounding with nectar.

He gave her to his daughters to imbibe
In nectar'd lavers, strew'd with asphodel.

Milton, Comus.

How charming is divine philosophy!

Not harsh and crabbed, as dull fools suppose,

But musical as is Apollo's lute,

And a perpetual feast of nectar'd sweets,

Where no crude vulgar folly

He with the Nais went to dwell,

Leaving the nectar'd fountains of Jove.

Festus.

NECTAR·EUS. adj. [nectareus, Lat.] Resembling nectar; sweet as nectar.

Annual for me, the grape, the rose renew,

The juice nectareous and the balmy dew.

Pope.

NECTARINE.† adj. [nectarin, French, Cot-grave.] Sweet as nectar.

To their supper-fruits they fell,

Nectarine fruits.

Milton, P. L.

NECTARINE. n. s. [nectarine, Fr.] A fruit of the plum kind.

This fruit differs from a peach in having a smooth rind and the flesh firmer.

Miller.

The only nectaries are the mummy and the French; of the last there are two sorts, one, which is the best, very round, and the other somewhat long; of the mummy there are several sorts.

Temple.

TO NECTARIZE. v. a. [from nectar.] To sweeten. Not in use.

Cockeram.

NECTAROUS.* adj. [from nectar.] Sweet as nectar.

Nectarous draughts between from milky stream,
Berry, or grape.

Milton, P. L.

NEEDER.* n. s. An adder: a word yet used in Derbyshire. [nadr, Goth.
nebbep, Sax.]

Anon the needers gan her to sting.

Chaucer, Leg. of Good Women.

NEED.† n. s. [need, Sax. naith, M. Goth.
nauf, Icel. necessitat; neida, cogere,
(to compel), ab antiquiss. na, con, prope.
Serenius.]

1. Exigency; pressing difficulty; necessity.

The very stream of his life, and the business he hath belimed, must, upon a warranted need, give him a better proclamation.

Shakespeare, Meas. for Meas.

That spirit that first rush'd in on thee,

In the camp of Dan,

Be efficacious in this now at need.

Milton, S. A.

In thy native innocence proceed,

And summon all thy reason at thy need.

Dryden.

2. Want; distrestful poverty.

Famine is in thy cheeks;

Need and oppression stare within thine eyes,

Contempt and beggary hang upon thy back.

Shakespeare,

Defer not to give to him that is in need.

The distant heard, by fume, her pious deeds;

And laid her by their extreme needs;

A fable cordial for a fainting mind.

Dryden.

God sometimes calls upon thee to relieve the needs of thy brother, sometimes the necessities of thy country, and sometimes the urgent wants of thy prince.

South,

3. Want; lack of any thing for use.

God grant we never may have need of you.

Shakespeare.

God, who sees all things intuitively, neither stands in need of logic, nor uses it.

Baker.

TO NEED. v. a. [from the noun.] To want;
to lack; to be in want of; to require.

Esset, langar.

Are in the poorest thing superfluous;

Allow not nature more than nature needs.

Man's life is cheap as beasts'. Shakspeare, K. Lear.

The whole need not a physician, but the sick.

St. Matthew.

Thou thy regal sceptre shalt lay by.

For regal sceptre then no more shall need.

Milton.

To ask whether the will has freedom? is to ask, whether one power has another? A question too abourd to need an answer.

Locke.

TO NEED. v. n.

1. To be wanted; to be necessary.

More ample spirit than hitherto was wont,

Here needs me the whilst the famous ancestors

Of my most dreadful sovereign I recount.

Synar.

When we have done it, we have done it all that is in our power, and all that needs.

Locke.

2. To have necessity of any thing; to be in want of any thing.

We have instances of perception whilst we are asleep; but how incoherent and how little conformable to the perfection of a rational being, those who are acquainted with dreams need not be told.

Locke.

He that would discourse of things, as they agree in the complex idea of extension and solidity, needed but use the word body.

Locke.

NEEDER. n. s. [from need.] One that wants any thing.

If the time thrust forth

A cause for thy repeal, we shall not wend

O'er the vast world, to seek a single man;

And lose advantage, which doth ever cool

In th' absence of the needer.

Shakespeare, Coriol.

NEEDFUL.† adj. [need and full.]

1. Distressed; in want. This is the primary sense, but not noticed by Dr. Johnson.

He nought helpeth needful in their needs.

Chaucer, Man of Lawes Tale.

Why standest thou so far off, O Lord, and hidest thy face in the needful time of trouble.

Psalm x. 1. Common Pr.

2. Necessary; indispensably requisite.

Give us all things that be needful, both for our souls and bodies.

Common Prayer.

Do you consent we shall acquaint him with it,
As needful in our loves, fitting our duty?

Shakespeare, Hamlet.

All things needful for defence abroad,

Munitions, and brave Sereniths walk the road.

Dryden.

To my present purpose it is not needful to use arguments, to evince the world to be finite.

Locke.

A lonely desert and an empty land,

Shall scarce afford, for needful hours of rest,

A single house to their benighted guest.

Addison on Italy.

NEEDFULLY.† adv. [from needful.] Necessarily.

They who

Dare for three poems, yet both ask and read,

And like them too; must needfully, though few,
Be of the best.

B. Jonson.

NEEDFULNESS. n. s. [from needful.] Necessity.

NEEDILY.† adv. [from needy.] In poverty;
poorly.

NEEDINESS. n. s. [from needy.] Want;
poverty.

Therewith men have many reasons to persuade;
to use them all at once, weakeneth them.

For it
argueth a neediness in every of the reasons, as if one did not trust to any of them, but fled from one to another.

Bacon.

NEEDLE.† n. s. [Goth. nehal; Saxou nehl; Icel. nael; at Teut. nefen, suere.
Wachter and Serenius.]

1. A small instrument pointed at one end to pierce cloth; and perforated at the other to receive the thread, used in sewing.

For him you waste in tears your widow'd hours,
For him your curious needle paints the flowers.

Dryden.

The most curious works of art, the sharpest finest needle, doth appear as a blunt rough bar of iron coming from the furnace of the forge.

Wilmot.

2. The small steel bar which in the mariner's compass stands regularly north and south.

Go bid the needle its dear north forsake,

To which with trembling reverence it doth bend.

Conity.

The use of the loadstone, and the mariner's needle was not then known.

Burnet, Theology.

NEEDLE-FISH. n. s. [below; and needle
fish.] A kind of sea-fish.

One rhomboidal bony scale of the needle fish.

Woodward.

NEEDLEFUL. n. s. [needle and full.] As much thread as is generally put at one time in the needle.

NEEDLER. n. s. [from needle.] He

NEEDLE-MAKER. n. s. [from needle.] He NEEDLE-WORK. n. s. [needle and work.]

1. The business of a sempstress.

2. Embroidery by the needle.

In needle-works and embroideries, it is more pleasing to have a lively work upon a lightness ground, than a dark and melancholy work upon a lightness ground.

Bacon.

In a curious trade of needle-work, one colour falls away by such just degrees, and another rises so insensibly, that we see the variety without being able to distinguish the total vanishing of the one from the first appearance of the other.

Addison.

NEEDLESS. adj. [from need.]

1. Unnecessary; not requisite.

Their exception against emines, as if that did nurish ignorance, procureth altogether of a needless jealousy.

Hooker.

This sudden stab of need I misdo not;

Pray God, I say, I prove a needless coward.

Shakespeare, Rich. III.

Would not these be great and needless abate-ments of their happiness, if it were confined within the compass of this life only?

Astbury.

Money we either lock up in chests, or waste it in needless and ridiculous expenses upon ourselves, whilst the poor and the distressed want it for necessary uses.

Lar.

2. Not wanting; out of use.

For his weeping in the nocturnal stream,

Poor dear, quoth he, thou mak'st a testament,

As worldlings do, giving thy sum of more

To that which had too much.

Shakespeare, As you like it.

NEEDLESSLY.† adv. [from needless.] Unnecessarily; without need.

The consequences whereof have been to render languages more difficult to be learnt, and needlessly to advance orthography into a troublesome and laborious art.

Holzer, Elem. of Speech, Pref.

NEEDLESSNESS. n. s. [from needless.] Un-necessariness.

To explain St. Paul's epistles, after so great a train of expositors, might seem censurable for its needlessness; but not so daily examples of pious and learned men justify it.

Locke.

NEEDMENT. n. s. [from need.] Something necessary.

Behind
His scrip did hang, in which his needments he did bind.
Spenser, F. Q.

NEEDS. adv. [nebe, Saxon, unwilling, Dr. Johnson.—It is merely need it, used parenthetically. Mr. H. Tooke.] Necessarily; by compulsion; indispensably.

The general and perpetual voice of men is as the sentence of God himself; for that which all men have at all times learned, nature herself must needs have taught.
Hooker.

God must needs have done the thing which they imagine was to be done.
Hooker.
I must needs after him, madam, with my letter.

Another being elected and his ambassadors returned, he would needs know the cause of his repulse.
Dumas.

I perceive
Thy mortal sight to fall: objects divine
Must needs impair, and weary, human sense.
Milton, P. L.

To say the principles of nature must needs be such as philosophy makes them, is to set bounds to omnipotence.
Clement.

A trial at law must needs be innocent in itself, when nothing else corrupts it; because it is a thing which we cannot but want, and there is no living in this world without it.
Katcliffe.

I have affairs before
Which I must needs dispatch before I go.
Dryden.

NEEDY. adj. [from need.] Poor; necessitous; distressed by poverty.

Their gates to all were open evermore,
And all sat waiting ever them before,
To call in comers by, that needy were and poor.
Spenser.

—In his needy shop a tortoise hung,
An alligator stuff'd, and other skins
Of ill-clipp'd fishes. Shakespeare, Rom. & Jul.
The poor and needy praise thy name.
Psalm lxxv. 21.

We bring into the world a poor needy uncertain life, short at the longest, and unquiet at the best.
Temple.

Being put to right himself upon the needy, he will look upon it as a call from God to charity.
Arctur.

Nuptials of form, of interest, or of state,
Those seeds of pride are fruitful in debate:
Let happy men for generous love declare,
And choose the needy virgin, chaste and fair.
Greenville.

To relieve the needy, and comfort the afflicted,
are duties that fall in our way every day.
Addison, Spect.

NEED. n. s. [neel, Icel. nael, Dan.] A needle. Wentworth also need and need.

Those and ill lucke together —
Have sticke away my dear neede.
Comedy of Gam. Gurneo's Needle, (1551.)

She with her need compendious
Nature's own shape, of bud, bird, branch, or berry.
Shakespeare, Pericles, (1007.)

They thimble into armed gauntlets change,
They needs to lancee. Shakespeare, K. John.

For thee fit weapons were Thy need and spindle, not a sword and spear.
Purvis, Tuss. ss. 95.

NEER. [for never.]
It appears I am no horse,
That I can argue and discourse;
Have but two legs, and ne'er a tail. Andrus.

NEARE. n. s. [niere, Teut.] The kidney. Craven Diablot. It is in our old vocabularies, and is now also a Cheshire word. Wierbrahm's Chesh. Gloss.

To NEESE.† v. n. [niezen, Saxon; niezen, vol. II.]

Teut. niezen, German; from neze, the nose.] To sneeze; to discharge flatulencies by the nose. Used in Scotland, and in the north of England.

He went up and stretched himself upon him;
and the child sneezed seven times, and opened his eyes.
2 Kings, iv. 35.

The whole quire hold their hips, and loffe;
And waken to their mirth, and new and swear
A merrier hour was never wasted there.
Shakespeare, Midw. N. Dream.

How apt our nature is to catch and propagate the infection of a superstitious tradition, may appear from that ancient and honest usage of praying for a person upon neezing, the vulgar proverb consequent to the approach of any strange fish to our shores, the regarding of any casual spots and breeches in any known rivers, any odd noises, &c. Spenser on Prodigies, p. 61.

NEE'SING. n. s. [from neez.] The act of sneezing; stertutation.

By his sneezings a light doth shine, and his eyes are like the eye-light of the morning. Job, xli. 18.
You summer neezings when the sun is set,
That fill the air with a quick fading fire,
Cease from your flashings!
Moss, Philist. Poems, (1647,) p. 523.

NEE-SWORT. n. s. An herb. Sherwood.
NEF. n. s. [old French; from nave.] The body of a church; the nave.

The church of St. Justina, by Palladio, is the most handsome, luminous, discovered building in Italy. The long nef consists of a row of five cupolas, the cross one has on each side a single cupola deeper than the others. Addison.

NEFA'ND. } adj. [nefandus, Latin.] Not
NEFA'NDUS. } to be named; abominable.

Knowing what nefand abominations are practised.
Sheldon, Mirror of Antiquity, (1616,) p. 198.

The press restrain'd! nefandous thought!
In vain our sires have nobly fought!
Green's Poem of the System, (1754,) p. 23.

NEFA'RIOUS. adj. [nefarius, Latin.] Wicked; abominable.

The most nefarious bastards, are they whom the law stiles incestuous bastards, they are begotten between ascendants and descendants, and between consanguines, as far as the divine prohibition extends.
Asiatick, Parergon.

NEFA'RIOUSLY. adv. [from nefarius.] Abominably; wickedly.

That unhallo'd villany nefariously attempted upon the person of our agent.
Milton, Letters of State.

NEGATION. n. s. [negatio, Lat. negation, French.]

1. Denial: the contrary to affirmation.
Our assertions and negations should be yes and nay, for whatsoever is more than these is sin.
Rogers.

2. Description by denial, or exclusion, or exception.

Negation is the absence of that which does not naturally belong to the thing we are speaking of, or which has no right, obligation, or necessity to be present with it; as when we say a stone is inanimate, or blind, or deaf.
Watts, Logic.

Chance signifies, that all events called casual, among inanimate bodies, are mechanically and naturally produced according to the determinate figures, textures, and motions of those bodies, with this negation, that these inanimate bodies are not conscious of their own operations. Bradley.

3. Argument drawn from denial.

It may be proved in the way of negation, that they came not from Europe, as having no remainder of the arts, learning, and civilities of it.
Hygin.

NEGATIVE.† adj. [negativ, Fr. negation, Latin.]

1. Denying; contrary to affirmative.
If thou wilt confess,
Or else be impudently negative,
To have nor eyes, nor ears, nor thought.
Shakespeare, Wint. Tale.

2. Implying only the absence of something; not positive; privative.

There is another way of denying Christ with our mouths which is negative, when we do not acknowledge and confess him. South.
Consider the necessary connection that is between the negative and positive part of our duty.
Tilston.

3. Having the power to withhold, though not to compel.

Denying me any power of a negative voice as King, they are not ashamed to seek to deprive me of the liberty of using my reason with a good conscience.
King Charles.

NEGATIVE. n. s.

1. A proposition by which something is denied.

Of negatives we have the least certainty; they are usually hardest, and many times impossible to be proved.
Tilston.

2. A particle of denial; no, not.

A pure substance is a deus,
But by a heap of negatives combin'd;
Ask what a spirit is, you'll hear them cry,
It hath no matter, no mortality. Claaveland.

To NEGATIVE.† v. a. [from the noun.] To dismiss by negation.

The proposal was negated by a small majority.
Andrews, Account, p. 169.

NEGATIVELY. adv. [from negative.]

1. With denial; in the form of denial; not affirmatively.

If he neglect to hear them, tell us onto the church.
This my long suffering and my day of grace,
Those who neglect and scorn shall never taste.
Milton, P. L.

3. To postpone.

I have been long a sleeper; but I trust
My absence doth neglect no great design,
Which by my presence might have been concluded. Shakespeare.

NEGLECT. n. s. [neglectus, Lat.]

1. Instance of inattention.

2. Careless treatment; scornful inattention.

I have perceived a most faint neglect of late,
which I have rather blamed as my own jealous 57 curiosity, than as a very pretence or purpose of unkindness. Shakspeare, K. Lear.

3. Negligence: frequency of neglect.

Age breeds neglect in all, and actions

Remote in time, like objects remote in place,

Are not behold at half their greatness. Dowdell.

4. State of being unregarded.

Rescue my poor remains from vile neglect,

With virgin honours let my horse be deck'd,

And decent emblems. Prior.

and red, fringed and dressed in a negligee made by a Yorkshire mantua-maker. Gray, Lett.

NEGLECTANCE.† n. s. [negligence, Fr.

negligentia, Latin.]

1. Habit of omitting by heedlessness, or of acting carelessly.

By a thorough contempt of little excellencies, he is perfectly master of them. This temper of mind leaves him under no necessity of studying his air; and he has this peculiar distinction, that his negligence is unaffected. Spectator, No. 75.

2. Instance of neglect.

She let it drop by negligence;

And, to the advantage, I being here, took't up.

Shakspeare.

NEGLECTANT. adj. [negligent, Fr. negligentia, Lat.]

And be thou negligent of fame;

With every muse to grace thy song,

May'st thou despise a poet's name. Swift, Miscell.

NEGLECTIVELY. adv. [from negligent.]

1. Carelessly; heedlessly; without exact-ness.

Insects have voluntary motion, and therefore imagination; and whereas some of the ancients have said that their motion is indeterminate, and their imagination indefinite, it is negligently observed; for ants go right forwards to their hills, and bees know the way to their hives.

Bacon, Nat. Hist.

Of all our older plays,

This and Philaster have the loudest fame;

Great are their faults, and glorious in excess.

In both our English genius is expressed.

Lofly and bold, but negligently drest. Waller.

In comely figure rang'd my jewels shone,

Or negligently plac'd for thee alone. Prior.

2. With scornful inattention.

negotiate with my face? Shakspeare, Tw. Night.

She was a busy negotiating woman, and in her withdrawing chamber had the fortunate conspiracies for the king against king Richard been hatched. Bacon, Hen. VII.

It is a common error in negotiating; whereas men have many reasons to persuade, they strive to use them all at once, which weakens them.

Bacon.

They that received the talents to negotiate with,

did all of them, except one, make profit of them.

Hammond.

A steward to embroil those goods he undertakes to manage; an ambassador to betray his price for whom he should negotiate; are crimes that double their malignity from the quality of the actors. Deacy of Chr. Party.

I can discover none of these intercourses and negotiations, unless that Luther negotiated with a black boot. Atterbury.

TO NEGOTIATE.† v. a. To manage; to conclude by treaty or agreement.

to negotiate, at leisure, their intended separation.

Ld. Chesterfield.

NEGOTIATION. n. s. [negociation, Fr. from negotiate.] Treaty of business, whether public or private.

Oil is slow, smooth, and solid; so are Spaniards observed to be in their motion: though it be a question yet unresolved, whether their affected gravity and slowness in their negotiations have tended more to their prejudice or advantage.

Howard.

They ceased not from all worldly labour and negotiation. White.

NEGOTIATOR. n. s. [negociateur, Fr. from negotiate.] One employed to treat with others.

Those who have defended the proceedings of our negotiators at Gertuydenberg, dwell much upon their zeal in endeavouring to work the French up to their demands; but say nothing to justify those demands. Swift.

negotium, Lat.] To utter the voice of a horse or mare.

Note a wild and wanton heard,

Or race of youthful and unhandled colts,

Fetching mad bounds, bellowing and neighing

loud. Shakspeare.

They were as fed horses, every one neighed.

Jerr. v. 8.

The generous horse, that nobly wild,

Neighs on the hills, and dares the angry lion.

Smith.

NEIGH. n. s. [from the verb.] The voice of an horse.

It is the prince of palfreys; his neigh is like the bidding of a monarch, and his countenance enforces homage. Shakspeare.

NEIGHING.† n. s. [from neigh.] The voice

of a horse or mare.

The snorting of his horses was heard from Dan:

the whole land trembled at the sound of the neigh-

Still neighing fill the neighbouring valleys.

Dryden.

NEIGHBOUR.† n. s. [neighbour, neibour,

Saxon; from neih, near, and gebur,

an inhabitant.]

Milton, Obsequy on the Articles of Peace.

NEIGHBOURSHIP.* n. s. [from neighbour.] State of being near each other.

How happy are the dead, who quietly rest Beneath these stones! each by his kindred laid, Still in a hallow'd neighbourhood with those, Who when alive his social converse shar'd.

Mrs. Butler, Series of Plays on the Passions, (1796.)

NEITHER.* conjunct. [напоё, наёте, Sax. neither.]

1. Not either. A particle used in the first branch of a negative sentence, and answered by nor. Dr. Johnson. — Improperly used when more than two things come under consideration: as where Addison uses "determined in his conduct neither by the dictates of his own conscience, the suggestions of true honour, nor the principles of religion," he should have either left out "the suggestions of true honour," or he should have said, "is not determined by the dictates of his own conscience, the suggestions of true honour, or the principles of religion." Bp. Hurd.

He was neither there here, But came out of himself away, Thus he 's 'ot to think or say.

Fight neither with small nor great, save only with the king. 1 Kings, xxi. 31.

Mex lived at home, neither intent upon any foreign merchandise, nor inquietudes after the lives and fortunes of their neighbours. Heylin.

NE-NUPHAR.* n. s. [nymphæa, Lat.] Water lily, or water rose.

NEOLO-GICAL.* adj. [neologisme, French.] Employing new words or phrases.

Such examples really make one tremble; and will, I am convinced, determine my fair friends, subjects and their adherents to adopt, and scrupulously conform to, [Dr.] Johnson's rules of true orthography by book. In return to this concession, I seriously advise him to publish, by way of appendix to his great work, a pointed neologism dictionary, containing those polle, though perhaps not strictly grammatical, words and phrases, commonly used, and sometimes understood, by the beau monde. Ld. Chesterfield, World, No. 101.

NEOLOGY.* n. s. [neologie, Fr. from the Greek νέος, new, and λόγος, a word, discourse.] Invention or use of new words and phrases.

They endeavour by a sort of neology of their own to confound all ideas of right and wrong. Boothby on Burke, p. 166.

NEO-LOGISM.* n. s. [neologisme, Fr.] A new and quaint expression.

NEOPHYTE.* n. s. [neophyte, Fr. νέος, and φύς.] One regenerated; a convert; one entered into a new state.

In effects of grace, which exceed far the effects of nature, we see St. Paul makes a difference between those he calls neophytes, that is newly grafted into Christianity; and those that are brought up in the faith. Bacon, Spr. on the Union of Laws.

He tells thee true, my noble neophyte; my little grammaticaster, he does. B. Jonson, Portaster.

NEOPHYTE.* adj. Newly entered into an employment.

It is with your young grammatical courier, as with your neophyte player, a thing usual to be daunted at the first presence or interview. B. Jonson, Cynthia Revels.

NEOTE-RICK.* n. s. [neotericus, Latin, from νέος, new, Gr. νεώτερος, more recent.] One of modern times.

I refer you to the voluminous tomes of Gale, Aretius, Rhinot, &c. and those exact neotericks, Savonarola, Capricornio, Domastus.

Burton, Ann. of Mel. p. 7.

The students in that profession [divinity] should apply themselves in the first place to the reading of the Scriptures, next the counsels and ancient fathers, and then the schoolmen; excluding those neotericks, both Jesuits and Puritans, who are known to be meddlers in matters of state and monachy.

The King's List to Fier-Ch. of Off. (1699.) A Word, &c. We are not to be guided either by the misreports of some ancient, or the capricious of one or two neotericks. Grey.

NEOTE'RICAL.* adj. Modern; novel;
NEOTE'RI'CK. late.

They were the inventions of men, which lived in diverse ages, and had also diverse ends, some being ancient, others antierical.

Bacon, Pref. to Wisdom of the Ancients.

I advise you not to neglect old authors; for though we be come as far for the meridian of truth, yet there be many antierical commentators, and self-conceited writers, that eclipse her in many things, and go from "obscure" to "obscure."

Huvellet, Lett. iv. 51.

NER.† n. s. [nepeta, Lat.] The herb catmint.

The dog when he is stomach-ick can go right to his proper grass, the cat to her nerp, the goat to his hemlock.

Sp. Hall, Select Thoughts, § 51.

NERP'NTH.† n. s. [Gr. νη, and νηθη; Fr. nepenthé.] A drug that drives away all pains.

Not that Nepenthes, which the wife of Thone in Egypt gave to Jove-born Helenus, Is of such power to stir up joy as this.

Milton, Comus.

There where no passion, pride, or shame trans-ports,

Lull'd with the sweet nepenthe of a court;
There where no fathers, brothers, friends disgrace,
Once break their rest nor stir them from their place.

Pope.

NEP'HEW. n. s. [nepos, Latin; neveu, French.]

1. The son of a brother or sister.

Immortal offspring of my brother Jove;
My brightest nephew and whom best I love.

Dryden.

I ask, whether in the inheriting of this paternal power, the grandson by a daughter, hath a right before a nephew by a brother?

Locke.

2. The grandson. Out of use.

With what intent they were first published, those words of the nepheus of Jesus do plainly signify, after that my grandfather Jesus had given himself to the reading of the law and the prophets, and other books of our fathers, and had gotten therein sufficient judgment, he proposed also to write something pertaining to learning and wisdom.

Hosier.

Her sire at length is kind,
Prepares his empire for his daughter's ease,
And for his hatching nepheus smooths the seas.

Dryden.

3. Descendant, however distant. Out of use.

All the sons of those five brethren reign'd
By dust success, and all their nephews late,
Even thrice eleven descends the crown retain'd.

Spenser.

NEPHE'RI'CAL.† adj. [nepherus; nephe-ri-nerick.] late, Fr.

1. Belonging to the organs of urine.

Mr. Harrison hath been of late somewhat more than heretofore troubled with certain nepherical flux; but some samples I have seen of it that are variegated with white, black, and sometimes yellow.

Woodward.

A very valuable medicine, and of great account in diverse cases, particularly asthma, nepherick pains, nervous colicks, and obstructions.

Sp. Berkeley, Surg. § 62.

The diet of nepherick persons ought to be opposite to the alkaliescent nature of the salts in their blood.

Arbutnot.

3. Good against the stone.

The nepherick stone is commonly of a uniform dusky green; but some samples I have seen of it that are variegated with white, black, and sometimes yellow.

Woodward.

NEP'OTISM. n. s. [nepotisme, Fr.; nepos, Latin.] Fondness for nephews.

To this humour of nepotism Rome owes its present splendour; for it would have been impossible to have furnished out so many glorious palaces with such a profusion of pictures and statues, had not the riches of the people fallen into different families.

Addison on Italy.

NE'REID.* n. s. [Nereis, Lat.; pl. Nereides, daughters of Nereus.] A sea-nymph.

Her goddesswomen, like the Nereids,
So many mermaids, tended her the eyes,
And made their beads adorning,

Shakespeare, Ant. and Cleop.

NERVE.† n. s. [nervus, Latin; nerf, Fr.]

1. The organs of sensation passing from the brain to all parts of the body.

The nervus do ordinarily accompany the arteries through all the body; they have also blood vessels, as the other parts of the body. Wherever any nervus sends out a branch, or receives one from another, or where two nervi join together, there is generally a ganglion or plexus.

Quincy.

What man dare I dare!
Approach thou like the rugged Russian bear;
Take any shape but that, and my firm nervi
Shall never tremble.

Shakespeare, Macbeth.

2. It is used by the poets for sinew or tendon.

If equal power

Thou wouldst inflame, amidst my nervi, as then
I could encounter with three hundred men.

Chapman.

Strong Tharyamed discharged a speeding bow
Full on his neck, and cut the nervi in two.

Pope, Odys.

3. Force; strength.

The nervus and emphasis of the verb will lie in the preposition.

Alp. Sancti, Sermon. p. 20.

TO NERVE.* v. a. [from the noun.] To strengthen.

Thou, last,

Tremendous goddess, nerve this lifted arm!

Keats, Hyperion.

NE'VELES.† adj. [from nervus.] Without strength.

There sunk Thalia, nevelous, faint and dead,
Had not her sister Sotire held her hand.

Pope, Dunciad.

O'er all profound dejection sat,
And nevelous face.

Thomson, Liberty, P. iii.

The western equinox, in its turn, approaches nevelous and effeminate, frigid or insipid, to the hardy and inflamed imaginations of the east.

Warburton, Doct. of Grace, p. 71.

NE'V'OUS.† adj. [nervosus, Latin.]

1. Full of nerves.

The body of this fish is three yards long, and one yard broad, thick skinned, without scales, narrow towards the tail, which is nervous, slow in swimming, wanting fins.

Sir T. Herbert, Trac. p. 26.

We may imagine what acerbity of pain must be endured by our Lord — by the piercing his hands and feet, parts very nervous, and exquisitely sensible.

Barrow, vol. 1. S. 32.

2. Wellstrung; strong; vigorous.

As "sine nervis esse" is a phrase for delicacy, so to be nervous, is taken to be valid and strong.

Walterton on Fortescue, (1665), p. 197.

What nervous arms he boasts, how firm his bow,
His limbs how turn'd.

Pope, Odys.

3. Relating to the nerves; having the seat in the nerves.

The vocal torrent, morn'ring from afar,
Whisper'd no peace to call this nervous ear;
And Philomel, the siren of the plains,
Sang soporific unious in vain.

Heric.

4. [In medical cant.] Having weak or diseased nerves.

Poor, weak, nervous creatures. Chapman.
NE'RVU'S.* adv. [from nervus.] With strength; with force.

He thus nervously describes the strength of custom.

Warton, Hist. E. F. IV. 66.

NE'RVU'ENES.* n. s. [from nervous.]

Vigour; strength.
If there had been epithets joined with the other substantives, it would have weakened the nervousness of the sentence.

Dr. Warton, Ess. on Pope.

NE'RVY. adj. [from nervus.] Strong; vigorous. Not in use.

Death, that dark spirit, in his nervy arm doth lie,

Which being advanced, declines, and then men die.

Shakespeare.

NE'SCIENCE.* n. s. [from nescio, Latin.]

Ignorance; the state of not knowing.

Not visible ignorance, or of things he might know, but invincible; not privative ignorance, or of things he ought to know, but were nescience; in brief, ignorance; — simple ignorance, and not sinful ignorance.

Wells, Life of Chr. (1616), sign. B. 4.

God fedeth it about for me, in that absence and nescience of mine.

Sp. Hall, Spectacles of his Life.

Many of the most accomplished wits of all ages, have received their knowledge into Socrates his sum total, and after all their pains in quest of science, have sat down in a professed nescience.

Glanville, Scipio.

NESH.† adj. [nerc, Sax.] Soft; tender; easily hurt. Skinner. The word is used in several parts of England.

Sometimes with the pronunciation nasht or nash; and it is old in our language.

For love his herte is tendre and nesh.

Chaucer, Court of Love.

The nash tops of the young hanel.

Croce, Leveson Hill.

TO NESHT.* v. a. To render weak; to soften injuriously. Not in use.

I counsel you to eat and drink temperately; nash not your wound by drinking immoderately.

Old Penn in Ashmole's Pharm. Chem. (1654), p. 113.

NES.

1. A termination added to an adjective to change it into a substantive, denoting state or quality; as, poisonous, poisonousness; turbid, turbidness; lovely, loveliness; from nirre, Saxon.

2. The termination of many names of places where there is a headland or promontory; from nere, Saxon; a nose of land, or headland.

NEST.† n. s. [neft, Saxon; the past participle of nefan, to visit frequently, to haunt. Mr. H. Tooke, Div. of Purl. ii. 375. See Guth. naeste.]

1. The bed formed by the bird for incubation and feeding her young.

If a bird's nest chance to be before thee in the way, thou shalt not take the dam with the young.

Dante, xiii. 6.

The example of the heavenly lark,
Thy low poct, Cowley, mark,
Above the skies let thy proud music sound,
Thy busie nest build on the ground.

Cowley.

2. Any place where animals are produced.

Redi found that all kinds of putrefaction did only afford a nest and aliment for the eggs and young of those insects he admitted.

Huxley.

3. An abode; place of residence; a receptacle. Generally in a bad sense: as, a nest of rogues and thieves.

Not farre away, not meets for any guest,
They peep a little cottage, like some poor man's nest.

Come from that nest
Of death, contagion, and unnatural sleep.

4. A warm close habitation, generally in contempt.

Some of our ministers having livings offered unto them, will neither, for sale of religion, nor winning souls to God, be drawn forth from their warm nests.

5. Boxes or drawers; little pockets or repositories.

To NEST.† v. n. [from the noun.] To build nests.

This poor dove, being driven thence away by that horrible northern wind, which rased at length the dove-house and the city, did she not nest, and as it were hide her head, in secret holes?

Harnar, Tr. of Ben. (1587), p. 279.
The cedar stretched his branches as far as the mountains of the moon, and the king of birds nested within his leaves.

NĀSTROG. n. s. [nest and egg.] An egg left in the nest to keep the hen from forsaking it.

Books and money laid for shew,
Like nestings, to make clients lay.

To NESTLE.† v. n. [nestling, Saxon.] To settle; to harbour; to lie close and snug, as a bird in her nest.

Their purpose was, to fortify in some strong place of the wild country, and there nestle till succours came.

straw among the horses.

The king's fisher wents commonly by the water-side, and nestles in hollow banks.

Fluttering there, they nestle near the throne,
And lodge in habitations not their own.

The floor is strowed with several plants,
among which the snails nestle all the winter.

Mark where the shy directors creep,
Nor to the shore approach too nigh;

The monsters nestle in the deep,
To misse you in your passing by.

To NESTLE. v. a. To house, as in a nest.

Thou labour'st yet to nestle thee,
Thou think'st by how'ring here to get a part,
In a forbidden or forbidding tree.

Cupid found a drowsy bed,
And nestled in his little head.

2. To cherish, as a bird her young.

This Ithacus, so highly in endear'd
To this Minerva, that her hand is ever in his deeds:

She, like his mother, nestles him.

NĀSTLING.† n. s. [nestling, Saxon.]

1. A young bird in the nest: in some parts, the smallest bird of the nest, and called also nestlecock.

Second brothers, and poor nestlings.

The chief object of children, looking after nests is the eggs, or nestlings, not the bird which lays them.

2. A receptacle; a nest. Not in use.

They [the physicians] inquire not of the diversities of the parts, the accidents of the passages, and the seats or nestlings of the humours.

NĀSTLING.* adj. Newly hatched; newly deposited in the nest.

I have taken four young ones from a hen skylark, and placed in their room five nestling nightingales, as well as five wrens, the greater part of which were reared by the foster-parent.

NET.† n. s. [nati, Goth. net, Icel. net, Sax. from the Germ. neten, veret. Se-reniusus.]

1. A texture woven with large interstices or meshes, used commonly as a snare for animals.

Poor bird! thou'dst never feel the net, nor lime,
The pitfall nor the gin.

Impastious intrigues us like the flustering of a bird in a net, but cannot at all ease our trouble.

2. Anything made with interstitial vacuities.

He made nets of chequered work for the claspings, upon the top of the pillars.

The vegetative tribes,
Wrapt in a filmy net, and clad with leaves.

To NET.* v. n. [from the noun.] To knit a net; to knot.

Ideal visits I often pay you, see you posting round your tyrannic walks or sitting writing in your parlour, and thinking of your absent friends.

NET.* adj. [net, French; netto, Ital.]

1. Pure; clear; genuine.

Her breast all naked, as nett ivory
Without adorne of gold or silver bright
Wherewith the craftsman wouns its beauty,
Of her dew honour was depoynted quight.

2. Clear; denoting the total of a receipt of salary or income after certain deductions.

The net revenues of the crown, at the abdication of K. James, without any tax on land, &c.
amounted to somewhat more than two millions.

3. Clear; denoting the weight of any commodity, after allowances have been made for tare and tret.

To NET.* v. a. [from the adjective.] To bring as clear produce.

NĒTHER. adj. [neother, Saxon; neder, Dutch. It has the form of a comparative, but is never used in expressed, but only in implied comparison; for we say the nether part, but never say this part is nether than that, nor is any positive in use, though it seems comprised in the word beneath. Nether is not now much in use.]

1. Lower; not upper.

No man shall take the nether or the upper millstone to pledge; for he taketh a man's life to pledge.

In his picture are two principal errors, the one in the complexion and hair, the other in the mouth, which commonly they draw with a full and nether good lip.

This odious offspring,
Thine own begotten, breaking violent way
Through my entrails; that with fear and pain
Distorted, all my nether shape thus grew

The upper part whereof was whey,
The nether, orange mix'd with grey,

A beauteous maid show, but magic arts,
With barking dogs deform'd her nether parts.

As if great Atlas from his height
Should sink beneath his heavenly weight,
And with a mighty flaw the flaming wall
Should gape immense, and rushing down o'erwhelm this nether ball.

Two poles turn round the globe;
The first abides in heaven, the last is whirld
Below the regions of the nether world.

2. Being in a lower place.

This shows you are above,
You justices, that these our nether crimes
So speedily can revenge.

Two numbers were those bad angels, seem Hovering on wing under the cope of hell,
'Twixt upper, nether, and surrounding fires.

3. Infernal; belonging to the regions below.

No less desire
To found this nether empire, which might rise,
In emulation opposite to heaven.

The gods with haste beheld the nether sky
The ghosts repine.

NĒTHERMOST. adj. [superl. of nether.]
Lowest.

Great is thy mercy toward me, and thou hast delivered my soul from the nethermost hell.

Undaunted to meet there whatever power,
Or spirit of the nethermost abyss
Might in that noise reside.

All that can be said of a liar lodged in the very nethermost hell, is this, that if the vengeance of God could prepare any place worse than hell for sinners, hell itself would be too good for him.

Heracitus tells us, that the eclipse of the sun was after the manner of a boat, whose the concave, as to our sight, appears uppermost, and the convex nethermost.

NETTING. n. s. A reticulated piece of work.

NETTLE.† n. s. [necel, Sax. naella, Icel. to prick, to sting. Serenius.] A stinging herb well known.

The strawberry grows underneath the nettle.

Some so like to thorns and nettles live,
That none for them can, when they perish, grieve.

To NETTLE. v. a. [from the noun.] To sting;
to irritate; to provoke.

The princes were so nettled at the scandal of this affront, that every man took it to himself.

Although at every part of the Apostle's discourse some of them might be uneasy and nettled, yet a moderate silence and attention was still observed.

NETTLER.* n. s. [from nettle.] One who provokes; that which stings or irritates.

These are the nettles, these are the blabbing books that tell, though not half your fellows' faults.

Whoever contemplates with becoming attention this curious and wonderful network of veins, must be transported with admiration. Blackmore.
NEVER-† adv. [ne ever, næppe, Sax. ne æppe, not ever; Goth. niariv, i. e. ne and av.]

1. At no time.

*Never, alas, the dreadful name
That fuels the infernal flame. Cowley.*
Never any thing was so unbrid as that odious man. Congreve.
By its own force destroy'd, fruitless com'd.
And always wavy'd, I was never pluck'd. Prior.
Death still draws nearer, never seeming near.  Pope.

2. It is used in a form of speech handed down by the best writers, but lately accused, I think, with justice, of solecism; as, he is mistaken though never so wise. It is now maintained, that propriety requires it to be expressed thus, that he is mistaken how ever so wise; that is, he is mistaken how wise never he be. The common mode can only be defended by supplying a very harsh and unprecedented ellipsis; he is mistaken though so wise, as never was any such; however, is the common use of the word among the best authors. Dr. Johnson.—“Be the distance never so remote.” Some have thought this mode of expression incongruous and ungrammatical; but never is the same as not ever; and the sentence is to be filled up thus: “be the distance not [near, but] ever so remote.” Addison, Spect. No. 590. This, then, is one of those elliptical forms which are to be explained “by observing nicely the posture of the mind in discoursing,” (to use Mr. Locke's words,) and not by attending merely to the obvious sense of the terms employed. For, in discoursing, we love to contract our ideas, though the opposition be not always, or but imperfectly expressed. Never so remote, if we regard this posture of the mind, is, therefore, as intelligible, and as proper as ever so remote; and, till of late, was more commonly used. We now say ever so remote, more clearly indeed, but with something less force: for never so implies an effort, or vehemence in asserting which ever so has not. However as perspicuity is the main object of grammar, I acknowledge it to be a good general rule to avoid not only real but seeming incongruities of speech. Bp. Hurd.

Be it never so true which we teach the world to believe, yet if once their affections begin to be alienated, a small thing persuadeth them to change their opinions. Hooker.
Ask me never so much downy and gift, and I will give according as ye shall say. Gen. xxix. 12.

In a living creature, though never so great, the sense and the affects of any one part of the body, instantly make a transmutation throughout the whole body. Bacon.
They destroyed all, were it never so pleasant, within a mile of the town. Kneller, Hist. of the Turks.

Death may be sudden to him, though it comes by never so slow degrees. Rh. Duty of Men.

He that shuts his eyes against a small light, would not be brought to see that which he had no mind to see, let it be placed in never so clear light, and never so near him. Aretbury.

That prince whom you espouse, although never so vigorously, is the principal in war, but you a second. Swift.

3. In no degree.

Whoever has a friend to guide him, may carry his eye in another man's head, and yet see no more the worse. South.

4. It seems in some phrases to have the sense of an adjective. Not any; but in reality it is not ever.

He answered him to never a word, inasmuch that the governor marvelled. St. Matth. xxvii. 14.
There would be never a plain test. Atterbury, Sermon. lli.

5. It is much used in composition; as, never-ending, having no end; of which some examples are subjoined.

Nature assured us, by never-failing experience, and reason by infallible demonstration, that our times upon the earth have neither certainty nor durability. Raleigh.

But a smooth and steadfast mind,
Gentle thoughts and calm desires,
Hearts with equal love conjoin'd,
Kindle never-dying fires. Corvus.

Ye myrtles brown, with ivy never sere
I come to pluck your berries harsh and crude. Milton, Elysias.

Your never-failing sword made war to cease,
And now you heal us with the acts of peace. Waller.

So corn in fields, and in the garden flowers,
Rejoice and raise themselves with moderate showers. Waller.

But over-charg'd with never-ceasing rain,
Become too moist. Waller.

Our heroes of the former days,
Dreadn'd and gain'd their never-fading bays. Racine, Roman.

Not Thracian Orpheus should transcend my lays,
Nor Lincus crown'd with never-fading bays. Dryden.

Leucippus, with his never-erring dart. Dryden.
Farwell, ye never-opening gates. Dryden.

He to quench his drought so much inclin'd,
May snowy fields and nitrous pastures find;
Meet sources of cold so greedily purp'd,
And be refresh'd with never-smiting food. Blackmore.

Norton hung down his never-blushing head,
And all was blush'd, as folly's self lay dead. Pope.

What the weak head with strongest bias rules,
Is pride, the never-failing vice of fools. Pope.

Thy busy never-missing face,
Thy screw'd-up front, thy state grimace. Swift.

NEVERTHELESS. adv. [never the less.]

Notwithstanding that.

They plead that even such ceremonies of the church of Rome as contain in them nothing which is not of itself agreeable to the word of God, ought nevertheless to be abolished. Hooker.

Many of our men were gone to land, and our ships ready to depart; nevertheless the admiral, with such ships only as could suddenly be put in readiness, made forth towards them. Bacon.

Creation must needs infer providence; and God's making the world, irrefragably proves that he governs it too; so that a being of a dependent nature remains nevertheless independent upon him in that respect. South.

NEUROLOGY. n. s. [νῆρος and λόγος.]

A description of the nerves.

NEUROSPASTIC. n. s. [νευροσπαστικός, Latin, νευροσπαστικός, Greek; nervus seu fideulus

trahio, moveo.] A puppet; a figure put in motion.

That outward form is but a neurospasm;
The soul it is, that, on her sudden ray
That she shoots forth, the limbs of moving beast
Doth stretch strait forth.

Mary, Immortal, of the Soul, (1647.) l. ii. 34.

NEWFA'NGLED. adj. [from newfangle.]
Formed with vain or foolish love of novelty; desirous of novelty.

At Christmas I no more desire a rose,
Than with a snow in May's newfangled shows;
But like of each thing, that in season grows.

Shakespeare.

Have no fellowship with newfangled teachers.

1 Tim. vi. Arg. of the Chapter.
Those charities are not newfangled devices of yesterday, but are most of them as old as the reformation.

Atterbury.

NEWFA'NGLEDNESS. n. s. [from newfangle.] adj. [from newfangled.] Vain and foolish love of novelty.

So to newfangledness both of manner, apparel, and each thing else, by the custom of self-will, egged to change through desire for a worse.

Saturny.

Yet be there in newfangledness did pass.

Spenser, Faerie Queene.

The women would be loth to come behind the fashion in newfangledness of the manner, if it not in costliness of the matter.

Carru.

NE'WING. n. s. [from new.] Yest or barm.

Ainsworth.

NE'WISH. adj. [from new.] As if lately made.

It drinketh not newish at all.

Bacon, Nat. Hist.

NE'WLY. adv. [supplce, Saxon, from new.]

1. Freshly; lately.

Her breath indeed those hands have newly stopp'd.

Shakespeare.

They newly learned by the king's example, that staindards do not interrupt the conveying of title to the crown.

Bacon.

Her lips were red, and that was thin,

Compa'd to that was next her chin;

Some bee had stung it newly.

Munday.

He rubb'd it o'er with newly gather'd mud.

Dryden.

2. In a manner different from the former.

Such is the power of that sweet passion,

That it all sordid baseness doth repel,

And the refined mind doth newly fashion

Into a fairer form.

Spenser, Hymn on Love.

3. In a manner not existing before.

NE'WNESS. n. s. [from new.]

1. Freshness; lateness; recentness; state of being lately produced.

Their stories, if they had been preserved, and that else was performed in that progress of the world, there could nothing of more delight have been left to posterity.

Raleigh.

In these disturbances,

And newness of a wavering government,

To avenge them of their former grievances.

Daniel.

When Horace writ his satire, the monarchy of his

Cæsar was in its newness, and the government but just made easy to his conquered people.

Dryden, Aus.

2. Novelty; unacquaintance.

Words borrowed of antiquity do lend majesty to style; they have the authority of years, and out of their intermission do win to themselves a kind of grace like newness.

B. Jonson.

Newness in great matters, was a worthy entertainment for a mind; it was an high taste, fit for the relish.

South.

3. Something lately produced.

There are some newnesses of English, translated from the elegance of modern tongues, as well as from the beauties of the Latin; and here and there some old words are sprinkled, which, for their significance and sound, deserved not to be antiquated.

Dryden, Don Sebastian.

4. Innovation; late change.

Away, my friends, new fight;
And happy newness that intends old right.

Shakespeare.

5. Way of practice.

His device was to come without any device, all in white like a new knight, but so new as his newness shamed most of the others long exercise.

Sidney.

6. Difference from the former manner.

Like in Christ was raised up from the dead by the glory of the Father, even so we also should walk in newness of life.

Rom. vi. 4.

NEWS. n. s. without the singular, unless it be considered as singular; Milton has joined it with a singular verb. [from new; nouvelles, French.]

1. Fresh account of any thing.

As he was ready to be greatly advanced for some noble pieces of service which he did, he heard news of me.

Sidney.

When Ribba heard these news, she fled from her husband to her brother Saturn.

Raleigh, Hist. of the World.

Evil news rides fast, while good news waits.

Milton.

With such amusement as weak mothers use,

And frantick gesture, he receives the news.

Walker.

We talk in ladies' chambers love and news.

Cowley.

Now the looks, and now the bells,

And now our ear the preacher tells,

To edify the people;

All our divinity is news,

And we have made of equal use

The pulpit and the steeple.

Denham.

The amazing news of Charles at once was spread,

At once the general voice declared

Our gracious prince was dead.

Dryden.

They have news-gatherers and intelligencers distributed into their several walks, who bring in their respective quotas, and make them acquainted with the discourse of the whole kingdom.

Spectator.

2. Something not heard before.

It is no news for the weak and poor to be a prey to the strong and rich.

L'Estrange.

3. Papers which give an account of the transactions of the present times.

Their papers, filled with a different party spirit, divide the people into different sentiments, who generally consider rather the principles than the truth of the news-writer.

Addison.

Adverse both in every news paper; and let it not be your fault or mine, if our countrymen will not take warning.

Swift.

NEWS-MONGER. n. s. [from news and monger.]

One that deals in news; one whose employment it is to hear and to tell news.

Many tales devil'd,

Whose oft the ear of greatness needs must hear,

By smiling pick-thanks and base news-mongers.

Shakespeare.

This was come as a judgement upon him for laying aside his father's will, and turning stock-jobber, news-monger, and busy body, meddling with other people's affairs.

Arbutnot.

NEWSPAPER. See the third sense of

NEWS.

NEWY. n. s. [from new, Saxon. new is supposed by Skinner to be contracted from an new. Ben Jonson writes it

newy, and thus we trace the contraction, newy, newy, newy, or newy. "Hath not a snail, a spider, yea, a newy been found there?" B. Jonson, Barthol. Fair.]

It; small lizard: they are supposed to be appropriated some to the land, and some to the water: they are harmless.

O thou! whose self-same mettle,
Whereof thy proud child, arrogant man, is puff'd,
Engenders the black toad, and adder blue,
The gilded newt, and eyesless venom'd worm.

Shakespeare.

News and blind words, do no wrong;

Come not near our fairy queen.

Shakespeare, Mid. N. Dream.

Such humility is observed in newts and new-lards, especially if their skins be perforated or picked.

Brown.

NEW-YEAR'S-GIFT. n. s. [from new, year, and gift.] Present made on the first day of the year.

If I be served such a trick, I'll have my brains taken out and buttered, and give them to a dog for a new-year's-gift.

Shakespeare, M. W. of Windsor.

When he sat on the throne, distributing new-year's-gifts, he had his altar of incense by him, that before they received gifts they might cast a little incense into the fire; which all good christians refused to do.

Stillingfleet.

NE'XIBLE. adj. [from nehibilis, Latin.] That may be knit together. Not in use.

Ciceron.

NEXT. adj. [next, Saxon, by a colloquial change from nehyr or nyhr, the superlative of neh or nyh; neax, Scottish.]

1. Nearest in place; immediately succeeding in order.

Went suppliesth place of what is next, and many times the next way.

Bacon.

The queen already sat

High on a golden bed; her princely guest

Was next her side, in order sat the rest.

Dryden.

The next in place and punishment were they,

Who prodigally throw their souls away.

Dryden.

2. Nearest in time.

The good man warn'd us from his text,

That none could tell what turn should be the next.

Gay.

3. Nearest in any gradation.

If the king himself had staid at London, or,

which had been the next best, kept his court at York, and sent the army on their proper errand, his enemies had been speedily subdued.

Cicero.

O fortunate young man! at least you lay

Are next to him, and claim the second prize.

Dryden.

Finite and infinite, being by the mind looked on as modifications of extension and duration, the next thing to be considered, is, how the mind comes by them.

Locke.

That's a difficulty next to impossible.

Bacon.

There, best with health, with business unper-pleas'd.

Young.

NEXT. adv. At the time or turn immediately succeeding.

The unwary nymph

Deir'd of Jove, when he'd he sought her bed,

To grant a certain gift.

Addison, Ovid.

NIAS. n. s. [Dr. Johnson has here given, by way of definition, "simple, silly,

foolish," as if the word were an adjective;

and then transcribed, from Bailey, "a

niat hawk is one taken newly from the nest, and not able to help itself; and hence niaty, a silly person." So far as to taken from the nest, Bailey's account of the hawk is right.] A young hawk;

an eyas. See EXAS.

Laugh st, weet bird, is that the scruple? come,

come;

Thou art a niat.

B. Jonson, Dec. an. Aus.

NIB. n. s. [from Nib, Saxon, the face; nebbe,

Dutch, the bill.]

1. The bill or neck of a bird. See NAR.
2. The point of any thing, generally of a pen.

A tree called the bejoco, which twines about other trees, with its end hanging downwards, travellers cut the nib off it, and presently a spout of water runs out from it as clear as crystal.

Derham.

NIBBED. adj. [from nib.] Having a nib.
To NIBBLE. † v. a. [from nib, the beak or mouth. Der. Johnson. — It has been thought allied to the Greek νῆσος, velico; and gnibbe, I have observed, is the old orthography of this word. See Barret's Aliv. 1580. So Junius cites the Belg. knabben, or nibbelen, "quod sicuti in frequentatulo est a knawen, sicuti in gnibbe Anglis est a gnawen."] Lev.

1. To bite by little at a time; to eat slowly.

Thy turfy mountains, where live nibbling sheep,
 And flat heads thatch'd with stover them to keep.

Shakespeare.

It is the rose that bleeds, when he Nibbles his nice phlebotomy.
 Had not he better have born Wm's sabbling of his plants and roots now, than the huntsman's eating of him out of house and home?

L'Estrange.

Many there are who nibble without leave,
 But none, who are not born to taste, survive.

Greenville.

2. To bite as a fish does the bait.

The roving trout
 Greedily sucks in the twining bait,
 And tugs and nibbles the fallacious meat.

Gay.

To NIBBLE. v. n.

1. To bite at.

As pigeons nibble, so wedlock would be nibbling.

Shakespeare.

They gaze at rich revenues which you hold,
 And fain would nibble at your grandiose gold.

Dryden.

If you would be nibbling, here is a hand to stay your stomach.
 This fish plunging himself in mud, and then lifting up his head a little, casts out the string; which the little fishes taking for a worm, and nibbling at it, he immediately plucks them both in together.

Dryden, Don Sebastian.

Greiv, Mus.

2. To carp at; to find fault with.

Instead of returning a full answer to my book, he manifestly falls a nibbling at one single passage in it.

Tillotson.

NIBBLE. n. s. [from the verb.] A word used by anglers, denoting the act of the fish trying the bait, as it were; not immediately swallowing it.

- NIBBLER. † n. s. [from nibble.] A word
 One that bites by little at a time.

The tender nibbler would not touch the bait.

Shakespeare, Pisanotto Pilgrim.

2. A carper.

You tell me what the wit say of your book. I suppose you mean those identical dunces, who have been at war with sense for these last twenty years,
 as they were with wit for twenty years before.
 But these are nibblers at the outside. I can tell you of a London divine that has gone deeper, and has returned your book in a great rage to the bookseller.

Warburton to Howard, Lett. 150.

NICE. † adj. [Goth. anaquis, soft; haec, nece, Saxons; tender, effeminate, from nerjancin, to soften; neische, old Engl. effeminate. Gloss. to Wicliffe; nice, old French, silly, weak, simple.]

1. Accurate in judgement; to minute ex-

VOL. II.

actness; superfluously exact. It is often used to express a culpable delicacy.

Such a man was Argulus, as hardly the nicest eye can find a spot in.

Shelley.

Nor be so nice in taste myself to know,
 If what I swallow be a thrush or no.

Dryden, Pers.

Thus critics, of less judgement than caprice,
 Curious, not knowing, not exact, but nice,
 Form short ideas, and offend in arts
 As most in manners, by a love to parts.

Pope.

Our author, happy in a judge so nice,
 Produc'd his play, and begg'd the knight's advice.

Pope.

She is so nice and critical in her judgement, so sensible of the smallest error, that the maid is often forced to draw and undress her daughters three or four times a-day.

Lev.

2. Delicate; scrupulously and minutely cautious.

Dear love! continue nice and chaste;
 For if you yield, you do me wrong!

Donne.

Let duller wits to love's end lapse,
 I have enough to woo thee long.

Donne.

Of loose men at first, like women, nice,
 Raise maiden scruples at untract'd vice.

Lord Holford.

Having been compiled by Gratian, in an ignorant age, we ought not to be too nice in examining it.

Baker.

3. Fastidious; squeamish.

God hath here

Varied his bounty so with new delights,
 As may compare with heaven; and to taste,
 Think not I shall be nice.

Milton, P. L.

4. Easily injured; delicate.

With how much ease is a young maid betray'd?

How nice the reputation of the maid? Recommen.

5. Formed with minute exactness.

Indulge me but in love, my other passions
 Shall rise and fall by virtue's nice rules.

Addison, Cato.

6. Requiring scrupulous exactness.

Supposing an injury done, it is a nice point to proportion the reparation to the degree of the indignity.

L'Estrange.

My progress in making this nice and troublesome experiment, I have act down more at large.

Newcom, Opt.

7. Refined.

A nice and subtle happiness I see Thon to thyself propound, in the choice
 Of thy associates, Adam; and wilt taste
 No pleasure, though in pleasure solitary.

Milton, P. L.

8. Having lucky hits: as in the following passage of Shakespeare; a signification not in use, Der. Johnson says, It is here used by Shakespeare rather in the sense of trifling, toying, wanton; and so in the Mirror for Magistrates.

When my hours

Were nice and lucky, men did ransom lives
 Of me for jests.

Shakespeare, Ant. & Cleop.

Shore's wife was my nice chest,
 The holy hours, and eke the wily pent.

Mir. for Mag. p. 412.

9. Foolish; weak; effeminate.

A nice heart! fit for shame!
 A coward heart, of love unlearned,
 Whereof art thou so sore afraid?

Greiv, Conf. Am. B. 4.

Men was nice and effeminate, Barret, Aliv. (1580.)

10. Trivial; unimportant.

The letter was not nice, but full of charge,
 Of dear import.

Shakespeare, Rom. and Jul.

11. Delicacious.

Look, how nice he makes it! Barret, Aliv. (1580.)
 Handsome; pleasing; a colloquial expression in several parts of England.

13. To make NICE. To be scrupulous; perhaps from faire le delicat.
 He that stands upon a slippery place,
 Makes nice of no vile bold to stay him up.

Shakespeare, K. John.

NICELY. adv. [from nice.]
 1. Accurately; minutely; scrupulously.

Knowers in this pleasure
 Harbour more craft, and more corrupter ends,
 Than twenty silly ducking observants,
 That stretch their duties nicely.

Shakespeare, K. Lear.

What mean those ladies which, as thou
 They were to take a clock to pieces, go
 So nicely about the bride?

Donne.

He ought to study the grammar of his own tongue, that he may understand his own country-speech nicely, and speak it properly.

Locke.

The next thing of which the dunces ought to be nicely determined, are opiates. Arbuthnot on Chins.

At nicely carving, show thy wit;
 But never presume to eat a bit.

Swift, Miscell.

2. Delicately.

The inconveniences attending the best of governments, are quickly felt, and are nicely sensible of the share that we bear in them.

Atterbury.

NICE'VE CREED. The Creed drawn up, for the most part, by the first general council of Nice in the year 325; enlarged in the year 381.

That other confession of faith, which we call the Nicene Creed. Hooker, Eccl. Pol. v. § 42.

NICE'NESS. n. s. [from nice.]
 1. Accuracy; minute exactness.

Where's none that labour'd nice'ness in thy dress,
 And all those arts that did the spark express?

Gay.

2. Superfluous delicacy or exactness.

A strange nice'ness were it in me to refrain from the care of a person representing so much worthiness, which I am glad even to rocks and woods to utter.

Shelley.

Only some little boats, from Gaul that did her feed

With trifles, which she took for nice'ness more than need.

Dryden.

Unlike the nice'ness of our modern dames,
 Affected nymphs, with new affected names,

Dryden.

Nor place them where
 Roast crabs offend the nice'ness of their nose.

Dryden.

NICE'RY. n. s. [from nice.]
 1. Minute accuracy of thought.

Nor was this nice'ry of his judgement confined only to literary, but was the same in all other parts of art.

Prior.

2. Accurate performance, or observance.

As for the workmanship of the old Roman pillars, the ancients have not kept to the nicety of proportion and the rules of art so much as the moderns.

Addison on Italy.

3. Fastidious delicacy; squeamishness.

He then with speeches meet
 Does fair intreat; no courtier nice'ry,
 But simple truth, and eke unfeigned sweet.

Spenser.

4. Minute observation; punctilious discrimination; subtlety.

If reputation attend these conquests, which depend on the fineness and nice'ness of words, it is no wonder if the wit of men so employed, should perplex and subtilize the signification of sounds.

Locke.

His conclusions are not built upon any nice'ness, or solitary and uncommon appearances, but on the most simple and obvious circumstances of these terrestrial natures.

Bacon.

5. Delicate management; cautious treatment.

- Love such nicety requires,
One blast will put out all his fires. Suift.
6. Effeminate softness.
7. Niceties, in the plural, is generally applied to dainties or delicacies in eating. Miller.
NICHAR. n. s. [plant].
NICHE. n. s. [French.] A hollow in which a statue may be placed.

Niches, containing figures of white stone or marble, should not be coloured in their concavity too black. Watson.

They not from temples, nor from gods relieve,
But the poor lanes from the niche seize, Dryden.
If they be little images that please.

On the south a long majestic race
Of Egypt's priests, the gilded niche grace. Pope.
The heirs to titles and large estates are well enough qualified to read pamphlets against religion and high flying; whereby they fill their *niche*s, and carry themselves through the world with that dignity which best becomes a senator and a squire. Suift, Miscell.

NICK.† n. s. [nicke, Teutonic, the twinkling of an eye.]

1. Exact point of time at which there is necessity or convenience.

That great instrument of state suffered the fatal threat to be spun out to that length for some political respects, and then to cut it off in the very nick. Howell, Voc. For.

What in our watches that in us is found,
So to the height and nick we up be wound,
No matter by what hand or trick. Smollett.

That trick,
Had it come in the nick, Denham.
Had touch'd us to the quick.
Through dense fortune seen to smile,
And here upon him for a while;
She'll after show him in the nick
Of all his glories a dog trick. Hudibras.

And some with syllogisms, signs and tricks,
Engraved in planetary *nick*s,
With their own inferiours will fetch them Down from their orbs, arrest and catch them. Hudibras.

This nick of time is the critical occasion for the going of a point. L'Estrange.

2. A notch cut in any thing. [Corrupted from nock or notch.]

Though but a stick with a nick.

3. A score; a reckoning: from reckonings kept anciently upon tallies, or notched sticks.

Launce, his men, told me, he lov'd her art of all *nick*s. Shakespeare, Two Gent. of Ver.

4. A winning throw. [niche, Fr. a ludicrous trick.]

Come, seven's the main,
Cris Ganymede; the usual trick
Seven, a six, a seven, a nick. Prior.

NICK.† n. s. An evil spirit of the waters, in the northern mythology of elder times; and in later transferred to the devil himself, by the English, with the addition of old. Butler, Spence, and others have pretended that Old Nick is derived from Nicholas Machiavel, the Florentine politician of infamous memory; and that "as cunning or as wicked as Old Nick," first referring to his character, afterwards was applied to the father of evil. But the evil being was called Old Nick long before Machiavel was born. Nocca or Nicken was a deity of the waters, which the ancient Danes and Germans worshipped; whom they represented as appearing in a monstrous shape, preasing shipwreck and death, and strangling persons that were drowning. See Keyser's Antiq. Septentr. p. 261. where Keyser suggests the Germ. neigen, signifying, as the Latin nece, a spirit of the waters, and nece, to kill. "Necus, numen malignum aquarium." Verelius, Epit. Hist. Su. Goth. p. 13. "Nikur, bellua aquatica." Dick. Island. Hickes.

Mr. Warburton is of opinion, that this is a blunder of the editors, to suppose the devil was called Old Nick, from Nick Machiavel, who lived in the sixteenth century; whereas they could not but know, that our English writers, before Machiavel's time, used the word Old Nick very commonly to signify the devil; and that it came from our Saxon ancestors, who called him old Nick. The Goths, I will add, called the devil Nick, and the Danes the god of the sea Nocca, and some Nicken. Sheringham de Gentis Angl. Orig. capit. Dr. Grey, Notes on Hudibras.

- TO NICK. v. a. [from the noun.]
1. To hit; to touch luckily; to perform by some slight artifice used at the lucky moment.

Is not the winding up of witness
A *nick*ing more than half the business? Hudibras.
The just season of doing things must be nick'd, and all accidents improved. L'Estrange.
Take any passion of the soul of man, while it is predominant and alone; and just in the critical height of it, nick it with some lucky or unlucky word, and you may certainly over-rule it. South, Sermon. ii. 332.

2. To cut in *nick*s or notches.
His beard 'they have sing'd off' with brands of fire;

And ever as it blast'd they threw on him
Great pails of puddled mire to quench the hair.
My master preaches patience, and the while His man with scissars *nick*s him like a fool. Shopey.
Breaks watchmen's heads, and chairmen's
glasses,
And thence proceeds to *nick*ing nabes. Prior.

3. To suit, as tallies cut in *nick*s.

Words, *nick*ing and resembling one another, are applicable to different significations. Camden, Rem. Albanion.

4. To defeat or cozen, as at dice; to disappoint by some trick or unexpected turn.

Why should he follow you?
The lack of his affection should not then
Have nick'd his captainship at such a point. Shopey.

NICKEL.† n. s. A metal, first described by Mr. Cronstadt in the Swedish Memoirs for the years 1751 and 1754. Chambers. It resembles silver in appearance; is softer than iron; and like iron is malleable, both hot and cold.

NICKER.† n. s. [from nick.] One who waxes an opportunity to pilfer, or practise some knavish artifice. A low word.

Did not Pythagoras stop a company of drunken bullies from storming a civil house, by clanging the strain of the pipe to the sober spondonists? And yet your modern musicians want art to defend their windows from common thieves. Arbutnot and Pope, Mort. Scrv.

NICKNAME. n. s. [nom de nique, French.] A name given in scoff or contempt; a term of derision; an opprobrious or contemptuous appellation.

The time was when men were had in price for lauring; now letters only make men vile. He is upbraiding called a poet, as if it were a contemptible nickname. B. Jonson.

My mortal enemy hath not only falsely surmised me to be a feigned person, giving me nick-names, but also hath offered large sums of money to corrupt the prince with whom I have been retained. Bacon, Hen. VII.

So long as her tongue was at liberty, there was not a word got from her, but the same nickname in derision. L'Estrange.

TO NICKNAME. v. a. To call by an opprobrious appellation.

You nickname virtue vice;
For virtue's office never breaks men's throats. Shakespeare.

Less seen these facts which tremble nick-names force,
Than such a fear'd ability for them. Denham.

NICOTIAN.† n. s. [French.] Tobacco; first sent into France by Nicot, the maker of the great French dictionary, in the year 1560, when he was ambassador leger in Portugal. Cotgrave, Bullock, and Sherwood. Not now in use. Your Nicotian is good too. B. Jonson, Every Man in his Humour.

NICO'TIAN.† adj. Denoting tobacco.

This gourmand denoting whose hecoments to his paunch, and whiffs him away in Nicotian income to the idol of his vain intemperance. Bp. Hall, St. Paul's Comed.

TO NICKTATE. v. a. [nickto, Latin.] To wink.

There are several parts peculiar to brutes, which are wanting in man; as the seventh or suspensory muscle of the eye, the *nick*ing membrane, and the strong aponeuroses on the sides of the nose. Rap.

NICKTATION.† n. s. [nickatio, Latin.] A twinkling of the eye. Cockerm.

NICKTATING Membrane.† In anatomy, a thin membrane which covers the eyes of several creatures; defending them without a total obstruction of vision.

The observation may be repeated of the muscle which covers the *nick*ing membrane over the eye. Its office is in the front of the eye; but its body is lodged in the back part of the globe, where it lies safe, and where it incumbers nothing. Pulpy, Nat. Theol. ch. 9.

NIDE n. s. [nidus, Lat.] A brood; as a nide of pheasants.

NIDDET.† n. s. [corrupted from nithing or niding; the opprobrious term with which the man was anciently branded who refused to come to the royal standard in times of exigency. Dr. Johnson.

In colloquial language a nidget is a trifler; and so the old Fr. nigreur, which Cotgrave renders "a fop, a nidget, a trifler," and we had formerly the substantive nidgeries for fooleries. A coward; a dastard.

There was one true English word of as great, if not greater force than them all, now out of all use, — It signifieth no more than affect, base-minded, false-hearted, coward, or nidget. Camden, Rem.

NIDIFICATION. n. s. [nidificatio, Latin.] The act of building nests.

That place, and that method of nidification, doeth abundantly answer the creature's occasions. Darwin.

NIDING.† n. s. [niding, Sax.; niding, Su. Goth. a worthless person; from nif, vileness.] A coward; a dastard; a base fellow.

There was one true English word of as great, if not greater force than them all — it is niding. For when there was a dangerous rebellion against king William Rufus, and Rochester castle, then the most important and strongest fort of this realm, was stoutly kept against him; after that he had been proclaimed that his subjects should repair thither to his camp, upon no other penalty, but that whoever refused to come should be reputed a niding; they swarmed to him immediately from all sides.

Comden, Reu. He is worthy to be called a niding, one, the pulse of whose soul beats but faintly towards heaven, as having taken but weak impressions of the image of his Maker, who will not run and reach his hand to bear up his temple.

Hensell, Instruct. For. Trans. p. 229.

NIDOUR.† n. s. [nidor, Latin; nideur, French.] Scent; savour.

When the French-pots rove, and the uncovered dishes send forth a nidor and rancid smells.

Dr. Taylor, Sermon. p. 211.

And again, of epi epi happ balances — The material demands do strangely gluttonise upon the nidour and blood of sacrifices.

Hollywell, Midwayman. (1681), p. 102.

NIDOROUS. adj. [nidorous, from nidor, Lat.] Resembling the smell or taste of roasted fat.

Incense and nidorous smells, such as of sacrifices, were thought to intoxicating the brain, and to dispose men to devotion; which they may do by a kind of contrivance of the spirits, and partly also by heat, and exalting them. Secum.

The signs of the functions of the stomach being depraved, are eruptions with the taste of the element, scid, nidorous, or fetid, resembling the taste of rotten eggs. Arbuthnot.

NIDOROUSITY. n. s. [from nidorous.] Eruetation with the taste of undigested roast-meat.

The cure of this nidorousity is, by vomiting and purging.

NIGGARDISE.† n. s. [from niggard.] Niggardliness; avarice.

For he, whose shades in willful woe are worse,
The grace of his Creator both despises,
That will not use his gifts for thankless niggardise.

Spenser, F. Q. iv. viii. 15.

The niggardise and miserable wretchedness of the stewards will not afford it.

Forster, Anst. Trans. New York, (1619), p. 516.

'Twere pity thou by niggardise should'st thrive,
Whose wealth by waking craveth to be spent;
For which touch of the wisest shall be shent,
Like to some rich churl hoarding up his pelf,
Both to wrong others, and to starve himself.

Dryden, Legend of Merlin.

Why are we so niggardly to stop at one fifth?
Why do we not raise it one full moiety, and double our money? Locke.

Providence, need niggardly but wise,
Here harshly bestows, and there denies,
That by each other's virtues we may rise.

Gronoville.

Tiberius was noted for his niggardly temper; he used only to give to his attendants their diet.

Arbuthnot on Catins.

2. Sparing; wary.

I know your mind, and I will satisfy it;
neither will I do it like a niggardly answerer, going no farther than the bounds of the question.

Sidney.

NIGGARDLY. adv. Sparingly; parsimoniously.

I have long loved her, followed her, ingross'd opportunities to meet her; feed every slight occasion that could but niggardly give me sight of her.

Shakespeare, M. W. of Windsor.

NIGGARDNESS.† n. s. [from niggard.] Avarice; sordid parsimony.

flames
Into her scornful eyes. Shakespeare, L. Lear.

You have dancing shoes
With nimble soles. Shakespeare, Rom. and Jul.
Him offering soon propitious fire from heaven,
Consum'd with nimble glance and grateful steam;
The others out, for his was not sincere.

Through the mid sea the nimble pinnace sails
Aloof from Crete before the northern gales. Pope.
NIMBLENESS. n. s. [from nimble.] Quickness; activity; speed; agility; readiness;
dexterity; celerity; expedition;
swiftness.

The hounds were straight uncoupled, and ere long the stag thought it better to trust to the nimbleness of his feet, than to the slender fortification of his lodging. Sidney.

Himself showing at one instant both steadiness and nimbleness. Sidney.
All things are therefore partakers of God; it is his offspring, his influence is in them, and the personal wisdom of God is for that very cause said to excel in nimbleness or agility, to pierce into all intellectual, pure, and subtle spirit, to go through all, and to reach unto every thing.

We, lying still.
Are full of rest, defence, and nimbleness. Hooker.

Ovid ranged o'er all Parnassus with great nimbleness and agility; but as he did not much care for the toil requisite to climb the upper part of the hill, he was generally roving about the bottom. Addison, Guardian.

NIMBLENESS. n. s. Nimbleness.
Seemed those little angels did uphold
The cloth of state, and on their purpled wings Did bear the pendants through their nimble hold. Spenser, F. Q. v. ix. 39.

the teeth.

In oranges and lemons, the nipping of their riod giveth out their small morsels. Bacon, Nat. Hist.

2. To cut off by any slight means.

The small shoots that extract the sap of the most leading branches, must be nipt off. Mortimer.

3. To blast; to destroy before full growth.
This is the state of man; to day he purs forth
The tender leaves of hopes, to-morrow blossoms,
And bears his blushing honours thick upon him;
The third day comes a frost, a killing frost;
And when he thinks, good easy man, full surely
His greatness is a ripening, nips his root;
And then he falls as I do. Shakespeare, Hen. VIII.

A flower doth spread and die
Thou would'st 'extend me to some good,
Before I were by frost's extremity nipt in the bud, Herbert.

His delivery now proves
Abortive, as the first-born bloom of spring,
Nips with the lagging rear of winter's frost.

Had he not been nipped in the bud, he might have made a formidable figure in his own work among posterity. Addison.

From such encouragement it is easy to guess to what perfection I might have brought this work, had it not been nipt in the bud. Arbutnot, John Bull.

4. To pinch as frost.

The air bites shrewdly, it is very cold —
It is a nipping and an eager air.

When icicles hang by the wall,
And Dick the shepherd blows his nail;
When blood is nipt, and ways be foul,
Then nightly sings the staring owl.

Shakespeare, Hamlet.

5. To vex; to bite.

And sharp remore his heart did prick and nip,
That drops of blood thence like a well did play.

Shakespeare, Love's L. Lost.

6. To satirise; to ridicule; to taunt sarcastically.

But the right gentle mind would bite his lip
To hear the javel so good mean to nip.

Shakespeare, Hamlet, To.

Quick wit commonly be in desire aw-flungled;
in purpose unconstant; bold with any person;
bony in every matter; nothing such as be present, nipping any that is absent. Ascham, Schoolmaster.

NIP. n. s. [from the verb.]
1. A pinch with the nails or teeth.

I am sharply tauoed, yet sometimes with pinches, nips, and bobs. Ascham, Schoolmaster.

2. A small cut.

What this a slave? 'tis like a demicannon;
What up and down carry'd like an apple-art?
Here's nip, and nip, and cut, and slash, and slash.

Like to a censer in a barber's shop. Shakespeare.

3. A blast.

So hasty fruits and too ambitious flowers,
Scorning the midwifery of ripening hours,
In spite of frosts, spring from the unwilling earth,
But find a nip untimely at their birth. Rayney.

2. Splendour of descent; lustre of pedigree.

3. Stateliness.

For nobleness of structure, and riches, it [the abbey of Reading] was equal to none in England. Admiral, Berk. ii. 341.

NOBLENESS.† n. s. [nobilis, French.] 1. Nobility. This word is not now used in any sense. Dr. Johnson.—It certainly was in use, as Mr. Mason also has observed, at the time Dr. Johnson made this remark; and has been since supported by good authorities. See the third sense, as well as the first.

Fair branch of nobles, flower of chivalry, That with your worth the world adorned make. Spenser.

True nobleness consists in a liberal education, and honourable pursuits and employments, followed even from the cradle. Wealth may confer this, but it must be hereditary, not acquired. The upstart himself, whatever may be his talents or opulence, will seldom have the sentiments and inclinations of a gentleman. Mitchell, Principles of Legislation, (1796.)

2. Dignity; greatness.

Thou, whose nobles knew one stature still, And one true posture, though bending 'till with ill. B. Jonson, Epigr. 102.

3. Noblemen collectively.

Let us haste to hear it, And call the nobles to the audience. Shakspeare, Hamlet.

I know on reason, as should give that advantage to the commonality of England to be foremost in brave actions, which the nobles of France would never suffer in their peasants. Dryden.

His fancies spread wonderfully upon the nobles. Shakspeare, on Twelfth Night, p. 30.

The intendant of Glascow, among other magnificent festivities, treated the nobles of the province with a dinner and desert. Hor. Walpole's Works, No. 6.

My enquiries and observations did not prevent to one any incorrigible vice in the nobles of France. Burke.

NOBLY.† adv. [from noble.] 1. Of ancient and splendid extraction.

Only a second laurel did adorn him. His colleague Cæsar, though nobly born. He shew'd the price of the triumphal bay, But Marston won the glory of the day. Dryden.

2. Greatly; illustriously; magnanimously.

Did he not straight the two delinquents meet, That were the slaves of drink and thralls of sleep? Was not that nobly done? Shakspeare, Alcibiades.

This fate he could have scap'd, but would not lose Honour for life, but rather nobly chose Death from their fears, than safety from his own. Denham.

3. Grandly; splendidly.

There could not have been a more magnificent design than that of Trajan's pillar. * Where could an emperor's ashes have been so nobly lodged, as in the midst of his metropolis, and on the top of so exalted a monument? Addison on Italy.

NOBODY. n. s. [no and body.] No one; not any one.

This is the tune of our catches played by the picture of nobody. Shakespeare, Troilus.

It fell to Cole's turn, for whom nobody cared, to be made the sacrifice; and he was out of his office. Clerodend.

If in company you offer something for a jest, and nobody seconds you on your own laughter, you may condemn their taste, and appeal to better judgments; but in the mean time you make a very indifferent figure. Swift, Miscell.

NO'CENT. adj. [nocens, Latin.]

1. Guilty; criminal.

The earl of Devonshire being interested in the blood of York, that was rather feared than nocent; yet so one, that might be the object of other plots, remained prisoner in the Tower during the king's life. Bacon, Hist. VII.

Secretly Catechy resorts to you—to enquire whether it were lawful, considering the necessity of the time, to undertake an enterprise for the advancement of the Catholic religion, though it were likely that, among many that were nocent, some should perish that were innocent.

Id. Northampton. Proceed. agt. Garnet, (1606.) A. 2.

God made us naked and innocent, yet we presently make ourselves nocent.

Hewitt, Sermon. Chr. Day, p. 74. (1658.)

A great scruple arose even in the minds of the most confident assassins, whether the nocent and the innocent might be destroyed and perish together.

Id. Pearson, Sermon. (Nov. 5. 1673.) p. 21.

2. Hurtful; mischievous.

His head the mind, well stor'd with subtle wiles:
Not yet in horrid shade, or dismal den,
Nor nocent yet; but not the grassy herb,
Fearless unfeared of sleep. Milton, P. L.

The warm linbeck draws

Salutiferous waters from the nocent brood. Pallius.

They meditate whether the virtues of the one will exalt or diminish the force of the other, or correct any of its nocent qualities. Watts on the Mind.

NO'CENT. n. s. One who is criminal. Not now in use.

Catechy, coming unto Garnet,—asketh, whether for the good and promotion of the Catholic cause against heretics, it be lawful or not, amongst many nocents, to destroy and take away some innocents also.

See E. Cole, Proceed. agt. Garnet, (1606.) R. 5. b.

No nocent is absolved by the verdict of himself. Brown, Chr. Mor. A. 22.

NO'CIVE. adj. [nocivus, Lat.] Hurtful; destructive.

Be it that some nocive or hurtful thing be towards us, must first of necessity follow thereupon?

A vow proving either idle, unprofitable, or unjust, or nocive and hurtful to the common good. Skidmore, Mir. of Ant. p. 200.

NOCK. n. s. [nocke, Teut. nocchie, Ital.]

1. A hit; a knock; a notch: as of an arrow, bow, or spindle. Hulot.

The good fleecer that mended his bolts with cutting of the nock.

Martin, Murr. of Priests, (1554.) H. b. l. b.

2. The fundament. Les fesses.

When the date of nock was out,
Off dropt the sympathetic smout. Hindburn.

TO NOCK. v. a. To place upon the notch.

VOL. II.

Then took he up his bow
And nock'd his shaft, the ground whence all their future griefs did grow. Chapman.

NO'CKED. adj. [from nock.] Notched. Shervood.

Arrows—

NOCTAMBULATION. n. s. [nox and ambulo, Latin.] The act of walking in sleep. Bailey.

NOCTAMBULO. n. s. [nox and ambulo, Latin.] One who walks in his sleep.

Respiration being carried on in sleep is no argument against its being voluntary. What shall we say of noctambulæ? There are voluntary motions carried on without thought, to avoid pain. Arbuthnot on Air.

NOCT'IDIAL. adj. [noctis and dies, Lat.] Comprising a night and a day.

The noctidial day, the lunar periodical month, and the solar year, are natural and universal; but incommensurate each to another, and difficult to be reconciled. Haldar.

NOCT'IFEROUS. adj. [nox and fero.] Bringing night. Dict.

NOCT'IFLUA. n. s. [Latin; nox, the night, and fluco, to shine.] A kind of phosphorus, shining in the night, without any light thrown upon it.

NOCT'IFLOUS. adj. [from noctifluea.] Shining in the night.

This appearance was occasioned by myriads of noctifluous Nereids that inhabit the ocean, and on every agitation become at certain times apparent, and often remain sticking to the oars; and, like glow-worms, give a fine light. Pennant.

NOCT'IVAGANT. adj. [noctivagus, Lat.] Wandering in the night. Dict.

NOCTIVIGATION. n. s. [from noctivagus, Lat.] The act of rambling or wandering in the night.

Could he not remember what befel him, when, upon the entrance of his adventures, this vertigo of noctivigation and watching his arms seized him?

Gayton on D. Quixote, p. 253.

The townsmen acknowledge 6s. 8d. to be paid for noctivigation.

A. Wood, Life of Himself, p. 274.

NOCTUARY. n. s. [from noctus, Lat.] An account of what passes by night.

I have got a parcel of visions and other miscellanies in my noctuary, which I shall send to enrich your paper. Addison.

NOCTURN. n. s. [nocturne, Fr. nocturnus, Lat.] An office of devotion performed in the night.

The reliques being conveniently placed before the church-door, the vigils are to be celebrated that night before them, and the nocturns and the matins for the honour of the saints, whose the reliques are. Stillingfleet.

NOCTURNAL. adj. [nocturnus, Lat.] Nightly.

From gilded roofs depending lamps display
Nocturnal beams that emulate the day. Dryden.

I beg leave to make you a present of a dream, which may serve to lull your readers till such time as you yourself shall gratify the publick with any of your nocturnal discoveries. Addison.

NOCTURNAL. n. s. An instrument by which observations are made in the night.

That projection of the stars which includes all the stars in our horizon, and therefore reaches to the thirty-eighth degree and a half of southern latitude, though its centre is the north pole, gives us a better view of the heavenly bodies as they appear every night to us; and it may serve for a nocturnal, and shew the true hour of the night. Hutton.

NO'CU'MENT. n. s. [nocumentum, Lat.] Harm. Not in use.

All these noyful nocuments are the holy fruites of the whoredome of that church.

Rule on the Mes. P. II. (1550.) sign. k. vii.

Though the basilisk be a nocuus creature.

Swann, Spec. Metall. (1655.) p. 487.

TO NOD. v. n. (Of uncertain derivation: nodus, Gr. nodus, Lat. amenedid, Welsh.

Dr. Johnson.—It is the past participle of the Sax. hrutan, caput inclinare. The past tense of hrutan is hroht. By adding to hroht, or nah, the participial termination ed we have nahed, nah'd, nad (a broad) or nod. Mr. H. Tooke, Div. of Parl. II. 198.)

1. To decline the head with a quick motion.

On the faith of Jove rely,
When nodding to thy suit he bows the sky. Dryden.

2. To pay a slight bow.

Cassius must bend his body,
If Caesar carelessly but nod on him. Shakespeare.

3. To bend downwards with quick motion.

When a pine is hewn on the plains,
And the last mortal stroke alone remains,
Labouring in pangs of death, and threatening all,
This way and that she nods, considering where to fall. Dryden.

He climbs the mountain rocks,
Fir'd by the nodding verdure of its brow. Thomson.

4. To be drowsy.

Your two predecessors were famous for their dreams and visions, and contrary to all other authors, never pleased their readers more than when they were nodding. Addison.

TO NOD. v. a.

1. To bend; to incline.

Heath nod'd to her: He hath given his empire. Cleopatra

2. To shake. Shakespeare, Ant. and Cleop.

Let every feeble rumour shake your hearts;
Your enemies, with nodding of their plumes,
Fan you into despair. Shakespeare, Coriol.

NOD. n. s. [from the verb.]

1. A quick declination of the head.

Children being to be restrained by the parents only in vicious things; a look or nod only ought to correct them when they do amiss.

A mighty king I say, an earthly God;
Nations obey my nod, and wait my nod;
And life and death depend on my decree. Prior.

2. A quick declination.

Like a drunken sailor on a mast,
Ready with every nod to tumble down
Into the fatal bowels of the deep. Shakespeare, Rich. III.

3. The motion of the head in drowsiness.

Every drowsy nod shakes their doctrine who teach, that the soul is always thinking. Locke.

4. A slight obeisance.

Will be give you the nod? Shakespeare, Twain, and Cress.

Since the wisdom of their choice is rather to have my nod than my heart, I will practise the insinuating nod, and be off to them most counterfeitedly. Shakespeare, Coriol.

NODA.† n. s. [from nodo.] The state of being knotted, or act of making knots.
Cockeram.

NO'DDEN.* adj. [from nod.] Bent; declined.

NO'DDER.† n. s. [from nod.]

1. One who makes noda.
A set of nodders, winklers, and whisperers, whose business is to strangle all other whispering wit in their birth.

2. A drowsy person.

We have shown, that, according to Moses his philosophy, the soul is secure both from death, and from sleep after death; which those drowsy nodders over the letter of the Scripture have very unciously collected.
Moss, Comp. Cobb. (1658.) Ded.

NO'DDLE. n. s. [hol, Saxon.] A head; in contempt.

Her care shall be
To comb your noddles with a three-legged stool.

Let our wines without mixture, or stain, be all
fine,
Or call up the master and break his dull noddles.

My head's not made of brass,
As frisk Bacon's noddles, which he would have
He would not have it said before the people, that Images are to be worshipped with Latins, but rather the contrary, because the distinctions necessary to defend it are too subtle for their noddles.

Come, master, I have a project in my noddles, that shall bring my mistress to you back again,
with as good will as ever she went from you.

Why shouldst thou try to hide thyself in youth?
Impartial Proserpine beholds the truth;
And laughing at so fond and vain a task,
Will strip thy hoary noddles of its mask.

Thou that art ever half the city's grace,
And add'st to solemn noddles, solemn pace.

NO'DDY.† n. s. [from naudin, Norman, French.]

1. A simpleton; an idiot.
And be that's not in print they hold a noddy,
Because fellows are noddies still in print.

The whole race of bawling, fluting noddies, by what title soever dignified, are a skin to the an in this fable.

2. A game at cards.
Why shouldst thou the thrifty and right worshipful game of post and pair content them, or the witty invention of noddy?

Room for fresh gamsters; here is a chess-board to my host's noddy-board, Moors and Christians.

NODE. n. s. [nodus, Latin.]

1. A knot; a knob.

2. A swelling on the bone.
If nodes be the cause of the pain, ferment with spirits of wine wherein opium and saffron have been dissolved.

3. Intersection.
All these variations are finished in nineteen years, nearly agreeing with the course of the nodes;
i. e. the points in the ecliptic where the moon crosseth that circle as she passeth to her northern or southern latitude; which nodes are called the head and tail of the dragon.

NODO'SITY.† n. s. [nodositè, French, Cotgrave; from nodosus, Latin.] Complication; knot.

These the midwife cutteth off, contriving them into a knot close unto the body of the infant;
from whence ensueth that tortuosity, or complicated
nodosity we call the navel.

It has all the nodosities of the oak without its strength.

NODO'SUS.† adj. [nodorus, Latin.] This NO'DOUS.† is not a word in either form, much in use. Cockeram gives nodosus.† Knotty; full of knots.

This is seldom affected with the gout, and when that becometh nodosa, men continue not long after.

NO'DULE. n. s. [nodulus, Latin.] A small lump.

Those minerals in the strata, are either found in grains, or else they are smoozed into balls, lumps,

oindre.] To anoint.

Anointed with sweet smells and odours.

NOISE.† n. s. [noice, French; which Menage derives from the Latin, noxia, or noxa, employed in the sense of jur- gum, simulata, scolding, strife. Srenius refers it to the Icel. nyga, nidra, stren- idere.]

1. Any kind of sound.

Noises as of waters falling down, sounded about them, and sad visions appeared unto them.

Whether it were a whistling sound, or a melodious noise of birds among the spreading branches, these things made them woe.

Great motions in nature pass without sound or noise. The heavens turn about in a most rapid motion, without noise to us perceived; though in some dreams they have been said to make an excellent music.

Shakes your hearts, while through the isles they hear
A leaping noise, as horrid and as loud
As thunder nakes, before it breaks the cloud.

2. Outcry; clamour; boasting or importunate talk.

What noise have we had about transplantation of diseases, and transfusion of blood.

3. Occasion of talk.

Accuses lived in Athens during the great plague, which has made so much noise through all ages,
and never caught the least infection.

4. A concert; and those who performed a concert. In both meanings obsolete.

Sec, if thou canst find out Bosch's noise,
Mrs. Tanschee would have been some music.

There be guests and meat aw, how shall we do for music?—The smell of the venison, going through the street, will invite one noise of fiddlers or other.

Divinely warbled voice,
Answering the stringed noise. Milton, ode Nativ.

To NOISE. v. a. [from the noun.] To sound loud.

Those terrours, which thou speak'st of, did me none.

I never fear'd they could, though noising loud
And threatening high.

To NOISE. v. a. To spread by rumour, or report.

All these sayings were noised about throughout all the hill country.

I shall not need to relate the affluence of young nobles from hence into Spain, after the voice of our prince's being there had been quickly noised.

They might bus and whisper it one to another;
and tacitly withdrawing from the presence of the spostle, they then lift up their voices, and noised
it about the city.

NO'ISFUL.† adj. [noise and full.] Loud;
clamorous.

A rock-yard in a spring morning is neither so ill, nor noisful, as is one of these.

That enuch, guardian of rich Holland's trade,
Whose noisful valour does no foe invade,
And weak assistance with his friends desire.

NO'ISLESS. adj. [from noise.] Silent;
without sound.

On our quick'n'd decrees,
The inaudible and noisless foot of time
Stalks, ere we can effect them.

So noisless would I live such death to find,
Like timely fruit, not shaken by the wind,
But ripely dropping from the unpleas'd bough.

Covinc'd, that noisless piety might dwell
In secular retreats, and flourish well.

NO'ISINESS. n. s. [from noisy.] Loudness of sound; importunity of clamour.

the letters that form their names. Dict.

NO'MBLES. n. s. The entrails of a deer.

See NOMBLES.

NOME.* n. s. [nome, Greek; from nomos, to feed, and to distribute.]

1. Province; tract of country; an Egyptian government or division.

Zaan or Tunis, the head of a nome, was a most ancient and famous city of the Delta.

The Students, (1750.) vol. i. p. 345.

He told his brethren, that they and his aged father should dwell near him; and he placed them with Pharaoh's own shepherds in the He-liopolis name, which bordered on the Red Sea, and of which the metropolis was On, or Heliopolis.

— This country, being situated some leagues distant from the banks of the Nile, was not subject to the annual inundations of that river, and therefore was a more proper place of residence for shepherds, and the pasturage of flocks, than any other of the Egyptian names.

Maurice, Hist. of Hindostan, vol. ii. (1798.)

2. [from nomem, Latin.] In algebra, a simple quantity affixed to some other quantity by its proper sign.NOMENCLATOR. n. s. [Latin; no- menclator, French.] One who calls things or persons by their proper names.

They were driven to have their nomenculatores, controllers, or remembrancers, to tell them the names of their servants, and people about them, so many they were. Halewell on Providence, p. 421.

What, wilt Cupid turn nomenculatur, and cry children?

J. Jonson, Cynthia's Revels.

There were a set of men in old Rome, called by the name of nomenculatores; that is, in English, men who could call every one by his name.

Addison, Guardian, No. 107.

Are envy, pride, avarice, and ambition, such ill
nomenculatores that they cannot furnish appellations for their owners?

Swift.

NOMENCLATRESS.* n. s. A female no- menclator.

I have a wife who is a nomenculatoress, and will be ready on any occasion to attend the ladies.

Addison, Guard, No. 107.

NOMENCLATURE. n. s. [nomenculatur, Fr.;
nomenculatura, Latin.]

1. The act of naming.

To say where origins cannot fully be reconciled, that there wasteth a term or nomenculatur for it, is but a shift of ignorance. Bacon, Nat. Hist.

2. A vocabulary; a dictionary.

The watery plantations fall not under that no- menclatur of Adam, which unto terrestrial animals assigned a name appropriate unto their nature. Bacon.

NO'MINAL. adj. [nominalis, Latin.] Referring to names rather than to things;
not real; titular.

Profound in all the nominal
And real ways beyond them all. Hudibras.

The nominal definition, or derivation of the word is not sufficient to describe the nature of it.
Purson.

The nominal essence of gold is that complex idea the word stands for; it is a body yellow of a certain weight, malleable, fusible, and fixed.
But the real essence is the constitution of the inseparable parts of that body on which those qualities depend. Locke.

Were these people as anxious for the doctrine essential to the church of England, as they are for the nominal distinction of adhering to its interests.

Addison.

NO'MINAL.* n. s. One of the scholasticians.

NO'MINALIST. n. s. cal philosophers, who maintained that words or names only were to be attended to in all logical disquisitions. "They were called nominalists, because they held universals to be not res, but nominata." Bp. Morton's Discharge, c. 1633, p. 121.

Commentators on Peter Lombard, Scotists, Thomists, Reals, Nominalists.

Burton, Anst. of Med. p. 677.

Superficial men, who cannot get beyond the title of nominalists. B. Jonson, Discoveries.

The faction now of the nominalists and realists being very rare and frequent in the university.

J. Wood, Ann. Univ. Ox. under the year 1541.

TO NO'MINALIZE.* v. a. [nominalis, Latin.]

TO CONVERT INTO A NAME.

Verbs (wherever due circumspection must be used), nominalized, do admit one termination familiarily. Instruct. for Ours. (1682.) p. 32.

NO'MINALLY. adv. [from nominal.] By name; with regard to a name; titularly.

This, nominalis do say, in reality comprehends all else.

Burton, Anst. on the State of the Nation. (1769.)

TO NO'MINATE. v. a. [nomino, Latin.]

1. To name; to mention by name.

Suddenly to nominate them all,
It is impossible. Shakespeare, Hen. VI.

One lady, I may civilly spare to nominate, for her sex's sake, whom he termed the spider of the court. Wotton.

2. To entitle; to call.

Aread, old father, why of late
Didst thou beight me, born of English blood, Whom all a fairy's son doon nominate. Spenser.

3. To set down; to appoint by name.

If you repay me not on such a day, let the favist

Be nominated for an equal pound
Of your fair flesh to be cut off. Shakespeare.

Never having intended, never designed any bias in that name, we cannot expect he should nominate or appoint any person to it. Locke.

NO'MINATELY.* adv. [from nominate.]

Particularly.

Locus religious is that which is assigned to some offices of religion, and *nominate*ly whereby the body of a dead person hath been buried. Spelman.

NOMINATION. n. s. [nomination, French;
from nominate.]

1. The act of mentioning by name.

The forty-one immediate electors of the duke must be all of several families, and of them twenty-five at least concur to this nomination.

Wotton.

Hammond was named to be of the assembly of divines; his invincible loyalty to his prince, and obedience to his mother, the church, not being so valid arguments against his nomination, as the report of his learning and virtue were on the other part, to have some title to him.

Fid. Life of Hammond.

2. The power of appointing.

The nomination of persons to places being so principal and inseparable a flower of his crown, he would reserve to himself. Clarendon.

In England the king has the nomination of an archbishop; and after nomination, he sends a compt d'lire to the dean and chapter, to elect the person elected by him. Asylife.

5. Denomination.

First, shew your nomination.—
Of my name to make declaration,
Without any distinction;
I am called Friendship.

Worcester, Morality of Lusty Jarentus.
Divers characters are given to several persons, by which they are distinguished from all others of the same common denomination.

Parsons on the Creed, Art. 5.

NOMINATIVE.* adj. [in grammar, Nominativus, French.] The epithet of the case that primarily designates the name of any thing, and is called right, in opposition to the other cases called oblique. The nominative case cometh before the verb.

He dares not think a thought that the nominative case governs not the verb. Overbury.

NOMINATOR.* n.s. [nominator, Lat.] One that names or appoints to a place.

While Tiberius Gracchus was creating new consuls, one of the nominators suddenly fell down dead; however, Gracchus proceeded and finished the creation. Bentley, Publ. Lijus, § 52.

NOMINEE.* n.s. A person nominated to any place or office.

NOMOTHEICAL.* adj. [Nomothetes, Greek, a legislator; from nomos, a law, and teino, to establish.] Legislative.

Suppose a monarch, who hath a supreme no-mothetical power to make a law, and when it is made and written, should lay it up in "archival imperi," so that it be not known nor published to his subjects; it is manifest that such a law writer it nor can be obliging till he takes care for the publishing of it. Bp. Barlowe, Hen. p. 126.

NON. adv. [Latin.] Not. It is never used separately, but sometimes prefixed to words with a negative power.

Since you to non regardance cast my faith,
Live you the marble-breasted tyrant slain. Shakspeare.
Behold also there are non-residents, the rich, which in times of peace, too much neglecting their habitations, may seem to have provoked God to neglect them. Halyday.

A mere inclination to matters of duty, men reckon a willing of that kind; when they are justly charged with an actual non-performance of what the law requires. South.

For an account at large of Bishop Sanderson's last judgment concerning God's concurrence or non-concurrence with the actions of men, and the positive injury of sins of commission, I refer you to his letters. Purcell.

The third sort of agreement or disagreement in our ideas, which the perception of the mind is employed about, is, co-existence, or non-existence in the same subject. Locke.

It is not a non-act which introduces a custom, a custom being a common usage.

In the imperial chamber this answer is not admitted, viz. I do not believe it as the matter is alleged. And the reason of this non-admission is, its great uncertainty. Asylife.

As apparitor comes to the church, and informed the parson, that he must pay the tithes to such a man; and the bishop certified the ecclesiastical court under his seal on the non-payment of them, that he refused to pay them. Asylife.

The non-appearance of persons to support the united sense of both houses of parliament, can never be construed as a general diffidence of being able to support the charge against the parson and patience. Swift.

This may be accounted for by the turbulence of passions upon the various and surprising turns of good and evil fortune, in a long evening at play; the mind being wholly taken up, and the consequence of non-attention so fatal. Swift.

NO-NAGE.* n. s. [non and age; nonage, old French, "minority," used in the eleventh century, according to Laconbe.] Minority; time of life before legal maturity.

In him there is a hope of government; Which in his nonage, counsel under him, And in his full and ripen'd years, himself Shall govern well. Shakspeare, Rich. III.

Be lov'd but there, let poor six years Be po'd with the matured fears Man trembles at, we straight shall find Love knows no nonage nor the mind. Crashaw.

We have a mistaken apprehension of antiquity, calling that so which in truth is the world's nonage. Glanville.

'Tis necessary that men should first be out of their nonage, before they can attain to an actual use of this principle; and whilst, that they should be ready to exert and exercise their faculties. Willins.

Those charters were not available for the king's nonage; and if there could have been any such pretence, that alone would not avoid them. Hale.

After Chaucer there was a Spenser, a Harrington, a Fairfax, before Waller and Denham were in being; and our numbers were in their nonage all these last appeared. Dryden.

In their tender nonage, while they spread
Their springing leaves, and lift their infant head, Indulge their childhood, and the curling spare. Dryden.

NO-NAGED.* adj. [from nonage.] Not arrived at due maturity; being in nonage.

Shade not that dual night will blind too soon;
My nonage'd day already points to noon;
How simple is my suit, how small my boon!

Quarles, Embl. lib. 13.
The muse's love appears
In nonage'd youth, as in the length of years.

Brown, Brit. Poet. lib. 15.

NONATTENDANCE.* n. s. [non and attendance.] The not giving personal attendance.

Nonattendance in former parliaments ought to be a bar against the choice of men who have been guilty of it. Ld. Halifax.

NONCE.* n. s. [The original of this word is uncertain; Skinner imagines it to come from non or once; or from nitz, German, need or use; Junius derives it less probably from nonance; to do for the nonce being, according to him, to do it merely for mischief. Dr. Johnson.—

Tyrwhitt and Ritson suppose it to be from the Latin pro-nunc; viz. for the nunc, i.e. for the now, the occasion; the Lat. nunc being corrupted into nonce; and Mr. Tyrwhitt adds that "so non came from the Latin ad-nunc." But non has a very different origin.

The etymology, which Serenius gives of nonce, seems most probable. "Icel, nenam, meaning, arbitrium, will, inclination; Su. Goth. neuma, nenam, a se impetrare posse;" i.e. to prevail with one's self to do a thing, to have a mind to do it: an etymology, to which

Dr. Jamieson had also inclined before he saw the observation of Serenius. Our word was formerly written nonas and naves; as nonas by R. of Gloucester and Chaucer, and naves in the old Romance of Ywaine and Gawain. This is in favour of the northern etymon. Mr. Chalmers, however, has supposed it to be from the French nonce, a nuncio, the prelate whom the pope used to send for his special purposes, for the nonce; noncier, in the Rom. de la Rose, for annoncer.] Purpose; intent; design. Not now in use.

I saw a wolf
Nursing two whelps; I saw her little ones
In wanton dalliance the foot to crave,
While she her neck wreath'd from them for the nonce. Spenser.

They used at first to fume the fish in a house built for the nonce. Cervus.

When in your motion you are hot,
And that he calls for drink, I'll have prepar'd him
A chalice for the nonce. Shakspeare, Hamlet.

Such a light and metall'd dance,
Saw you never?
And they lead men for the nonce,
That turn round like griddle-stones. B. Jonson.

A voider for the nonce,
I wrong the devil should I pick their bones. Clarendon.

Coming ten times for the nonce,
I never yet could see it flow but once. Catlin.

NONCOMPLIANCE.* n. s. [non and compliance.] Refusal to comply with any request.

The first act of non-compliance sendeth you to gaol again. Ld. Halifax.

NONCONFORMING.* adj. [non and conform.] Not joining in the established religion.

A non-conforming minister of eminence. Durke.

NONCONFORMIST.* n. s. [non and conformist.]

1. One who refuses to comply with others. Is it just, is it handsome, that I should be a non-conformist either in the publick sorrow or joy? Barnes, vol. iii. S. 9.

2. One who refuses to join in the established worship.

On his death-bed he declared himself a non-conformist, and had a fanatical preacher to be his spiritual guide. Swift.

NONCONFORMITY.* n. s. [non and conformity.]

1. Refusal of compliance.

The non-conformity of Mr. Maker, whether discovered by reason or revelation, carries the highest authority with it; a conformity or non-conformity to it, determines their actions to be morally good or evil. Watts, Logic.

2. Refusal to join in the established religion.

Since the liturgy, rites, and ceremonies of our church, are so much stress, and all upon a plea of conscience, it will concern us to examine the force of this plea, which our adversaries are still setting up as the grand pillar and buttress of non-conformity. South, Sermon.

The lady will plead the toleration which allows her non-conformity in this particular. Addison, Spect.

NONDESCRIBT.* adj. [non and descript, old French.] Undescribed; used also as a substantive for any natural production that has not been described.

A modern word.

None. adj. [ne one; nan, ne ane, Saxon.]
1. Not one: used both of persons and things.

Ye shall see when none pursueth you.
Lev. xvi. 17.

That killing power is none of thine,
I gave it to thy voice and eyes;
Thy sweets, thy graces, all are mine;
Thou art my star, shin'st in my skies. Carver.

That fowl which is none of the lightest, can easily move itself up and down in the air without stirring its wings. Wilson.

Another, which is none of the least advantages of hope is, its great efficacy in preserving us from sitting too high a value on present enjoyments.

Addison, Spect.

2. Not any: no was in this sense used anciently before a consonant, and none before a vowel.

Six days shall ye gather it, but on the sabbath
there shall be none. Exod. xvi. 26.

Thy life shall hang in doubt, and thou shalt have no assurance of this life. Deut. xxvii. 66.

Before the deluge, the air was calm; none of those tumultuous motions of vapours, which the mountains and winds cause in ours. Barnet, Theory.

The most glaring and notorious passages, are none of the finest. Edmon on the Classics.

3. Not other.
This is none other but the house of God, and the gate of heaven. Gen. xlviii. 17.

4. None of sometimes signifies only emphatically nothing.
My people would not hear to my voice;
and Israel would notarken to my voice;
Ps. lxxxi. 11.

5. None is always used when it relates to a substantive going before; as, we shall have no wine: wine we shall have none.
6. None seems originally to have signified according to its derivation, not one, and therefore to have had no plural, but it is now used plurally.

Terms of peace were none
Vouchsaf'd. Milton, P. L.

In at this gate none pass
The vigilance here plac'd, but such as come Well known from heav'n. Milton, P. L.

Not think though men were none
That heaven would want spectators, God want

None'stity. n. s. [non and entity.]

1. Nonexistence; the negation of being.
When they say nothing from nothing, they must understand it as excluding all causes. In which sense it is most evidently true; being equivalent to this proposition, that nothing can make itself, or, nothing cannot bring its self out of nonentity into something. Benidley.

2. A thing not existing.
There was no such thing as rendering evil for evil, when evil was truly a nonentity, and no where to be found. South.

We have heard, and think it thy that year inquisitive genius should not be better employed, than in looking after that philosophical nonentity.
Archibald and Pope.

Nonks. n. s. [from nonks, Latin.]

1. Certain days in each month of the old Roman calendar.
The nones were so called, because they reckoned nine days from them to the ides.

Rennet, Rom. Antiq.

2. Prayers formerly so called. See the etymology of Noon.

No'nsucru. n. s. The name of an apple.

NONEXISTENCE. n. s. [non and existence.]

1. Inexistence; negation of being.

How uncomfortable would it be to lie down in a temporary state of non-existence! How delirious it is to think that there is a world of spirits; that we are surrounded with intelligent living beings, rather than in a lonely, unconscious universe, a wilderness of matter!

A. Baxter on the Soul, ii. 169.

2. The thing not existing.
A method of many writers, which depreciates the esteem of miracles is, to solve not only real verities, but also non-existences. Brown, Fidei Err.

NONJURING. adj. [non and juro, Latin.] Belonging to those who will not swear allegiance to the Hanoverian family.

This objection was offered me by a very polite, learned, and worthy gentleman of the nonjuring party. Swift.

NONJUROR. n. s. [from non and juror.]

One who, conceiving James II. unjustly deposed, refuses to swear allegiance to those who have succeeded him.

The nonconformists were then exactly upon the same foot with our nonjurers now, whom we double-tax, forbid their conventicles, and keep under hatches, without thinking ourselves possessed with a persecuting spirit, because we know they want nothing but the power to ruin us.
Swift, Exam. No. 36.

NONNATURAL. n. s. [non naturalia.]

Physicians reckon these to be six, viz.
air, meat and drink, sleep and watching, motion and rest, retention and excretion,
and the passions of the mind.

The six nonnaturalia are such as neither naturally constitute, nor merely destructive, do preserve or destroy according to circumstances. Brown.

NONNIN. n. s. In Norfolk, the same as ninny, which see. Mr. Stevens upon the words from the old song in Hamlet,
"hey ho nonny," observes that, among the common people in Norfolk, to nonny signifies to trifle or play with. Ninny
nonny is one of the colloquial expressions so frequent in our language for the sake of rhyme, alliteration, or jingle.

NON-OBSTANTE. [Latin: non-ob- stant, old French.] Notwithstanding any thing to the contrary: a law phrase.

I ask no dispensation now
To falsify a tear, or sigh, or vow;
I do not sue from thee to draw
A non-alibi on nature's law. Donne, Poems, p. 28.

If in any one point, never so small, we may set aside, or supersede, the rule delivered down to us from the beginning with our non-obstantes and notwithstanding. Bibbels, Bibl. i. 504.

NONPARILL. n. s. [non and pareil, French.]

1. Excellence unequalled.
My lord and master loves you: O such love
Could be but recompens'd tho' you were crown'd
The nonpareil of beauty. Shakspeare, Tw. Night.

2. A kind of apple.

3. Printers' letter of a small size, on which small Bibles and Common Prayers are printed.

NONPARILL. adj. Peerless. Bullock.
In the mean time the most nonpareil beauty of the world, beauteous knowledge, standeth unregarded, or cloistered up in mere speculation.

Whitlock, Memo. of the Eng. (1654), p. 204.

NONPLUS. n. s. [non and plus, Latin.]
Puzzle; inability to say or do more.
A low word.

Let it seem never so strange and impossible, the nonplus of my reason will yield a fairer opportunity to my faith. South.

One or two rules, on which their conclusions depend, in most men have govern'd all their thoughts: take these from them and they are at a loss, and their understanding is perfectly at a nonplus. Lacke.

Such an artist did not begin the matter at a venture, and when put to a nonplus, pause and besitate which way he should proceed; but he had first in his comprehensive intellect a complete idea of the whole organic body. Benidley.

TO NO'PLUS. v. a. [from the noun.]
To confound; to puzzle; to put to a stand;
to stop.

Nor is the composition of our own bodies the only wonder; we are as much nonplus by the most contemptible worm and plant. Glanville, Scquis.

His parts were so accomplished,
That right or wrong he ne'er was nonplus. Hudibras.

That sin that is a pich beyond all others, must needs be such an one as nonplus the devil himself to proceed further. South.

What, you are confounded, and stand mute?
Some what nonplus to hear you deny your name. Dryden.

Tom has been eloquent for half an hour together, when he has been *nonplus*ed by Mr. Dry's desiring him to tell what it was that he had endeavoured to prove. Spectator.

NONPROFICIENT. n. s. [non and proficient.] One who has made no progress in the art or study in which he is engaged.

God hath in nature given every man inclination to one particular calling; in which if he follow, he excels; if he cross, he proves a non-proficient.
Dip. Mail, Italy Observ.

NONRESIDENCE. n. s. [non and residence.]

Failure of residence.
If the character of persons chosen into the church had been regarded, there would be fewer complaints of non-residence. Swift.

NONRESIDENT. n. s. [non and resident.]
One who neglects to live at the proper place.

As to nonresidents, there are not ten clergymen in the kingdom who can be termed nonresidents.
Swift.

NONRESIDENT. adj. Not residing in the proper place.

Her household is her charge; her care to that makes her seldom non-resident. Overbury, Character.

NONRESISTANCE. n. s. [non and resistance.] The principle of not opposing the king; ready obedience to a superior.

If the doctor had pretended to have stated the particular bounds and limits of non-resistance, he would have been much to blame.

Sir Joseph Jebb at Sackville's Trial.

NONRESISTANT. adj. Not resisting; un-opposing.

This is that (Edipus, whose wisdom can reconcile inconsistent opposites, and teach passive obedience, and non-resistance principles to despise government, and to fly in the face of sovereign authority. Archibald.

NONSENSE. n. s. [non and sense.] This word is said by F. Heylin, in 1636, to be new and unorth. But Mr. Malone observes that Anthony Stafford, in his Meditations printed in 1611, uses it; writing it, however, non-sense, apparently as a new word. It continued to be so written, I may add, long after; and had the accent on sen; as in an Elegy on the death of Donne, at the end of his Poems. This word is not in Shakespeare.]

1. Unmeaning or ungrammatical language.

Till understood, all tales, Hudibras.
Like nonsense are not true nor false.
Many copies dispersed gathering new faults,
I saw more nonsense than I could have crammed into it.

This nonsense got into all the following editions by a mistake of the stage editors. Pope on Shalop.

2. Trifles; things of no importance. A low word.

What's the world to him?
*Tis nonsense all. Thomson.
NONSENSICAL, adj. [from nonsense.] Unmeaning; foolish.

They had produced many other inept combinations, or aggregate forms of particular things, and nonsensical systems of the whole.

Ray on the Creation.
NONSENSICALLY, adv. [from nonsensical.] Foolishly; ridiculously.

Never was any thing more nonsensically pleasant.
L'Estrange, Tr. of Cicero.

NONSENSICALNESS, n. s. [from nonsensical.] Ungrammatical jargon; foolish absurdity.

NONSENSITIVE, n. s. [non and sensitive.] One that wants sense or perception.

Whatever we preach of contentment in want, no precepts can so gain upon nature as to make her a nonsensitive. Fieldham, Ret. i. 18.

NONSOLVENCY, n. s. [non and solvency.] Inability to pay.

Probably some of the purchasers may be content to live cheap in a worse country, rather than be at the charge of exchange, and agencies, and perhaps of a nonsolvency in absence, if they let their lands too high. Swift, Proposal for paying the Nat. Debt.

NONSOLVENT, adj. [non and solvent.] Who cannot pay his debts.

NONSOLUTION, n. s. [non and solution.] Failure of solution.

Athenaus instances enigmatical propositions, and the forfeitures and rewards upon their solution and modulation. Browne.

NONSPARING, adj. [non and sparing.] Merciless; all destroying.

It's I espouse
Those tender limbs of thine to the event
Of the nonsparing war. Shakespeare, All's Well.

NO'SUIT, n. s. [non and suit.] Stoppage of a suit at law; a renouncing of the suit by the plaintiff, most commonly upon the discovery of some error or defect, when the matter is so far proceeded in, as the jury is ready at the bar to deliver their verdict. Coxe.

If the plaintiff is guilty of delays against the rules of law in any stage of the action, a nonsuit is entered. Blackstone.

TO NO'SUIT, v. a. [non and suit.] To deprive of the benefit of a legal process, for some failure in the management.

The addresses of both houses of parliament, the council, and the declarations of most counties and corporations, are laid aside as of no weight, and the whole kingdom of Ireland nonsuited, in default of appearance. Swift.

NO'ODLE, n. s. [from noddle or noddy.] A fool; a simpleton.

NOOK, n. s. [from en noek, Teut. angulus.] In some parts of the north of England, this word is pronounced newt. Noek-shotten, which Shakespeare uses for shooting out into nooks, is, in some places, according to Mr. Pegge, a modern application to a wall in a bevel, and not at right angles with another wall.] A corner; a covert made by an angle or intersection.

Safely in harbour,
In the king's ship, in the deep road, where once
Thou call'dst me up. Shakespeare, Tempest.
Buy a slobbery and a dirty farm,
In that nook-shotten side of Albion.

Shakespeare, Hen. V.
Thus entered the light-excluding cave,
And through it sought some inmost nooks to save
The gold. Chapman.
The savages were driven out of their great Ards, into a little nook of land near the river of Strangford; where they now possess a little territory. Davies.

Meander, who is said so intricate to be,
Hath not so many turns, nor cranking nooks as she. Dryden.

Unsphere
The spirit of Plato, to unfold
What wonders or what vast regions hold
The immortal mind, that hath forsook
Her mansion in this feeble moid. Milton, Il Pens.

Ithuriel and Zephon,
Search through this garden, leave unsearch'd no nook. Milton, P. L.
A third form'd within the ground
A various mould; and from the boiling cells,
By strange conveyance fill'd each hollow nook. Milton, P. L.

NOON, n. s. [non, Saxon; nenen, Welsh; name, Erse; supposed to be derived from nona, Latin, the ninth hour, at which their corn or chief meal was eaten; whence the other nations called the time of their dinner or chief meal, though earlier in the day, by the same name. Dr. Johnson.—The ninth hour, or noon, (Sax. non.) was three o'clock in the afternoon. Thus the nones, a name given to certain prayers, began at twelve, and ended at three in the afternoon, which was called high noon. See Gloss. to Wicliffe, edit. Baber. Serenius says that the ancient Icelanders divided the day into four intervals, of which noon, so called, was that from twelve till three; "quo durante," he adds, "post sesquihoram nimirum à meridie clapsam prandium sumebant."]

1. The middle hour of the day; twelve; the time when the sun is in the meridian; midday.

Fetch forth the stocks, there shall he sit till noon.—
Till noon 'till night, my lord. Shalop, A. Lear.
The day already half his race had run,
And summer'd him to due repast at noon. Dryden.
If I turn my eyes at noon towards the sun,
I cannot avoid the ideas which the light or sun produces in me. Locke.

In days of poverty his heart was light;
He sung his hymns at morning, noon, and night. Harrie.

2. It is taken for midnight.

Full before him at the noon of night,
He saw a quire of ladies. Dryden.

NOOK, adj. Meridional.

How oft the noon, how oft the midnight tell,
That iron tongue of death 't with solemn knell,

On folly's errands, as we vainly roam,
Knocks at our hearts, and fluds our thoughts from home. Young.

NOO'NDAY, n. s. [noon and day.] Midday.

The bird of night did sit,
E'er at noonday, upon the market place,
Hooting and shrieking. Shakespeare, Jul. Cæs.

The dimness of our intellectual eyes, Aristotle silly compares to those of an owl at noonday. Boyle.

NOO'NDAY, adj. Meridional.

The scorching sun was mounting high,
In all its lustre to the noonday sky. Addison, Ovid.

NOO'NING, n. s. [from noon.]

1. Repose at noon; noon-rest; sleeping in the day-time. Holcot.

2. Repeat at noon.

If he disposed to take a whet, a nooning, an erring's draught, or a bottle after midnight, he goes to the club, and finds a knot of friends to his mind. Addison, Spect. No. 72.

NOO'STEAD, n. s. [noon and stead.] The station of the sun at noon.

The free sun,
That tow'r'd the noon-stead half his course had run.
Dryden, David and Goliath.

Dew which there had tarried long,
And on the ranker grass till past the noonday long.
Dryden, Polyph. S. 13.

Whilst the main tree, still stand Upright and sound,
By this sun's noonday made
So great, his body now alone protects the shade.
St. James, Underwoods.

NOO'TIDE, n. s. [noon and tide.] Mid-day; time of noon.

Sorrow breaks seasons and reposing hours,
Makes the night morning, and the noonday night. Shakespeare.

NOO'TIDE, adj. Meridional.

Phædon hath tumbled from his car,
And made an evening at the noonday prick. Shakespeare.

All things in best order to invite Noonday repast, or afternoon's repose. Milton, P. L.

We expect the morning red in vain;
'Tis hid in vapours, or obscured 't in rain.
The noonday yellow we in vain require;
'Tis black in storm, or red in lightning fire. Prior.

NOOSE, n. s. [nosada, entangled; a word found in the glosses of Lipsius. Lye.] A running knot, which the more it is drawn binds the closer.

Can't thou with a weak angle strike the whale?
Catch with a hook, or with a noose intrals? Bends.

Where the hangman does dispose,
To special friend the knot of noose. Hudibras.

They run their necks into a noose.
They'd break 'em after, to break loose. Hudibras.

Falsely he falls into some dangerous noose,
And then in manly labours to get loose. Dryd.

A rope and a noose are no jesting matters. Arbuthnot, J. Bull.

TO NOOSE, v. a. [from the noun.] To tie in a noose; to catch; to entrap.

The sin is woven with threads of different size, yet the fate of them strong enough to noose and entrap us. Gen. of the Tempter, p. 40.

NOPE, n. s. [rabucilla.] A kind of bird called a bulfinch or redtail.

By that warbling bird the woodcock place we then,
The redparrow, the nope, the redbreast, and the wren. Dryden, Polyph. S. 13.

NOR, conjunct. [ne or.]

1. A particle marking the second or subsequent branch of a negative proposition: correlative to neither or not.

I neither love, nor fear thee. Shakespeare.

Neither love will twine, nor bay. Marvell.

2. Two negatives are sometimes joined, but not according to the propriety of our present language, though rightly in the Saxon.

Mine eyes,

Which I have darted at thee, hurt thee not;

Now, I am sure there is no force in eyes.

That can do hurt. Shakespeare. As you like it.

3. Neither is sometimes included in nor, but not elegantly.

Before her gates kill wolves and lions lay;
Which with her virtuous drugs so tame she made,
That wolves, nor lion would one man invade.

Chapman.

Pow'r, disgrace, nor death could ought divert
Thy glorious tongue, thus to reveal thy heart.

Danied.

Simons nor Xanthus shall be wanting there;

A new Achilles shall in arms appear. Dryden.

4. Nor is in poetry used in the first branch for neither.

Idle nymph, I pray thee, be

Modest, and not follow me,

I nor love myself nor thee. B. Jonson.

Nor did they not perceive their evil plight—

Or the fierce pains not felt. Milton, P. L.

But how perplexed, alas! is human fate!

I whom nor avarice, nor pleasures move;

Yet must myself be made a slave to love. Wals.

The more to aggravate the note,
With a foul traitor's name stuff I thy throat. Shakspeare.

5. Account; information; intelligence; notice. Not used.

She that from Naples
Can have no note; unless the sun were poe,
The man i' th' moon's too slow. Shakspeare, Tempest.

In suits of favour, the first coming ought to take little place; so far forth consideration may be had of his trust, that if intelligence of the matter could not otherwise have been had, but by him, advantage he is not taken of the note, but the party left to his other means, and in some sort recommended for his discovery. Bacon.

6. State of being observed.

VOL. II.

Small matters come with great commendation, because they are continually in use and in note; whereas the occasion of any great virtue cometh but on festivals. Bacon.

7. Tune; voice; harmonick or melodious sound.

These are the notes wherewith are drawn from the hearts of the multitude so many sighs; with these tunes their minds are exasperated against the lawful guides and governors of their sense. Hooker.

The wakeful bird tunes her nocturnal note.

Milton, P. L.

I now must change those notes to tragedy.

Milton, P. L.

You that can tune your sounding string so well,
Of ladies' beauties and of love to tell;
Once change your note, and let your lute report
The justest grief that ever touch'd the court. Waller.

One common note on either lyre did strike,
And knaves and fools we both abhor'd alike. Dryden.

8. Single sound in music.

From harmony, from heavenly harmony!

This universal frame began:

From harmony to harmony,

Through all the compass of the notes it ran,

The diapason closing full in man. Dryden.

9. Short hint; small paper; memorial register.

He will'd me

In heedfullest reparation to bestow them,

As notes whose faculties inclusive were

More than they were in note. Shakspeare.

In the body's prison so she lies,

As through the body's windows she must look,

Her divers powers of sense to exercise,

By gathering notes out of the world's great book. Danica.

Think on thy Protheus, when thou haply seest

Some rare note-worthy object in thy travel.

Shakspeare, Two Gent. of Verona.

Two are especially note-worthy in their steeples, being small but exceeding high towers.

Sir T. Herbert, Twr. p. 129.

NOTHING, n. s. [no and thing; nothing, Scottish.]

1. Negation of being; nonentity; universal negation; opposed to something.

It is most certain, that there never could be nothing. For, if there could have been an instant, wherein there was nothing, then either nothing made something, or something made it self; and so was, and acted, before it was. But if there never could be nothing; then there is, and was, a being of necessity, without any beginning.

Græv.

We do not create the world from nothing and by nothing; we assert an eternal God to have been the efficient cause of it. Bentley.

This nothing is taken either in a vulgar or philosophical sense; so we say there is nothing in the cup in a vulgar sense, when we mean there is no liquor in it; but we cannot say there is nothing in the cup, in a strict philosophical sense, while there is air in it. Watts, Logic.

2. Nonexistence.

Mighty states characters are grated
To dusty nothing. Shakespeare, Twelfth and Cress.

3. Not any thing; no particular thing.

There shall nothing die. Eccl. ix. 4.

Nothing at all was done, while any thing remained undone. Addison on the War.

4. Not other thing.

Nothing but a steady resolution brought to practice; God's grace used, his commandments obeyed, and his pardon begged; nothing but this will intitle you to God's acceptance. Watts, Prep. for Death.

Words are made to declare something; where they are, by those who pretend to instruct, otherwise used, they conceal indeed something; but that which they conceal, is nothing but the ignorance, error, or supposition of the talker, for there is, in truth, nothing else under them. Locke.

5. No quantity or degree.

The report which the troops of horse make, would add nothing of courage to their fellows. Clarendon.

6. No importance; no use; no value.

The outward show of churches draws the rude people to the reverencing and frequenting thereof, whatever some of our late too nice fools say, there is nothing in the seemly form of the church. Spenser on Ireland.

Behold, ye are of nothing, and your work of naught. Isaiah.

7. No possession or fortune.

A most homely shepherd; a man that from very nothing is grown into an unpeppable estate. Shakespeare, Winter Tale.

8. No difficulty; no trouble.

We are industrious to preserve our bodies from slavery, but we make nothing of suffering our souls to be slaves to our lusts. Ray on the Creation.

9. A thing of no proportion.

The charge of making the ground, and otherwise is great, but nothing to the profit. Bacon, Nat. Hist.

10. Trifle; something of no consideration or importance.

I had rather have one scratch my head if 'th' sun, When the alarm were struck, than idly sit
To bear my nothings unnoted. Shakespeare.
My dear nothings, take your leave,
No longer must you me deceive. Crahan.

'Tis nothing, says the fool; but says the friend,
This nothing, sir, will bring you to your end.
Do I not see your dropsy-die swell? Dryden.

That period includes more than a hundred sentences that might be writ to express multiplication of nothing, and all the fatiguing periphrasis of having no business to do. Pope, Lett.

Narcissus is the glory of his race;
For who does nothing with a better grace? Young.

11. Nothing has a kind of adverbial signification. In no degree; not at all.

Who will make me a liar, and make my speech nothing worth? Job, xlii. 25.
Auria, nothing dismayed with the greatness of the Turk's fleet, will kept on his course. Kneller, Hist.

NOTHINGNESS. n. s. [from nothing.]

This is done with little notice; very quick the actions of the mind are performed. Locke.

How ready is every to mingle with the notice which we take of other persons! Watts.

2. Information; intelligence given or received.

I have given him notice, that the duke of Cornwall and his duchess will be here. Shakespeare, K. Lear.

To NOTICE. v. a. [from the noun. Mr. Mason has pretended, that this is a word imported into English conversation from Ireland. So far from its being such an innovation, it is, as Mr. Malone has observed, of great age in our language. To notice; to need; to observe; to regard.

As some do perceive, ye and like it well, they should be so noticed. T. Howard, in Harrington's Niger Art. (about 1608).

These pieces contain several curious circumstances of Milton's early life, situations, friendships, and connections; which are often so friendly, or implicitly noticed, as to need examination and collation. Warton, Pref. to Milton's Sm. Poems.

It is impossible not to notice a strange comment of Mr. Lindsay's. Bp. Horne, Lett. to Dr. Priestley, p. 41.

NOTIFICATION. n. s. [notification, French, from notify.] Act of making known; representation by marks or symbols.

Four or five torches elevated or depressed out of their order, either in breadth or longways, may, by agreement, give great variety of notifications. Haller on Speech.

TO NOTIFY. v. a. [to notify, French; notifico, Latin.] To declare; to make known; to publish.

There are other kind of laws, which notify the will of God. Hooker.

Good and evil operate upon the mind of man, by those respective appellations by which they are notified and conveyed to the mind. South.

This solar month is by civil sanction notified in authentic calendars the chief measure of the year; a kind of standard by which we measure time. Haller.

NOTION. n. s. [notion, French; notio, Latin.]

1. Thought; representation of any thing

formed by the mind; idea; image; conception.

Being we are at this time to speak of the proper notion of the church, therefore I shall not look upon it as comprehending any more than the sense of men. Ferguson.

The fiction of some beings which are not in nature; second notions, as the logicians call them, has been added on the conjunction of two natures, which have a real separate being. Dryden, St. of Innocence.

Many actions are punished by law, that are acts of logistivity; but this is merely accidental to them, as they are such acts; for if they were punished properly under that notion, and upon that account, the punishment would equally reach all actions of the same kind. South.

What hath been generally agreed on, I content myself to assume under the notion of principles, in order to what I have further to write. Newton, Opticks.

There is nothing made a more common subject of discourse than nature and its laws; and yet few agree in their notions about it. Chapin, Phil. Princ.

That notion of hunger, cold, sound, colour, thought, wish, or fear, which is in the mind, is called the idea of hunger, cold, sound, wish, &c. Watts, Logic.

2. Sentiment; opinion.

God hath bid dwell far off all anxious cares, And not molest us; unless we ourselves Seek them with wandering thoughts and notions vain. Milton, P. L.

It would be incredible to a man who has never been in France, should one relate the extravagant notion they entertain of themselves, and the mean opinion they have of their neighbours. Adrian, Freshwater.

Sensual wit they were, whose wit is subtle took pleasure in ridiculing the notion of a life to come. Atterbury.

3. Sense; understanding; intellectual power. This sense is frequent in Shakespeare, but not in use.

NOTIONAL. adj. [from notion.]

1. Imaginary; ideal; intellectual; subsisting only in idea; visionary; fantastical.

The general and indefinite contemplations and notions of the elements and their conjunctions, of the influences of heaven, are to be set aside, being but notional and ill-limited; and definite axioms are to be drawn out of measured instances. Bacon, Nat. Hist.

Happiness, object of that waking dream Which we call life, mistaking; fugitive dreams Of my pursuing verse, ideal shade, Prior.

Natural good, by fancy only made. We must be wary, lest we sacrifice any real substance or personality to this nature or character; for it is merely a notional and imaginary thing; an abstract universal, which is properly nothing; a conception of our own making, occasioned by our reflecting upon the settled course of things; denoting only thus much, that all these bodies move and act according to their essential properties, without any consciousness or intention of so doing. Beattie.

2. Dealing in ideas, not realities.

The most forward notional diction at down in a contented ignorance. Glanville, Scops.

NOTIONALITY. n. s. [from notional.]

Empty, ungrounded opinion. Not now in use.

I aimed at the advance of science, by discrediting empty and talkative *notional*ity. Glanville.

True and manly religion is no cold and comfortable thing; it is not a lukewarm nationality, not a formal and bayardly record of duties, not a dull "temperamentum ad pondus," as they call it; but is lively, vigorous, and sparkling.

Goodman, West. Ec. Cong. P. iii.

NOTIONALLY adv. [from notional.] In idea; mentally; in our conception, though not in reality.

The whole national nature of man consists of two faculties, understanding and will, whether really or notionally distinct, I shall not dispute.

Norris, Miscell.

NOTIONIST n. s. [from notion.] One who holds an ungrounded opinion. Not in use.

Content not yourselves with some part of it, that you read, the Gospel, or New Testament, but neglect the Old, as is the practice of some Irish nationists.

Bp. Hopkins, Epist. of the Lord's Prayer, p. 297.

NOTORIETY n. s. [from notoriety, French; from notorious.] Public knowledge; public exposure.

We see what a multitude of pagan testimonies may be produced for all those remarkable passages; and indeed of several that more than answer your expectation, as they were not subjects in their own nature so exposed to public notoriety.

Addison on the Chr. Religion.

NOTORIOUS adj. [from notorius, Lat.; notoire, French.] Publicly known; evident to the world; apparent; not hidden. It is commonly used of things known to their disadvantage; whence by those who do not know the true signification of the word, an atrocious crime is called a notorious crime, whether public or secret.

What need you make such ado in cloaking a matter too notorious? Whitgift.

The goodness of your interpreted packets. You write to the pope against the king; your goodness,

Since you provoke me, shall be most notorious.

Shakespeare.

I shall have law in Ephesus,

To your notorious shame. Shakespeare, Com. of Err.

In the time of king Edward III, the impediments of the conquest of Ireland are notorious? Darwin.

This Presbyterian man of war congratulated a certain notorious murderer, committed by a scolar of his own division. Whit.

We think not fit to condemn the most notorious malefactor before he hath had licence to propose his plea. Fell.

What notorious vice is there that do not blemish a man's reputation? Tilston.

The inhabitants of Naples have always very notorious for leading a life of laziness and pleasure, which arises partly out of the plenty of their country, and partly out of the temper of their climate. Addison on Italy.

The bishops have procured some small advancement of rents; although it be notorious that they do not receive the third penny of the real value.

Suff. Miscell.

NOTORIOUSLY adv. [from notorious.] Publicly; evidently; openly.

NOTT adj. [hnot, Saxon.] Smooth; shorn. Nott sheep, i. e. sheep without horns: Essex. That field is nott, i. e. well tilled: Berkshire. Grose. Hence the adjectives, now obsolete, nott-headed, nott-pated, having the hair cut short; from the "head being like a nut," according to Mr. Tyrwhitt and others. But the Saxon word hnot, is smooth, cropped, shorn.

A nott head hadde he, with a leusine virgin.

Chaucer, C. T. Prod.

To NOTT v. a. To shear. Dr. Johnson cites this verb on the authority of Ainsworth. It is in the dictionary of Barret in 1580.

He caused — from thenceforth his beard to be notted, and no more shaven.

Stowe, Ann. under the Year 1555.

NOTTWEAT n. s. [not and wheat.]

Of what there are two sorts; French, which is bearded, and requirith the best soil, and nottweat, so termed because it is unbarbed, being contented with a meane earth. Curcus.

NOTWITHSTANDING conj. [This word, though in conformity to other writers called here a conjunction, is properly a participial adjective, as it is compounded of not and withstanding, and answers exactly to the Latin non obstante. It is most properly and analogically used in the ablative case absolute with a noun; as, he is rich notwithstanding his loss; it is not so proper to say, he is rich notwithstanding he has lost much; yet this mode of writing is too frequent; Addison has used it; but when a sentence follows, it is more grammatical to insert that; as, he is rich notwithstanding that he has lost much. When notwithstanding is used absolutely, the expression is elliptical, this, or that being understood, as in the following passages of Hooker.]

1. Without hindrance or obstruction from.

Those on whom Christ bestowed miraculous cures, were so transported that their gratitude made them, notwithstanding his prohibition, proclaim the wonders he had done for them.

Devery of Chr. Piety.

2. Although. This use is not proper.

A person languishing under an ill habit of body, may lose several ounces of blood, notwithstanding it will weaken him for a time, in order to put a new ferment into the remaining mass, and draw into it fresh supplies. Addison.

3. Nevertheless; however.

They which honour the law as an image of the wisdom of God himself, are notwithstanding to know that the same had an end in Christ. Hooker.

The knowledge is small, which we have on earth concerning things that are done in heaven: notwithstanding this much we know even of secrets in heaven, that they pray. Hooker.

He hath a tear for pity, and a hand

Open as day, for melting charity:

Yet notwithstanding, being incens'd, 'tis his flint;

As humorous as winter. Shakespeare, Hen. IV.

NOTUS n. s. [Latin.] The southwind.

With adverse blast upturns them from the south Notus, and after black with thunderous clouds

From Serrations. Milton, P. E.

Waterland.

2. A writer of news. Not now in use.

My contemporaries the novellists have, for the better spinning out paragraphs, and working down to the end of their columns, a most happy art in saying and unsaying, giving hints of intelligence, and interpretations of indifferent actions, to the great disturbance of the brains of ordinary readers.

Taiter, No. 178.

3. A writer of novels, or tales. This is a modern usage of the word.

The best stories of the early and original Italian novellists,—appeared in an English dress, before the close of the reign of Elizabeth.

Johnson, Hist. E. P. iii. 487.
Our novellists, like Sam Foote in his career, often touch upon real characters.

Peggs, Amusing. vii. 21.

To NOVELLIZE.* v. a. [from novel.] To innovate; to change by introducing novelties.

The novellizing spirit of man lives by variety, and the new faces of things.

Brown, Chr. Mor. i. 25.

M. Wilkinson, not taken out of the depth of divinity, but fitly chosen to discover how affections do stand to be novellized by the mutability of the present times. See E. Derang's Speeches, p. 44.
The Holy Scriptures should be interpreted not by novellizing humours, but by the primitive fathers and councils.

Archd. Answay, Tablet of Mod. (1661), p. 54.

NOVELTY.† n. s. [novellus, old French.] To innovate; state of being unaltered to former times.

They which do that which men of account did before them, are, although they do unwin, yet the less faulty, because they are not the authors of harm; and doing well, their actions are freed from prejudice or novelty.

Hooker.

2. Freshness; recentness; newness with respect to a particular person.

Novelty is only in request; and it is dangerous to be aged in any kind of course.

Shakespeare, Moss for Moss.

As religion cotermines our speculations with great objects, so it coterminates with new; and novelty is the great parent of pleasure; upon which account it is that men are so much pleased with variety.

South.

NOVEMBER. n. s. [Latin.] The eleventh month of the year, or the ninth reckoned from March, which was, when the Romans named the months, accounted the first.

November is drawn in a garment of changeable green, and black upon his head.

Beaumont on Drumming.

NOVENARY. n. s. [novennarius, Lat.] Number of nine; nine collectively.

Ptolemy by parts and numbers implieth climacterical years; is septuagaries and novennaries.

Brown.

Looking upon them as in their original differences and combinations, and as selected out of a natural stock of nine questions, four novennaries, their nature and differences lie most obvious to be understood.

Holder.

NOVENNAL.* adj. [novennus, Lat.] Done every ninth year.

NOVE'RCAL.* adj. [novercalis, from novem, Latin.] Having the manner of a stepmother; becoming a stepmother.

When the whole tribe of birds by incubation, produce their young, it is a wonderful deviation, that some few families should do it in a more novercal way.

Derham.

NOUGHT.† n. s. [ne aught, not any thing, Saxon: as therefore we write ought not ought for any thing, we write ought not ought to analogy, write ought not ought for nothing; but a custom has irreversibly prevailed of using naught for bad, and naught for nothing. Dr. Johnson.

—This custom originated in the desire of distinguishing, injudiciously conducted. There is indeed no real ground for a distinction; the word naught, in the sense of wicked, being only a figurative signification of naught, nothing; meaning worthless, or nothing worth, nothing in point of value or goodness. Nares, Elem. of Orthoepey, p. 300. —The regular deduction of this word, from its original, will warrant the writing it either naught or ought: M. Goth. nivauht, from ni, the negative particle, and vauht, the smallest thing possible, our whit; and thus the Sax. naiph, and also noph; naught, and noht. See also WHIT.

1. Not any thing; nothing.

Who cannot see this palpable device?

Yet win so bold, but says he sees it not?

Had is the world, and it will come to naught,
When such ill dealings must be seen in thought.

Shakespeare.

Such smiling rogues as these south'er'y passions:
Renege, affirm, and turn their halcyon leaks
With every gale and vary of their masters,

As knowing naught, like dogs, but following.

Shakespeare.

We are of nothing, and your work of naught.

Il. ix. 24.

Be frustrate all ye stratagems of hell,
And devilish machinations come to naught.

Milton, P. R.

2. In no degree. A kind of adverbial signification, which nothing has sometimes.

In young Rinaldo fierce desires he sp'y'd,

And noble heart, of rest impatient,

To wealth or sovereign power he naught ap'd.

Fairfax.

3. To set at NOUGHT. Not to value; to slight; to scorn; to disregard.

Ye have set at naught all my counsel, and would own me of my reproof.

Prov. i. 25.

NOVICE.† n. s. [novice, French; novitius, Latin.] Dr. Johnson. —The word is very old in the French language. Huolet gives our word in the form of nophice, with the Lat. nophitus, a nophyte.]

1. One not acquainted with any thing; a fresh man; one in the rudiments of any knowledge.

Triple-twin'd whore! 'tis thou

Has sold me to this novice. Shakespeare, Ant. and Cleop.

You are novices: 'tis a world to see.

How tame, when men and women are alone,

A meacock wretch can make the curliest shrew.

Shakespeare.

We have novices and apprentices, that the succession of the former employed men do not fail.

Bacon.

If any unexperienced young novice happens in to the fatal neighbourhood of such pests, presently they are plying his full purse and his empty pace.

South.

I am young, a novice in the trade,

The fool of love, unpractis'd to persuade;

And want the soothing arts that catch the fair,

But caught myself his struggling in the snare.

7

And she I love, or laughs at all my pain,
Or knows her worth too well, and pays me with disdain.

Dryden.

In these experiments I have set down such circumstances by which either the phenomenon might be rendered more conspicuous, or a novice might more easily try them, or by which I did try them only.

Newton, Opticks.

2. One who has entered a religious house, but not yet taken the vow; a probationer.

Fren. When you have vow'd, you must not speak with men

But in the presence of the prioress. —

Lear. Hail, virgin, if you be; as those check-roses

Proclaim you are no less! Can you so stand too,

As bring me to the sight of Isabella.

A novice of this place. Shakespeare, Moss for Moss.

NOVITIATE.† n. s. [novitius, French.]

1. The state of a novice; the time in which the rudiments are learned.

This is so great a masterpiece in sin, that he must have passed his tyrocinium or novitiate in sinning, before he come to this, he he never so quick a proficient.

South.

2. The time spent in a religious house, by way of trial, before the vow is taken.

None were admitted into this order, but after a long and laborious novitiate.

Burke, Orig. of Eng. Hist. i. 1.

3. Once used by Addison, improperly, for a novice.

The abbess had been informed the night before of all that had passed between her novitiate and father Francis.

Spectator, No. 164.

NOVITI'OUS.* adj. [novitius, Lat.] Newly invented.

What is now taught by the church of Rome, is, as unwarrantable, so a novitious interpretation.

Perron on the Creed, Art. 9.

NOVITY.† n. s. [novitas, Lat.] Newness; novelty.

Some conceive she ought not yet be certain, that only man was privileged with speech, and being in the novity of the creation and unexperience of all things, might not be afflicted to hear a serpent speak.

Brown.

It remains that we modestly believe, not only that the heavens and earth and all the host of them were made, and so acknowledge a creation, or an actual and immediate dependence of all things on God; but also that all things were created by the hand of God, in the same manner, and at the same time, which are delivered unto us in the books of Moses by the Spirit of God, and so acknowledge a novity, or no long existence of the creature.

Perron on the Creed, Art. 1.

NOULT.† n. s. [houl, Sax. a top, a head; noul, Germ.] The crown or top of the head; the head itself. See NODDLE, and NOLL.

Softly, caution the steward, it lieth all in this noll,

Both wit and wisdom. Hist. of Henry, (1324).

Then came October fall of merry glee;

For yet his novle was totty of the mist.

Spenser, F. Q. vii. vil. 39.

NOULD.† Ne would; would not.

Had knifed such coles of displeasure,

That the goodman would stay his leisure,

But home him lasted with furious heat.

Spenser, Shep. Col. Feb.

NOUN. n. s. [noun, old French; nomen, Lat.] The name of any thing in grammar.

A noun is the name of a thing, whether substance, mode or relation, which in speech is used to signify the same when there is occasion to affirm or deny any thing about it, or to express any relation it has to any other thing. Clarke.

 These last mean about them, that usually talk of a man and a verb, and such amenable words as no christian ear can endure to hear.

Shakespeare, Hen. VI.
 The boy, who scarce has paid his entrance down,
 To his proud parent, or devil'd man. Dryden.

NOU'RICE.* n. s. [French, nourrice.] A nurse.

It shall be expedient, that a noble man's son, in his infancy, have with him continually only such as may accustom him, by little and little, to speak pure and elegant Latin: the nourrices and other women about him, if he be possible, to do the same. St. T. Ely, Ser. Feb. 16. b.
 Camden! the nourrice of antiquity,
 And lanterns unto late succeeding age.

Spenser, Ruins of Time.

To NOU'RISH. v. a. [nourrir, French; nourir, Lat.]

1. To increase or support by food, or aliment of any kind.

He planteth an ash, and the rain doth nourish it. Job, xlv. 11.

Thou' her nourish'd powers enlarg'd by thee, Shakespeare, Twelfth Night.

She springs aloft. Shakespeare, Twelfth Night.
 You are to honour, improve, and perfect the spirit that is within you: you are to prepare it for the kingdom of heaven, to nourish it with the love of God, and of virtue, adorn it with good works, and to make it as holy and heavenly as you can. Law.

2. To support; to maintain.

Whilst 1 in Ireland nourish a mighty band,
 I will stir up in England some black storm. Shakespeare, Henry VIII.

Him will I follow, and this house forgoe
 That nourish me a maid. Shakespeare, Twelfth Night.

Pharaoh's daughter took him up, and *nourish*ed him for her own son. Acts, vii. 21.

3. To encourage; to foment. Out of use.

What madmen was it with such power to nourish their contentions, when there were such effectual means to end all controversy? Hooker.

In something then, we nourish 'gainst our sense
 The cockle of rebellion. Shakespeare, Henry VIII.

Yet to labour and advance the civil virtue of young persons was his most chosen deed. Ford.

Gorgias hired soldiers, and *nourish*ed war continually with the Jews. 2 Mac. x. 14.

4. To train, or educate.

Thou shalt be a good minister of Jesus Christ, *nourish*ed up in the words of faith. 1 Tim. iv. 6.

I travel not, neither do I nourish up young men, nor bring up virgins. 1 Tim. v. 2.

5. To promote growth or strength, as food.

In vegetables there is one part more nourishing than another; as grains and roots nourish more than their leaves. Bacon.

To NOU'RISH. v. n. To gain nourishment. Unusual.

Fruit trees grow full of moss, which is caused partly by the coldness of the growth, whereby the parts nourish less. Bacon, Nat. Hist.

NOU'RISH.* n. s. [from the verb.] A nurse.

The word, however, in the following passage of Shakespeare has been doubted. Pope, and Warburton, and Ritson, would have it to be marish. Stevens and Malone defend the old reading. Now certainly obsolete.

Athen.

Was called nourish of philosophers wise. Lycidas, Treg. of J. Bochas, B. i. c. xii.

Our tale be made a nourish of salt tears,
 And nose but women left to wall the dead. Shakspeare, K. Hen. VI. P. I.

NOU'RISHABLE.* adj. [from nourish.] Susceptive of nourishment.

These are the bitter herbs, wherewith if we shall eat this passover, we shall find it most wholesome and nourishable unto us to eternal life. Ap. Math. xxiii. p. 197.

The clergy is misad here, partly for its bet- ter conversion into blood, and partly for its more ready adhesion to all the nourishable parts. Gros, Cosmol.

NOU'RISHER. n. s. [from nourish.] The person or thing that nourishes.

Sleep, chief nourisher in life's feast. Shakespeare, Twelfth Night.
 A restorer of thy life, and a nourisher of thine old age. Ruth.

Milk warm from the cow is a good nourisher, and a good remedy in consumptions. Bacon, Nat. Hist.

Dran and swine's dung laid up together to rot is a very great nourisher and comforter to a fruit tree. Bacon.

Please to taste
 These bounties, which our nourisher hath caus'd
 The earth to yield. Milton, P. L.

NOU'RISHMENT. n. s. [nourissement, Fr.]

1. That which is given or received, in order to the support or increase of growth or strength; food; sustenance; nutriment.

When the nourishment grows unfit to be assimilated, or the central heat grows too feeble to assimilate it, the motion ends in confusion, putrefaction, and death. Newton, Opticks.

2. Nutrition; support of strength.

By temperance taught,
 In what thou eat'st and drink'st; seeking from Hence nourishment, not gluttonous delight. Milton, P. L.

The limbs are exhausted by what is called an atrophy, and grow lean and thin by a defect of nourishment, occasioned by an inordinate scorbutic or erratic heat. Blackmore.

3. Sustenance; supply of things needful.

He instructed them, that as in the one place they use to refresh their bodies, so they may in the other learn to seek the nourishment of their souls. Hooker.

NOU'RITURE.* n. s. [nouriture, French:] this was afterwards contracted to nurture. Education; institution.

Thither the great magician Merlin came,
 As was his use, oftentimes to visit me:
 For he had charge my discipline to frame,
 And tutors nurture to oversee. Spenser.

Repaying thankfully the nurture, which themselves received whilst they were young. Brydget, Disc. of Civ. Life, (1606), p. 75.

This trade also, connected at the root, deriving its nurture from the same sources, — must have coexisted within the sphere of the same attraction. Formal in Astric, (1772), p. 94.

To NOU'RISLE.* v. a. [nourir, French. See also To NOURLE.] To nurse up.

Whether ye list him train in civil life,
 Or nurle up in lore of learn'd philosophy. Spenser, F. Q. vi. iv. 35.

NOU'RSLING.* n. s. The creature nursed, nursing.

A little nourling of the humid air. Spenser, Virgil's Gnat.

To NOU'SLE.* v. a. [The same I believe with nuzzle, and both, in their original import, corrupted from nurle.] To nurse up.

Bald friars and knavish shavelings — sought to nouse the common people in ignorance, lest, being once acquainted with the truth of things, they would in time smelt out the untruth of their packed pill and mass-penny religion. E. K. on Spenser's Shep. Cal. June.

Mothers, who, to nouse up their babes, Thought nought too curious. Shakspeare, Pericles.

To NOU'SLE. v. a. [nuzzle, noodle, noose, or noel; from noel.] To entrap; to ensnare; as in a noose or trap. They nuzzle hogs to prevent their digging, that is, put a ring in their noses.

NOW.* adv. [naw, nu, M. Gothick; nu, Su. Goth. and Sax.]

1. At this time; at the time present.

The servants' trade hath been made cattle from your youth even until now. Gros, xlvii. 34.

Refer all the actions of this short and dying life to that state which will shortly begin, but never have an end; and this will approve itself to be wisdom at last, whatever the world judge it to now. Tillotson.

Now that languages abound with words standing for such combinations, an usual way of getting these complex ideas, is by the expectation of those terms that stand for them. Locke.
 A patient of mine is now living, in an advanced age, that thirty years ago did, at several times, cast up from the lungs a large quantity of blood. Blackmore.

2. A little while ago; almost at the present time.

Now the blood of twenty thousand men Did triumph in my face, and they are fled. Shakespeare, Henry VIII.

How frail our passions!
 They that but now for honour and for place,
 Made the sea blush, with blood resign their hate. Waller.

3. At one time; at another time.

Now high, now low, now master up, now miss. Pope.

4. It is sometimes a particle of connection, like the French, or, and Latin et; as, if this be true, he is guilty; now this is true, therefore he is guilty.

Now whatsoever he did or suffered, the end thereof was to open the doors of the kingdom of heaven, which our iniquities had shut up. Hooker.
 He seeks to bear his greater devotion in that they can render it him. Now to affect the malice of the people, is as bad as that which he dislikes, to flatter them. Shakespeare.

Then cried they all again, saying, Not this man, but Barabbas; now Barabbas was a robber. St. John.

Natural reason persuades man to love his neighbour, because of similitude of kind: because mutual love is necessary for man's welfare and preservation, and every one desires another should love him. Now it is a maxim of Nature, that one do to others, according as he would himself be done to. White.

Phœnicians, which are granivorous birds, the young live mostly upon ants' eggs. Now birds, being of a hot nature, are very voracious, therefore there had need be an infinite number of insects produced for their sustenance. Ray.

The other great and undying mischief which befals men, is by their being misrepresented. Now by calling evil good, man is misrepresented to others in the way of slander and detraction. South.

Helim be thought himself, that the first day of the full moon of the month Tisias, was near at hand. Now it is a received tradition among the Persians, that the souls of the royal family, who are in a state of bliss, do, on the first full moon after their decease, pass through the eastern gate of the black palace. Addison, Guardian.

The praise of doing well
Is to the ear, as ornament to the smell.
Now if some fine, perchance, however small,
Into the alabaster urn should fall,
The odours die, Prior.

The only motives that can be imagined of obedience to laws, are either the value and certainty of rewards, or an apprehension of justice and severity. Now neither of these, exclusive of the other, is the true principle of our obedience to God. Hogers.

A human body forming in such a fluid is any imaginable posture, will never be reconcilable to this hydrauntal law. There will be always something lighter beneath, and something heavier above. Now what can make the heavier particles of bone ascend above the lighter ones of flesh, or depress these below those, against the tendency of nature? Bradley.

5. After this; since things are so, in familiar speech.

How shall any man distinguish now betwixt a parasite and a man of honour, where hypocrisy and interest look so like duty and affection? L'Ettrange.

6. Now and then; at one time and another uncertainly. This word means, with regard to time, what is meant by here and there, with respect to place.

Now and then they ground themselves on human authority, even when they most pretend to disavow it. Hodges.

Now and then something of extraordinary, that is any thing of your production, is requisite to refresh your character. Dryden.

A most effectual argument against spontaneous generation is, that there is no new species produced, which would now and then happen, were there any such thing. Ray.

He who resolves to walk by the gospel rule of forbearing all revenge, will have opportunities every now and then to exercise his forgiving temper. Atterbury.

They now and then appear in the offices of religion, and avoid some scandalous enormities. Bayly.

7. Now and then are applied to places succeeded as they rise to notice and consideration.

A mound here, there a heath, and now and then a wood. Dryden.

- Now, n. s. Present moment. A poetical use.

Nothing is there to come, and nothing past, But an eternal now does ever last. Cowley.

See vanish'd; it can scarcely say she dy'd,
For but a now did bowen and earth die'd.
This moment perfect health, the next was death. Dryden.

Not less ev'n in this despicable now
Than when my name fill'd Africk with affrights. Dryden.

- Nowadays, † adv. [now and a days, i. e. on days. So Gower. "Now on days," Conf. Am. B. 5. See ADAYS. This word, though common and used by the best writers, is perhaps barbarous.] In the present age.

Not so great as it was wont of yore,
It's nowadays, he half so straight and sore. Spenser.

Reason and love keep little company together nowadays. Shelburne, Lett. N. Drom.

It was a rival and a virgin fire, and diffused as much from that which passes by this name nowadays, as the vital heat from the burning of a fever. South.

Such are those principles, which by reason of the bold evils of perverce and unreasonable men, we are nowadays put to defend. Tillotson.

What men of spirit nowadays,
Come to give sober judgement of new plays. Garrick.

Now'ways. } adv. [no and ways. Dr. NOW'WAYS.] Johnson has hastily condemned this expression, under nowise. See NOWISE.] Not in any manner or degree.

Wherever a considerable number of authorities can be produced in support of two different though resembling modes of expression for the same thing, there is always a divided use, and one cannot be said to speak barbarously, or to oppose the usage of the language, who conforms to either side. Of this divided use the words nowise, noway, and noways, afford a proper instance. Yet our learned lexicographer hath denominated all those, who either write or pronounce the word noways, ignorant barbarians. These ignorant barbarians (but he surely hath not adverted to this circumstance) are only Pope, and Swift, and Addison, and Locke, and several others of our most eminent writers. This censure is the more astonishing, that, even in the form which he has thought fit to repudiate, the meaning assigned it is strictly conformable to that which etymology, according to his own explanation, would suggest. See the senses of the word way marked with these numbers, 15, 16, 18, and 19.

Campbell, Philos. of Rhetoric.

Now'ed. adj. [noué, Fr.] Knotted; in-weathered.

Reuben is conceived to bear three barres waved, Judah a lion rampant, Dan a serpent now'ed. Brown.

Now'el. n. s. [Fr. noel, nouël; which Menage derives from the Lat. natalis; and Borel from the Lat. novus, being a corruption of the Fr. nouvel, "From gnoul, signifying a child in Hebrew, comes the French word noel, signifying the child's day, (by way of distinction,) or Christmas-day; of which word the French critics give but a very slender and imperfect account, as may be seen in the dictionary of Trevoux, and Monsieur Menage." Harris on the 53d Ch. of Isaiah, 2d edit. 1739. Pref. p. 94.] A cry of joy; originally a shout of joy at Christmas. Obsolete.

And nowel cries every loyal man. Chaucer, Frankl. Tale.

Nowes. n. s. [from now, old French.] The marriage knot. Out of use.

Thou shalt look round about and see Thousands of crown'd souls throng to be Themselves thy crown, sons of thy noyes;
The virgin bride with which they spouse
Made fruitful thy fair soul. Cromwell.

Now'where. adv. [no and where.] Not in any place.

Some men of whom we think very reverently, have in their books and writings nowhere mentioned or taught that such things should be in the church. Hodges.

True pleasure and perfect freedom are nowhere to be found but in the practice of virtue. Tillotson.

Now'ise. † adv. [no and wise; this is commonly spoken and written by ignorant barbarians, noways. Dr. Johnson. — The censure is not just. See NOWAY. The noun wise, signifying manner, is quite obsolete. It remains now only in composition, in which along with an adjective, or other substantive, it forms an adverb or conjunction. Such are length- wise, costwise, kikewise, &c. These always preserve the compound form; and never admit a preposition; consequently nowise, which is an adverb of the same order, ought analogically to be written in one word, and not to be preceded by it. Campbell, Phil. of Rhet. — Dr. Johnson's solitary example from Bentley gives this word with the preposition; but I add from Barrow, one of our finest writers, an example which confirms the judicious reasoning of Campbell.] Not in any manner or degree.

No, God was so to prosecute his designs of goodness and mercy, as thereby nowise to impair or obscure, but rather to advance and illustrate, the glories of his sovereign dignity, of his severe justice, of his immaculate holiness, of his unchangeable steadfastness in word and purpose. Barrow, Sermon, on G. Friday, 1677.

A power of natural gravitation, without contact or impulse, can in nowise be attributed to mere matter. Bentley.

NowL. See NOUL.

NO'XIOUS. adj. [noxius, Lat.]

1. Hurtful; harmful; baneful; mischievous; destructive; pernicious; unwholesome.

Preparation and correction, is not only by addition of other bodies, but separation of noxious parts from their own. Brown, Vulg. Err.

Kill noxious creatures, where 'tis sin to save, This not just prerogative we have. Dryden.

See pale Orino shews unwholesome dew,
Aries, the pious a noxious shade does shew.
Sharp Boreas blows, and nature feels decay,
Time conquers all, and we must time obey. Pope.

Noxious means of the disease are contained in a smaller quantity in the blood. Blackmore.

2. Guilty; criminal.

Those who are noxius in the eye of the law, are justly punished by them to whom the execution of the law is committed. Brinsford against Hobbes.

3. Unfavourable; unkindly.

Too frequent an appearance in places of much resort, is noxius to spiritual promotion. Swift, Miscell.

NO'XIOUSNESS. † n. s. [from noxiosus. Pronounced new and uncouth, in 1656, by P. Heylin.] Hurtfulness; insalubrity.

The writers of politics have warned us of the noxiousness of this doctrine to all civil governments, which the christian religion is very far from disturbing. Hammond.

NO'XIOUSLY. adv. [from noxiosus.] Hurtfully; perniciously.

To NOY.† v. a. [noyen, Teut.] To annoy. Not now in use. Dr. Johnson has printed this word noie, and its derivatives noiance, noious, &c. But our best old writers, and our old lexicography, are in favour of the orthography before us.

He noyed him nothing, [hurt him not, present version.] Wicliffe, St. Luke, iv. 25.

The heat whereof, and harmfulness, poitiveness, So sore him noy'd, that forc'd him to retire. Spenser, F. Q.

Let errant be bused with maddock in hand,
To stub out the bushes that noyeth the land. Thuanus.

NOY.† n. s. Annoy. Not in use.

He shall sustain no noy.

Hist. of Sir Clytem. (1599) sign. G. i. b. NO'YANCE.† n. s. Mischiefe; inconvenience. See ANNOYANCE.

A cloud of cumbrous gnatæ do him molest,
 All striving to infuse their feeble stings,
 That from their noxious he no where can rest;
 But with his clowish hands their tender wings
 He brusheth off, and oft doth mar their murmurings. Spenser, F. Q.
 To borrow to day, and to-morrow to mis, Tass.
 For lender and borrower nuisance it is.
 The single and peculiar life is bound,
 With all the strength and armour of the mind,
 To keep itself from nuisance. Shaksp. Hamlet.

NO'YER.† n. s. [from noy.] One who annoys. Not in use.

The north is a noier to grass of all suits,
 The east a destroyer to berries and all fruits.

NO'YUL.* adj. [noy and full.] Noisome; hurtful. Obsolete. Hulot.

Very execrable and noisome to them that will receive them. Bale, Yet a Course, &c. fol. 88.

NO'YOUS.† adj. [from noy; Ital. noioso.] Hurtful; troublesome; inconvenient. Obsolete.

We be delivered from noyous and yrele men. Wicliffe, 2 Thess. iii. 2.

Being bred in a hot country, they found much hair on their faces to be noyous unto them. Spenser.

The false Duenna leaving noyous night,
 Return'd to stately palace of dame Pride.

NO'YSSANCE.* n. s. Offence; trespass; nuisance. The word is now nuisance.

Or suffer that may be nuisance
 Againe our old accustomed.

Chaucer's Dream. ver. 255.

NO'ZLE.† n. s. [nazal, old Fr. from naz, the nose.] The nose; the snout; the end.

It is nothing but a poultry old scowen, with the nazle broke off. Ardenham and Pope, Sat. Scribb.

TO NO'BBLE.† v. a. [properly to knubble, or knuble, from knob, for a clenched fist. Dr. Johnson.—Skinner derives knubble, to beat, from knipfer, Danish.]

To bruise with handy cuffs. Ainsworth.

NUM'FEROUS. adj. [numifer, Lat.] Bringing clouds. Dict.

TO NUM'ILATE. v. a. [numilo, Latin.] To cloud. Dict.

NUM'BLE. adj. [numble, Fr. numilis, Lat.] Marriageable; fit for marriage.

The cowslip smiles, in brighter yellow dress,
 Than that which veils the numble virgin's breast.

NUM'BILOUS.* adj. [numbilus, Lat.] Cloudy. Prior.

NUM'FEROUS. adj. [nucens and ferro, Lat.] Nutbearing. Dict.

NU'CLEUS. n. s. [Latin.] A kernel; any thing about which matter is gathered or conglobated.

The crusts are each in all parts nearly of the same thickness, their figure suited to the nucleus, and the outer surface of the stone exactly of the same form with that of the nucleus. Woodward on Fusili.

NU'DATION. n. s. [nudation, French, nudo, Lat.] The act of making bare or naked.

NUDE.* adj. [nuda, French, nudus, Lat.] Bare; naked. Bullock.

NU'DITY.† n. s. [nuditas, Fr. nudus, Lat.] Naked parts; nakedness; poverty.

Cotgrave, and Sherwood.

There are no such licences permitted in poetry any more than in painting, to design and colour obscure nudities. Dryden.

The man who shows his heart,
 Is hoisted for his nudities, and scorn'd.

Young, Night Th. 8.

NU'EL. See NEWEL.

NUGA'CITY.† n. s. [nugaz, nugacis, Lat.] Futility; trifling talk or behaviour.

Such arithmetical nugacities are as ordinarily recorded for him. Merr, Conj. Cabl. (1653), p. 155.

NUGATION. n. s. [nugor, Latin.] The act or practice of trifling.

The opinion that putrefaction is caused either by cold or peregrine and preternatural heat, is but nugation. Bacon.

NU'GATORY. adj. [nugatorius, Latin.] Trifling; futile; insignificant.

Some great men of the last age, before the mechanical philosophy was revived, were too much addicted to this nugatory art: when occult quality, and sympathy and antipathy were admitted for satisfactory explications of things. Bentley.

NU'ISANCE. n. s. [nuisance, French.]

1. Something noxious or offensive.

This is the liar's lot, he is accounted a pest and a nuisance; a person marked out for infamy and scorn. South.

A wise man who does not assist with his counsels, a rich man with his charity, and a poor man with his labour, are perfect nuisances in a commonwealth. Swift, Miscell.

2. [In law.] Something that incommodes
 the neighbourhood.

Nuisances, as necessary to be swept away, as dirt of the streets. Kentwell.

TO NULL. v. a. [nullus, Lat.] To annul; to annihilate; to deprive of efficacy or existence.

Thy fair enchanted cup, and warbling charms,
 No more on me have power, their force is null'd.

Milton, S. A.

Reason hath the power of nulling or governing all other operations of bodies. Green, Cosmol.

NULL. adj. [nullus, Latin.] Void; of no force; ineffectual.

With what impudence must the muse behold
 The wife, by her procuring husband sold
 For though the law makes null the adulterous deed
 Of lands to her, the cuckold may succeed.

Dryden.

Their orders are accounted to be null and invalid by usury. Lecky.

The pope's confirmation of the church lands to those who hold them by King Henry's donation, was null and fraudulent. Swift, Miscell.

NULL. n. s. Something of no power or no meaning. Marks in ciphered writing, which stand for nothing, and are inserted only to puzzle, are called nulls.

If part of the people be somewhat in the election, you cannot make them nulls or ciphers in the privation or translation. Bacon, Wor with Spain.

NULIBI'ETY. n. s. [from nulibi, Latin.]
 The state of being nowhere.

NULIPI'DIAK.* adj. [Lat. nullus, none, and fides, faith.] Of no honesty; of no religion; of no faith. Bullock.

A dissident Christian is a nullipidian Pagan,
 and confutes his tongue with his hand.

Feticham, Rec. ii. 47.

TO NULLIFY.† v. a. [from nullus, Lat.]
 To annul; to make void.

You will try, that this nullifies all exhortations to piety; since a man, in this case, cannot totally come up to the thing he is exhorted to. But to this I answer, that the consequence does not hold:

 for an exhortation is not frustrate, if a man be able to come up to it partially, though not entirely and perfectly. South, Ser. vii. 95.

NU'LLITY. n. s. [nullité, French.]

1. Want of force or efficacy.

It can be no part of any business to overthrow this distinction, and to show the nullity of it;
 which has been solidly done by most of our polenic writers. South.

The jurisdiction is opened by the party, in default of justice from the ordinary, as by appeals or nullities. Argill.

2. Want of existence.

A hard body struck against another hard body, will yield an extraneous sound, in so much as if the percussor be over soft, it may induce a nullity of sound; but never so interior sound. Bacon, Nat. Hist.

NUMB.† adj. [benumen, benumes, Sax.]

This word was formerly written num, as
 Mr. H. Tooke has also observed.

How, or why, or when the b was added to it, he says, he knows not. Certain it is, I may add, that Milton omitted the b, and in later times Bentley. Nay, Dr.
 Johnson himself, in all the editions of his Dictionary, has given benum, not be-numb. The etymon which Mr. Tooke gives of this word is from the Saxons niman, capere, eripere, to aim, to take away; that is, as Skinner also explains it by the Lat. membris captus, deprived of the use of the limbs.]

1. Torpid; deprived in a great measure of the power of motion and sensation;
 chill; motionless.

Like a stony statue, cold and numb. Shakspere.

Leaning long upon any part maketh it numb and asleep; for that the compression of the part suffeth not the spirits to have free access;
 and therefore when we come out of it, we feel a stinging or pricking, which is the re-entrance of the spirits.

Bacon, Nat. Hist.

2. Producing chillness; benumbing.

When we both lay in the field,
 French almost to death, how he did nap the land,
 Even in his garments, and did give himself
 All thin and naked to the numb cold night.

Shakspere.

TO NUMB. v. a. To make torpid; to make dull of motion or sensation; to deaden;
 to stupefy.

Bedlam beggars with roaring voices,
 Strike in their numb'd and mortify'd bare arms,
 Plow, wooden-picks, nails, sprigs of rosemary;
 And with this horrible object from new farms, Inforce their charity. Shakspere, K. Lear.

She can unlock
 The clasp of charms, and thaw the numbing spell.

Milton, Comus.

Plough naked, swain, and naked sow the land,
 For lark winter needs the lab'ring hand. Dryden.

Nought shall avail

The pleasing song, or well regulated tale,
 When the quick spirits their warm seats forbare,
 And numbing coldness has unbra'd the ear.

Prior.

NU'MBERNESS. n. s. [from numbed.] Torpor; interruption of sensation.

If the nerve be quite divided, the pain is little,
 only a kind of stupor or numberness.

Wieman, Surgery.

TO NUM'BER. v. a. [numbrer, French;
 numero, Latin.]

1. To count; to tell; to reckon how many.

Queen Elizabeth was not so much observed for having a numerous, as a wise council. Bacon.

We reach our feet,
Who now appear so numerous and bold. Waller.
Many of our schisms in the west were never heard of by the numerous Christian churches in the east of Asia. Leslie.

2. Harmonious; consisting of parts rightly numbered; melodious; musical.

Thy heart, no ruder than the rugged stone,
I might, like Orpheus, with my numerous moon
Melt to compassion. Waller.

His verses are so numerous, so various, and so harmonious, that only Virgil, whom he professedly imitated, has surpassed him. Dryden.

NUMEROUSNESS. n. s. [from numerous.]
1. The quality or state of being numerous.

The numerousness of these holy houses may easily be granted, seeing that a very few make up a Jewish congregation.

L. Addison, State of the Jews, p. 89.

2. Harmony; musicalness.

That which will distinguish his style is, the numerousness of his verse. There is nothing so delicately turned in all the Roman language. Dryden.

NUMISMATICS. n. s. pl. [from numismatic, Fr.; numismata, Lat.] The science of coins and medals.

NUMMARY. adj. [from nummus, Lat.] Relating to money.

The money drachms in process of time decreased, but all the while the ponderous drachma continued the same, just as our ponderous libra remains as it was, though the summary hath much decreased. Arbuthnot on Coins.

NUMMULAR. adj. [from nummularius, Lat.] Relating to money. Dict.

NUMPA. n. s. [probably from numb, dull, insensible.] A cant expression for a weak, foolish person.

These are villainous engines indeed; but take heart, numpa! here is not a word of the stocks; and you need never stand to awe of any more honourable correction.

By Parker, Rep. of Rehoboth Transp. (1673), p. 85.

There is a certain creature called a grave hobby-horse, a kind of the numpa, that pretends to be pulled to a play, and must needs go to Bartholomew fair to look after the young folks.

Lt. Halifax.

NUMSKULL. n. s. [probably from numb, dull, torpid, insensible; and skull.]

1. A dullard; a dunce; a dolt; a block-head.

They have talked like numskulls.

Arbuthnot and Pope.

2. The head. In burlesque.

Or how and lump in this case
Of Numskull's self should take the place. Prior.

NUMSKULLED. adj. [from numskull.] Dull; stupid; doltish.

Hecus has saved that clod-pated, numskulled ninetyhammer of yours from ruin, and all his family. Arbuthnot.

NUN. n. s. [nunne, Saxon; nonne, Fr.]

Our word was anciently nonne. Vossius and others consider it as an Egyptian word, signifying a virgin. Græcobarb. νύξ, νύξ, monialis. Meursii Lex. Low Lat. nonnas, a monk, nonna, a nun. Others refer it to the Greek νύξ, and νύξ, and to the Italian nonno and nonna, which signify uncle and aunt, grandfather and grandmother, applied by way of honourably distinguishing the religious gious as fathers and mothers. The Lat. nonna first denoted a penitent woman, then a religious. A woman dedicated to the severer duties of religion, secluded in a cloister from the world, and debarred by a vow from the converse of men.

My daughters
Shall all be praying nuns, not weeping queens. Shakespeare.

A devout nun had vowed to take some young child, and bestow her whole life and utmost industry to bring it up in strict piety. Hammond.

The most blooming toast in the island might have been a nun. Addison, Freeholder.

Every shepherd was undone,
To see her cloister'd like a nun. Swift, Miscell.

NUN. n. s. [from parus minor.]

1. The blue titmouse. Sherwood.

2. A small kind of pigeon.

NUMNITION. n. s. [corrupted from noon-shun, a meal eaten about noon, when country labourers usually retire from the heat of the sun, as Mr. Malone also has observed; citing the following passage from Browne, which Mr. Mason in his Supplement to Dr. Johnson's Dictionary has also given, with the definition of "a shady place to retire to at noon." But it is the meal, and not the place, which the poet means. Sherwood, in his Dict. 1692, calls it "a numnions or numcheon, an afternoons repast." A piece of victuals eaten between meals.

That harvest folks (with curds and clouted cream,
With cheese and butter, cakes and cates ynow
That are the yeoman's at the yoke or cowe)
On sheaves of corn, were at their numnions close.

Browne, Brit. Poet. (1616).

Laying by their swords and truncheons,
They took their breakfasts by their numnions.

Hudibras.

NUMNCIATURE. n. s. [from numcio, Latin.] The office of a nuncio.

They who knew him [Pope Alexander] but little, had very much esteem of him as a man of wisdom and extraordinary civility, upon which account the princes of Germany, who had known him during his numnciature, were exceedingly pleased with his promotion.

Clarendon, on Papal Usurp. chap. 9.

NUMNCIO. n. s. [Italian; from numcio, Latin.]

1. A messenger; one that brings tidings. She will attend it better in thy youth,

Than in a numcio of more grave aspect. Shakspeare.

They honour'd the numncio of the spring; and the Rhodians had a solemn song to welcome in the vernal.

Brown.

2. A kind of spiritual envoy from the pope. This man was honoured with the character of numcio to the Venetians.

Atterbury.

To NUMNCUPATE. v. a. [from numcupo, Lat.] To declare publicly or solemnly.

The Gentiles numcupated vows to their [idols].

Dr. Waples, Serm. (1646), p. 65.

But how doth that will appear? In what table was it written? In what registers is it kept? In whose presence did St. Peter numcupate it?

Burrow on the Pope's Supremacy.

NUMNCUPATION. n. s. [from numcupatio, Lat.] The act of naming.

God hath divers sons; some by adoption, and then he is made so; none by numncupation, and then he is called so.

Farinon's Serm. (1647), p. 5.

An instance of this manner of numncupation take here from the author I promised you.

Gregory's Learned Works, (1684), p. 161.

NUMNCUPATIVE. adj. [from numncupatio, Lat.] NUMNCUPATORY. adj. [from numncupatio, French.]

1. Publicly or solemnly declaratory.

The same apperth by that numncupative title wherewith both Heathens and Christians have honoured their oaths, in calling their swearing an oath of God. Fotherby, Athens, (1628), p. 41.

2. Verbally pronounced; not written.

Willis numncupatory and scriptory.

Testaments are divided into two sorts; written and numncupative; the latter depends merely upon oral evidence, being declared by the testator in extremis before a sufficient number of witnesses, and afterwards reduced to writing.

Blackstone.

NUMNDINAL. adj. [from numndinal, French, NUMNDINARY. adj. [from numndinal, Lat.]

belonging to fairs.

To NUMNDINATE. v. n. [from numndinal, Lat.]

To buy and sell as at fairs. Cockerm.

NUMNDINATION. n. s. [from numndination, Fr.]

Traffic at fairs and markets; any buying and selling. Cockerm.

Witness their penitentiary tax, wherein a man might see the price of his sin before hand; their common numndination of pardons; their absolving subjects from their officious allegiance.

Bye, Bransbill, Solium Garendel, p. 149.

NUMNERY. n. s. [from num, Lat.] A house of nuns; of women under a vow of chastity, dedicated to the severer duties of religion.

I put your sister into a numnery, with a strict command not to see you, for fear you should have wrought upon her to have taken the habit.

Dryden, Spain. Fier.

NUMPTIAL. adj. [from numptial, French; numptialis, Latin.] Pertaining to marriage; constituting marriage; used or done in marriage.

Confirm that amity
With numptial knot, if thou vouchsafest to grant Bona to England's king. Shakspeare.

Because propagation of families proceedeth from the numptial copulation, I desired to know of him what laws and customs they had concerning marriage.

Bacon.

Then all in heat

They light the numptial torch. Milton, P. L.

Whoever will partake of God's secrets, must pare off whatsoever is unclean, not out of this sacrifice with a defiled head, nor come to this feast without a numptial garment.

By Taylor.

Er'd with her love, and with ambition led,
The neighbouring princes court her numptial bed.

Dryden.

Let our eternal peace be seal'd by this,
With the first order of a numptial kiss.

Dryden, Aurengze.

NUMPTIAL. n. s. like the Latin without singular. [from numptia, Lat. Dr. Johnson. —

From numbo. "It has been an opinion long received, and almost universally admitted, that " numptia dicitur, quia flamme caput subentis obvolvatur, quod antiqui obnubere vocarunt." But this is a custom evidently posterior to civil society, when ceremonies were instituted to give sanction and permanency to a rite, on which so much depended the good order and happiness of civil life.

The union, which was the origin of society, must have been antecedent to the rites ordained to make it legal. We must therefore search higher for the primitive signification of nubo. Dr. Taylor on the Civil Law, p. 287, mentions an Hebrew radix, consisting of the same elements, which signifies procreation, birth, &c. which he thinks bids fairer for the etymon than any other that can be assigned. But, with deference to so excellent a writer, I think that even this does not satisfy. To effect this union, there must have been something prior to the liberos procreare. For though the stipulation of the political contract was liberorum querendorum causa; yet it is expressly mentioned in a law which Taylor quotes before, and afterwards enlarges upon, that "nuptias non concubitus sed consensus facit": a law founded on the very essence, and natural principles, of marriage. And this signification, if we can discover it in nubo, will perhaps have the fairest claim to our preference: which I think we may be able to do, by shewing that nubo originally signified to ascend, and is really the same as nvo. It is well known that the Eolic, the parent, or perhaps rather the sister, dialect of the Latin, made use of the digamma F, (which, as well as the Latin V, was pronounced like our W) in the first of those vowels; and thus nvo, nvofo, i.e. nvo; as from pluo came plui, pluvi, in the old Latin writers, in the same manner as they said fuvisti for fuidi, lucit for luit, &c. But the digamma, from the affinity of its sound, often became B: thus nvo, nubo, as vado, Bo; uro, (pronounced furo), bu, vix; with which may be compared our burn, and fire, and anciently written fugr. Though nvo does not exist by itself at present in the Latin language, it remains in its compounds annuo, renuo, &c. as bu in amburo, comburo, and busium. It has been given as a reason for nubo being not spoken of the man, because it was the virgin only who veiled her head. But if there is any probability in what has been before proposed, this reason will fall to the ground. We may account for it otherwise, and consistently with the signification attributed to nubo. Viri est petere; virginis est ascendi, annuere, nubere. This privilege, allowed to the delicacy of the sex, is expressed by Milton, P. L. B. S.

"Her virtue, and the conscience of
"her worth,
"That would be woo'd, and not un-
"sought be won."

If we add, that connubium implies the ratification of the union in the consent of both, it will confirm the observation, that nubo properly and originally signifies annuo, ascendi; and therefore that connubium is consensus. (Up. Burgess, Ess. on the Study of Antiq. 2d. ed. p. 50.)

1. Marriage.

This is the triumph of the nuptial day,
My better nuptials, which in spite of fate,
For ever join me to my dear Moest.

Dryden, Aureng.

2. It is in Shakespeare singular, but contrarily to use.

Lift up your countenance, as 'twere the day
Of celebration of that nuptial, which
Of late have sworn shall come. Shap. W. Tale.

NURSE.† n. s. [notice, Saxon; nourice, French; nurse, old Eng. as in Barret's Alv. 1580. See also NOURICE.]

1. A woman that has the care of another's child.

Unnatural curiosity has taught all women, but the beggar to find out nurses, which necessity only ought to commend.

Raleigh, Hist. of the World.

2. A woman that has care of a sick person.

Never master had
A page so kind, so dutious, diligent,
So soft, so nurse-like. Shakespeare, Cymb.
Oce Mrs. Quickly, which is in the manner of his nurse, or his dry nurse, or his cook.

Shakespeare, M. Wives of Windsor.

3. One who breeds, educates, or protects.

Rome, the nurse of judgement,
Invited by your noble self, hath sent,
One general tongue unto us.

Shakespeare, Hen. VIII.

We must lose
The country, our dear nurse, or else thy person
Our comfort in the country. Shakespeare, Coriol.

4. An old woman in contempt.

Can tales more senseless, ludicrous, and vain,
By winter-fires old nurses entertain? Blackmore.

5. The state of being nursed.

Can wedlock know so great a curse,
As putting husbands unto to nurse? Cleland.

6. In composition, anything that supplies food. Dr. Johnson. — And also what is supplied by food or nursing.

Sweet nurse-child of the Spring's young hours.
Davies, Hymn 7. To the Rose, (1692.)

Put into your breeding pond three meters for one spanner; but if into a nurse-pond or feeding pond, then no care is to be taken. Walton, Angler.

TO NURSE. v. a. [from the noun, or by contraction from nourish; nourir, Fr.]

1. To bring up a child or any thing young.

I was nursed in swaddling cloaths with care. Wad. vii. 7.

Him in Egyptian groves Aricia bore,
And nurse'd his youth along the marshy shore. Dryden.

2. To bring up a child not one's own.

Still call'd a nurse of the Hebrew women,
That she may nurse the child? Ex. ii. 7.

3. To feed; to keep; to maintain.

Thy daughters shall be nursed at thy side. Is. lx. 4.

Our monarchs were acknowledg'd here,
That their churches nursing fathers were. Denham.

The Nicens in their dark abode Nurs'd secretly with milk the thriving God. Addison.

4. To tend the sick.

5. To pamper; to foment; to encourage; to soften; to cherish.

And what is strength, but an effect of youth,
Which if time nurse, how can it ever cease? Dods.

By what fate has vice so thriven amongst us,
And by what hands been nursed up into so vicious a domination? Locke.

6. To doze.

NURSE. n. s. [from nurse.]

1. One that nurses. Not used.

See where he lies, inhered in the arms
Of the most bloody nurse of his harms. Shakespeare.

2. A promoter; a fomentor.

NURSE. n. s. [from nurse.]

1. The act or office of nursing.

I lov'd her most, and thought to set my rest
On her and nursery. Shap. J. Lear.

2. That which is the object of a nurse's care.

She went forth among her fruits and flowers,
To visit how they prosper'd, bud and bloom
Her nursery: they at her coming sprung,
And south'd by her fair tresses gladdlier grew. Milton, P. L.

3. A plantation of young trees to be transplanted to other ground.

Your nursery of stocks ought to be in a more barren ground than the ground is whereunto you remove them. Bacon.

My paper is a kind of nursery for authors, and some who have made a good figure here, will hereafter flourish under their own names. Addison, Guardian.

4. Place where young children are nursed and brought up.

I th' swathing cloaths, the other from their nursery. Shakespeare, Cymbeline.

We're not a. See before you the spectacle of a Plantagenet, who had been carried from the nursery to the sanctuary, from the sanctuary to the direful prison, from the prison to the hand of the cruel tormentor, and from that hand to the wide wilderness; for so the world hath been to me. Bacon.

Forthwith the dwell'd did appear,
Not in the shape in which he piles
At miss's elbow when she lies;
Or waste before the nursery doors,
To take the naughty boy that roars. Prior.

They have public nurseries, where all parents are obliged to send their infants to be educated. Swift.

5. The place or state where any thing is fostered or brought up, from a nursery of children, or whence any thing is to be removed from a nursery of trees.

This keeping of cows is of itself a very idle life, and a fit nursery for a thief. Spencer on Ireland.

To see fair India, nursery of arts,
I am arriv'd from fruitful Lombardy. Shakespeare.

A luxuriant court is the nursery of dissipation; it breeds vice, it encourages, nourishes, and entertains them. L'Estrange.

A nursery erects its head,
Where queens are form'd and future heroes bred;
Where unskill'd actors learn to laugh and cry. Dryden.

NURSE. n. s. [from nurse.] One nursed up; a fondling.

Then was made in sovereign dignity,
And she the nursing of nobility. Spencer.

I was his nursing once, and choice delight,
His destin'd from the womb. Milton, S. A.

In their tender nurseries, while they spread
Their springing leaves and lift their infant head,
Indulge their childhood, and the nursing spare. Dryden.

NURTURE.† n. s. [contracted from nouriture, French.]

1. Food; diet.

For this did the angel twice descend,
To bid th' nurse body, as of a plant
Suck'd from the sacred seed. Milton, S. A.

2. Education; institution.

She should take order for bringing up of wards in good nurture, not suffer them to come into bad hands. Spenser on Ireland.

The thorny point
Of bare distress hath 'en from me the shew

Of smooth civility; yet am I inland bred,
And know some nurture. Shakspeare, As you like it.
Ye fathers, provoke not your children to wrath;
but bring them up in the nurture and admonition of the Lord. Ephes. vi. 4.

To NUTRURE. v. a. [from the noun.]
1. To educate; to train; to bring up.

Thou broughtest it up with thy righteousness, and nurtured it in thy law, and reformed it with thy judgment. 2 Esdr. viii. 12.
He was nurtured where he had been born in his first rudiments, till the years of ten. Strahan.

When an insolent despoiler of discipline, nurtured into impudence, shall appear before a church governor, severity and resolution are that gov-ernour's virtues. South.

2. To nurture up; to bring by care and food to maturity.

They suppose mother earth to be a great animal, and to have nurtured up her young offspring with a conscious tenderness. Bentley.

To NUTRILE. v. a. To fondle; to cherish.
Corrupted from nourile. See To NUZ-ZLE. Ainsworth.

NUT. n. s. [hnut, Saxon; noot, Dutch;
noix, Fr.]

1. The fruit of certain trees; it consists of a kernel covered by a hard shell. If the shell and kernel are in the center of a pulpy fruit, they then make not a nut but a stone.

One chance'd to find a nut
In the end of which a hole was cut,
Which lay upon a hazel root,
There scatter'd by a squirrel;
Which out the kernel gotten had;
When quoth this Fay, dear quoth he, glad,
Let Othello be to me said
I'll set you safe from peril. Dryden, Amphitruo.

Nuts are hard of digestion, yet possess some good medicinal qualities. Arbuthnot on Aliments.

2. A small body with teeth, which correspond with the teeth of wheels.

This faculty may be more conveniently used by the multiplication of several wheels, together with nurs belonging unto each, that are used for the roasting of meat. Wilkins.

Clocks and jacks, though the screws and teeth of the wheels and nuts be never so smooth, yet if they be not oiled, will hardly move.

Ray on the Creation.

To NUT. v. n. [from the noun.] To gather nuts.

A. W. went to angle with Will. Staines of Coll.
Colt. to Whately bridge, and waited in Shooter
by the way.

A. Wood, Life of himself, (under 1659), p. 73.

NUTATION. n. s. [nutatio, Lat.] A kind of tremulous motion of the axis of the earth.

What subject of human contemplation shall compare in grandeur with that, which — states
the tides, adjusts the nutations of the earth, &c.
Watts, Mem. p. 101.

NUTBROWN. adj. [nut and brown.] Brown
like a nut kept long.

Young and old come forth to play,
Till the live-long daylight fall,
Then to the spicy nutbrown ale. Milton, L'All.

When this nutbrown sword was out,
With stomach huge he laid about. Euclid.

Two milk-white kids run frisking by her side,
For which the nutbrown lass, Eriphacia,
Full often offer'd many a savoury kiss. Dryden.

King Hardicnutte, midst Danes and Saxons
stout,
Carous'd in nutbrown ale, and din'd on grout.

NU'TRACKERS. n. s. [nut and crack.] An instrument used to enclose nuts and break them by pressure.

He eat every human feature out of his countenance, and became a pair of nutcrackers. Adams, Spect.

NU'TGALL. n. s. [nut and gall.] Hard excrecence of an oak.

In vegetable excrescences, maggots terminate in flies of common shapes, as in the nutgalls of the outlandish oak. Brown.

NU'THATCH. } n. s. [picus martius.] A NU'TJOBBER. } bird. Ainsworth.
NU'TPECKER. }

NU'THOOK.† n. s. [nut and hook.]
1. A stick with a hook at the end to pull down boughs that the nuts may be gathered.

She's the King's nut-hook, that, when any filbert is ripe, pulls down the boughs to his hand.
Comedy of Match me in London, (1631.)

2. It was anciently, I know not why, a name of contempt, Dr. Johnson here says; but, in a note on Shakspeare, considers it as the designation of a catchpole. Other commentators believe it to be the reproachful name of a person who stole goods out at windows, by means of a pole with a hook at the end of it.

Nuthook, nuthook, you lie.
Shakspeare, Hen. IV. P. II.

NU'TMEAT. n. s. [nut and mequette, Fr.]
And so our old word is notemeque. See the citation from Chaucer.

The nutmeg is a kernel of a large fruit not unlike the peach, and separated from that and from its investient coat, the mace, before it is sent over to us;
except that the whole fruit is sometimes sent over in preserve, by way of sweet-meat or as a curiosity. There are two kinds of nutmeg; the male, which is long and cylindrical, but it has less of the fine aromatick flavour than the female, which is of the shape of an olive. Hill.

Nutmegs, to put in ale,
Whether it be moist or stale.

Chaucer, Rime of Sir Thopas.
The second integument, a dry and scabulous coat, commonly called mace; the fourth, a kernel included in the shell, which lieth under the mace, is the same we call nutmeg. Brown.

I to my pleasant gardens went,
Where nutmegs breathe a fragrant secret. Sandy.

NU'TSHELL. n. s. [nut and shell.]

1. The hard substance that incloses the kernel of the nut.

I could be bound in a nutshell, and count myself a king of infinite space. Shakspeare, Hamlet.

It seems as easy to me, to have the idea of space empty of body, as to think of the hollow of a nutshell without a kernel. Locke.

2. It is used proverbially for any thing of little value.

A fox had me by the back, and a thousand pound to a nutshell, I had never got off again.
L'Estrange.

NU'T-TREE. n. s. [nut and tree.] A tree that bears nuts; commonly a hazel.

Of trees you shall have the nut-tree and the
oak. Peacham.

Like beating nut-trees, makes a larger crop.
Dryden.

NUTRICATION. n. s. [nutricatio, Lat.] Manner of feeding or being fed.

Besides the teeth, the tongue of this animal is a second argument to overthrow this airy nutrication. Brown.

NU'TRIMENT.† n. s. [nutriment, old French; nutrimentum, Lat.] That which feeds or nourishes; food; aliment.

This slave
Has my lord's meat in him,
Why should it thrive and turn to nutriment?

Shakspeare.
The stomach returns what it has received, in strength and nutriment, diffused into all the parts of the body. South.

Does not the body thrive and grow
By food of twenty years ago?
And is no virtue in mankind.

The nutriment that feeds the mind? Swift, Miscell.

NUTRIMENTAL.† adj. [from nutriment.]
Having the qualities of food; alimental.

Much nutrimental store,
Through excess of humours perished.

The Silkworms, (1599.)
By virtue of this oil vegetables are nutrimental, for this oil is extracted by animal digestion as an emulsion. Arbuthnot.

NUTRITION. n. s. [from nutritio, nutritio,
Lat. nutrition, Fr.]

1. The act or quality of nourishing, supporting strength, or increasing growth.

New parts are added to our substance to supply our continual decays; nor can we give a certain account how the aliment is so prepared for nutrition, or by what mechanism it is so regularly distributed. Glaucius, Scyones.

The obstruction of the glands of the mesenteries is a great impediment to nutrition; for the lymph in these glands is a necessary constituent of the aliment before it mixeth with the blood.

Arbuthnot on Aliments.
2. That which nourishes; nutriment. Less properly.

Fix'd like a plant on his peculiar spot,
To draw nutrition, propagate, and rot. Pope.

NUTRITIOUS. adj. [from nutritio, Latin.]
Having the quality of nourishing.

O may'st thou often see Thy furrows whiten'd by the weedy rain

Nutritious! secret nitre lurks within. Philips.
The best equal to incubation is only nutritious;
and the nutritious juice itself resembles the white of an egg in all its qualities.

Arbuthnot on Aliments.
NU'TRITIVE.† adj. [nutritivus, old French.]
Nourishing; nutrimental; alimental.

It cannot be very savoury, wholesome, or nutritive. Bp. Taylor, Arif. Handson, p. 97.

The fruits of the earth were not new so nutritive as they had been. Patrick on Gen. ix. 3.

While the secretory, or separating, glands, are too much widened and extended, they suffer a great quantity of nutritive juice to pass through.

Blackmore.
NU'TRITURE. n. s. [from nutritio, Latin.]
The power of nourishing. Not used.

Never make a meal of flesh alone, have some other meat with it of less nutritive.

Harris on Consumption.

To NU'TRILE.† v. a. [This word, in its original signification, seems corrupted from nourile; but when its original meaning was forgotten, writers supposed it to come from nozzle or noze, and in that sense used it. See the verb nutr, which Dr. Johnson had intermixed with the present verb.]

1. To nurse; to foster.

Old men long waded in corruption, scorning them that would seek reformation. Sidney
2. To nestle; to house, as in a nest. Not noticed by Dr. Johnson.

She [Wisdom] nuzzled herself in his bosom, cherisheth his soul.

Stafford's Niece, P. ii. (1611.) p. 199.
To NUZZLE.† v. n. To go with the nose down like a hog.

He charged through an army of lawyers, sometimes with sword in hand, at other times nuzzling like an eel in the mud. Arbutnot, J. Bull.
Sir Roger shook his ears, and nuzzled along, well satisfied that he was doing a charitable work. Arbutnot, J. Bull.

The blessed benefit, that sees confin'd,
Drops to a third, who nuzzles close behind. Pope
NYCTALOPS.* n. s. [νυκταλῶψ, Gr.] One who sees best in the night. Coles.

NYCTALOPY.* n. s. [nyctalopie, Fr. nyctalopia, Gr.] A disease or indisposition of the eye, in which a person sees better by night than by day.

NVS of pheasants.* A brood of pheasants: So an eye is sometimes called. Perhaps nye is a corruption of nide. See NIXE. But eye is right; ey, Teut. an egg. See EYE.

NYMPH. n. s. [νύμφη; nympha, Lat.]

1. A goddess of the woods, meadows, or waters.

And as the moisture which the thirsty earth Sucks from the sea, to fill her empty veins,
From out her womb at last doth take a birth,
And runs a nympha along the grassy plains. Dorset.

2. A lady. In poetry.

This resolve no mortal dame,
None but those eyes cou'd have o'erthrown;
The nympha I dare not, need not name. Waller NYMPHISH. adj. [from nympha.] Relating to nymphs; ladylike.

Tending all to nympshick war.

NYMPHLY.* } adj. [from nympha; Fr. nymphe, NYMPHILIKE. } nympheuse, "nymphly."
Cotgrave. } Resembling a nymph.

A thousand nympshike and enamour'd graces.

Drayton, Idea 3.

If chance with nympshike step fair virgin pass.

Milton, P. J.

NYS. [A corruption of ne is.] None is; Not is. Obsolete.

Thou findest fault, where nye to be found,
And buildst strong work upon a weak ground. Sperace.

O.

O

O Has in English a long sound; as, drone, groan, alone, alone, cloke, broke, coal, droll; or short, got, knot, shot, prong, long. It is usually denoted long by a servile a subjoined; as, moan, or by e at the end of the syllable; as, bone: when these vowels are not appended, it is generally short, except before ll; as, droll, scroll; and even then sometimes short; as, toll.

O is used as an interjection of wishing or exclamation.

O that we, who have resisted all the designs of his love, would now try to defeat that of his anger!

O! were he present, that his eyes and hands Might see, and urge, the death which he commands. Drayden

O.† n. s. Used with no great elegance by Shakespeare for a circle or oval, Dr. Johnson says: citing only the example from the Prologue to Shakespeare's Henry the Fifth. It is also used by Bacon; and indeed was common in Shakespeare's time.

Can this cockpit hold
The vast field of France? or may we cram,
Within this wooden O, the very casques,
That did affright the air at Agincourt?

Shakespeare, Hen. V. Prolog.
Yon fiery oes and eyes of light.

The colours, that shew best by candle-light, are white, carnation, and a kind of sea-water green; and oes or esques, as they are of no great cost, so are they of most glory.

Bacon, Ess. 27. (ed. 1639.) p. 225.

OAB.* n. s. Woad: a plant used in dying. See WOAD.

He must admit no difference between oad and frankincense, or the most precious balsamum and a tar-barrel. B. Jonson, Poetaster.

OAF.† n. s. [This word is variously written: oaf, ope, and oph; it seems a corruption of oaph, a demon or fairy; in German and Dutch alf, from which elf; and means properly the same with changeling; a foolish child left by malevolent oaphs or fairies in the place of one more witty, which they steal away. See AUF, and ELF.]

1. A changeling; a foolish child left by the fairies.

These, when a child happens to be got,
When folk perceives it thrived not,
The fault therein to smother:
Some silly doting brainless calf,
That understands things by the half,
Says that the fairy left this oaf.

And took away the other. Drayton, Nymphid.

2. A dolt; a blockhead; an idiot. Used in the north of England; and corrupted sometimes into goaf, goff, and gaff.

The fear of breeding fools.

Philos. Lett. on Phryngomy, p. 76.

And oafs. Hemans, and Fl. Night Walker.

He, who when cool is a mere oaf, may be quite humorous in his cups.

Philos. Lett. on Phryngomy, p. 76.

OA'FISH. adj. [from oaf.] Stupid; dull; doltish.

OA'FISHNESS. n. s. [from oafish.] Stupidity; dulness.

OAK. n. s. {ac, æc, Saxon; which, says Skinner, to shew how easy it is to play the fool, under a shew of literature and deep researches, I will, for the diversion of my reader, derive from laax, a house; the oak being the best timber for building. Skinner seems to have had Junius in his thoughts, who on this very word has shewn his usual fondness for Greek etymology, by a derivation more ridiculous than that by which Skinner has ridiculed him. Ac or oak, says the grave critic, signified among the Saxons, like robur among the Latins, not only an oak but strength, and may be well enough derived, non incommode deduci potest, from ααχ, strength; by taking the three first letters and then sinking the α, as is not uncommon; quercus.

The oak-tree hath male flowers, or katkins, which consist of a great number of small slender threads. The embryos, which are produced at remote distances from these on the same tree, do afterwards become acorns, which are produced in hard scaly cups; the leaves are sinuated. The species are five.

Miller.

He return'd with his brows bound with oak.

Shakespeare.

He lay along
Under an oak, whose antique root peeps out
Upon the brook that brawls along this wood.

Shakespeare.

No tree beareth so many bastard fruits as the oak: for besides the acorns, it beareth galls, and Latin.] The act of covering, or laying a cover. Cockeram.

OBSCURACY. n. s. [from obscure.] Inflexible wickedness; impenitence; hardness of heart.

Thou think'st me as far in the Devil's book, as thou and Falstaff, for obscure and persistency. Shakespeare, Hen. IV.

God may, by a mighty grace, hinder the absolute completion of sin in this obscure. South.

OBSCURATE. adj. [obscure, Latin.]

1. Hard of heart; inflexibly obstinate in ill; hardened; impenitent.

O! let not teach thee for the father's sake, That gave thee life, when well he might have slain thee;

Be not obscure, open thy deaf ears. Shakespeare.

If when you make your prayer, God should be so obscure as yourselves, How would it fare with your departed souls?

Women are soft, mild, pitiful, and flexible; Thou stern, obstinate, flinty, rough, renouneless. Shakespeare.

To convince the proud what signs avail, Or wondrous move the obscure to relent;

They harden'd more, by what might unto reclaim. Milton.

Obscure as you are, oh! hear'st thou least My dying prayers, and grant my last request. Dryden.

2. Hardened; firm; stubborn; always with some degree of evil.

Sometimes the very custom of evil makes the heart obscure against whatever instructions to the contrary. Hooker.

A pleasing sorcery could charm Pain for a while, or anguish, and excite Fallacious hope, or arm the obscure breast With stubborn patience, as with triple steel. Milton, P. L.

No such thought ever strikes his marble, obscure heart, but it presently flies off and rebounds from it. It is impossible for a man to be through-pierced in ingratitude, till he has shook off all fetters of pity and compassion. South.

3. Harsh; rugged.

They joined the most obscure consonants without an intervening vowel. Swift.

TO OBSCURATE.* v. a. To harden; to make obscure.

OBSCURATENESS. n. s. [from obscure.] Stubbornness; inflexibility; impenitence.

This reason of his was grounded upon the *obscure*ness of men's hearts, which thought that nothing concerned them. Hammond, Works, iv. 687.

Their *obscure*ness, and *obscure*ness in their sins. Pocock on Hæsa, p. 180.

OBSCURATION. n. s. [from obscure.] Hardness of heart; stubbornness.

What occasion it had given them to think, to a forward and wanton desire of innovation, we did constrainingly those things, for which conscience was pretended? Hooker.

This barren season is always the reward of *obscure*ation. Hammond.

TO OBSCURE.* v. a. [obscuro, Lat.]

1. To harden.

The buildings are for the most part of brick, not burnt with fire, but hardened by the sun, which makes them so hard, that they appear no less solid and useful than those the fire *obscure*s. Sir T. Herbert, Trav. p. 112.

2. To render inflexible; to make obscure.

All hearts are not alike; no means can work upon the wilfully obscured.

By Hall, Contemp. B. 4.

His infinite power, justice, wisdom, mercy, knows when and how to scourge one, to chastise a second, to warn a third, to humble a fourth, to obscure a fifth. By Hall, Rem. p. 76.

This saw his hapless foes, but stood obscured. Milton, P. L.

The justice of your cause has won over your obscured rebel subjects. Montrose, Lett. to K. Charles I.

OBSCUREDNESS.* n. s. [from obscure.] Hardness; stubbornness.

Even the best of us lies open to a certain deadness and obscuredness of heart. Seasonable exhortation shakes off this evil. By Hall, Christ. Mystical, i. 23.

OBEDIENCE. n. s. [obediencia, French, obediencia, Latin.] Obedience; submission to authority; compliance with command or prohibition.

If you violently proceed against him, it would shake in pieces the heart of his obedience. Shakespeare, K. Lear.

Thy husband Craves on other tribute at thy hands, But love, fair looks, and true obedience. Shakespeare.

His servants ye are, to whom ye obey, whether of sin unto death, or of obedience unto righteousness. Rom. vi. 16.

It was both a strange commission, and a strange obedience to a commission, for men so furiously assailed, to hold their hands. Bacon, War with Spain.

In vain thou bidst me to forbear, Obedience were rebellion here. Conway.

Nor can this be, But by fulfilling that which thou didst want, Obedience to the law of God, import'd On penalty of death. Milton, P. L.

We must beg the grace and assistance of God's Spirit to enable us to forsake our sins, and to walk in obedience to him. Wh. Duty of Man.

The obedience of men is to imitate the obedience of angels, and rational beings on earth, even in live unto God, as rational beings in heaven live unto him. Lat.

OBEDIENT. adj. [obediens, Lat.] Submissive to authority; compliant with command or prohibition; obsequious.

To this end did I write, that I might know the proof of you, whether ye be obedient in all things. 1 Cor. ii. 9.

To this her mother's plot She, seemingly obedient, likewise hath Made promise. Shakespeare, M. Wives of Windsor.

Religion hath a good influence upon the people, to make them obedient to government, and peaceable one towards another. Tillotson.

The chief his orders gives; the obedient hand, With due obedience, wait the chief's command. Page.

OBEDIENTIAL. adj. [obediens, Fr. from obediens.] According to the rule of obedience.

Faith is such as God will accept of, when it affords fiducial reliance on the promise, and obediens submission in the command. Hammond.

Faith is then perfect, when it produces in us a fiducial assent to whatever the gospel has revealed and an obediens submission to the commands. Wheeler, Prep. for Death.

OBEDIENTLY. adv. [from obediens.] With obedience.

We should behave ourselves reverently and obediens towards the Divine Majesty, and justly and charitably towards men. Tillotson.

OBESANCE. n. s. [obesancia, Fr. This word is formed by corruption from obesancia, an act of reverence.] A bow; a courtesy; an act of reverence made by inclination of the body or knee.

Bartholomew my page, See dress in all suits like a lady; Then call him obesance, do him all obesance. Shakespeare.

Bathsheba bowed and did obesance unto the king. 1 Kings, i. 16.

The lords and ladies paid Their homage, with a low obesance made; And seem'd to venerate the sacred shade. Dryden.

OBELISCAL.* adj. [obeliscus, Lat.] In form of an obelisk.

In the open temples of the druids, they had an obeliscal stone, set upright. Stanley, Palæogr. Sacr. p. 16.

O'BELISK. n. s. [obeliscus, Latin.]

1. A magnificent high piece of solid marble, or other fine stone, having usually four faces, and lessening upwards by degrees, till it ends in a point like a pyramid. Harris.

Between the statues obelisks were plac'd, And the learn'd walls with hieroglyphics grac'd. Page.

2. A mark of censure in the margin of a book, in the form of a dagger (†).

He published the translation of the Septuagint, having compared it with the Hebrew, and noted by asterisks what was defective, and by obelisks what redundant. Grew.

TO OBEQUITATE.* v. n. [obsequio, Lat.] To ride about. Not in use.

OBEQUITATION. n. s. [from obsequio, Lat.] The act of riding about. This word occurs in the old vocabulary of Cockeram, though Dr. Johnson has given it without reference to any usage of it; and is another kind of proof against the pretended modern coinage of equitation. See EQUITATION. Both are pedantic words.

OBERRATION. n. s. [from oberro, Latin.] The act of wandering about.

OBESE† adj. [obesus, Lat.] Fat; laden with flesh.

The author's counsel runs upon his complacency, just as one said of an over-obese priest that he was an Armenian; grant, quod a second, that he be an Armenian, I'll swear he is the greatest that ever I saw. Guyon on D. Quæ. (1654), p. 8.

OBESITY. n. s. [from obesus.] Morbid fatness; incumbrance of flesh.

The fatness of monks, and the obesities of abbots. By Goudens, Hierop. (1653), p. 560.

On these many diseases depend; as on the straitsness of the chest, a phthisis; on the largeness of the veins, an aneurysm; on their smallness, obesity. Grew.

TO OBEY.* v. a. [obedi, Fr. obedi, Lat.]

1. To pay submission to; to comply with, from reverence to authority.

The will of Heaven Be done in this and all things! I obey. Shakespeare, Hen. VIII.

I am ashamed, that women are so simple To seek for rule, supremacy, and sway, When they are bound to serve, love, and obey. Shakespeare.

Let not sin reign in your mortal body, that ye should obey it in the lusts thereof. Rom. vi. 12.
The ancient Britons yet a sceptred king obeyed.

Dryden.
Was she they God, that her thou didst obey,
Before his voice? Milton, P. L.
Africa and India shall his power obey,
He shall extend his propagated sway
Beyond the solar year, without the starry way.

2. It had formerly sometimes to before the person obeyed, which Addison has mentioned as one of Milton's Latinisms; but it is frequent in old writers; when we borrowed the French word we borrowed the syntax, obéir au prince.
O commanded the trumpet to sound; to which the two brave knights obeying, they performed their courses, breaking their staves. Saunders.
The first bark, obeying to her mind,
Forth launched quickly, as she did desire. Spenser.
His servants ye are, to whom ye obey. Rom. vi. 16.

Nor did they not perceive the evil plight
In which they were, or the three pains not feel,
Yet to their general's voice they soon obey'd. Milton, P. L.
OBEYER. * n. s. [from obey.] One who obeys.
He approved himself to be a religious hearer,
Judicious observer, and observant slayer of the word of his Maker.
Praeger, Sermon on Prince Henry's Death, (1618), p. 16.

TO OBEY. * v. a. [obsequium, Lat.] To resolve; to harden in resolution.
The obedient traitor knows no way to the high-priest's fall; and to the garden; the watchword is already given, Hail, master!
Pp. Hall, Contend. B. 4.

TO OBEY. * v. a. [obsequium, Lat.] To resolve; to harden in determination. Not in use.

They do obsequiate and make obsequiate their minds for the constant suffering of death.
Sheldon, Minutes of Antiquity, (1616), p. 327.

TO OBFUSCATE. * v. a. [obfuscus, Fr.; ob and fusco, Lat.] To darken. See TO OBFUSCATE. The Scotch use obfusck. Sherwood.

If passion and prejudice do not obfuscate his reason and judgement.
Waterhouse, Apol. for Learning, p. 95.
The sprightly green is then obfuscated.

OBFUSCATE. * part. adj. Darkened.
Which with the mixture of a terrestrial substance is obfuscated, or made dark.
Sir T. Elyot, Gov. fol. 198. b.

A very obfuscated and obscure sight.
Barton, Acad. of Met. p. 487.

OBFUSCATION. * n. s. [from obfuscate.] The act of darkening.

OBJECT. * n. s. [object, Fr. objectum, Lat.] 1. That about which any power or faculty is employed.

Pardon
The flat unrais'd spirit, that hath dar'd,
On this unworthy scaffold to bring forth
So great an object. Shakespeare, Hen. V.

They are her farthest reaching instrument,
Yet they no beams unto their object send;
But all the rays are from their objects sent,
And in the eyes with pointed angles end. Devin.

The object of true faith is, either God himself, or the word of God: God who is believed in, and the word of God, as the rule of faith, or matter to be believed. Hammond.

The act of faith is applied to the object according to the nature of it; to what is already past, as past; to what is to come, as still to come; to that which is present, as it is still present. Perseus.

Those things in ourselves, are the only proper objects of our soul, which, in others, are the unquestionable subjects of our praise. Sweet.
Truth is the object of our understanding, as good is of the will. Dryden, Dunciad.

As you have no mistress to serve, so let your own soul be the object of your daily care and attendance. Law.

2. Something presented to the senses to raise any affection or emotion in the mind.

Dis honour not your eye
By throwing it on any other object. Shakespeare.
Why else this double object in our sight,
Of flight pursu'd in the air, and o'er the ground? Milton, P. L.

This passenger felt some degree of concern, at the sight of so moving an object, and therefore withdrew. Asterbury.

3. [In grammar.] Any thing influenced by somewhat else.

The accusative after a verb transitive, or a sentence in room thereof, is called, by grammarians, the object of the verb. Clarke.

OBJECTGLASS. * n. s. Glass of an optical instrument remotest from the eye.

An objectglass of a telescope I once missed, by grinding it on pitch with putty, and leaning easily on it in the grinding, lest the putty should catch it. Newton, Opt.

TO OBJECT. * v. a. [objecter, Fr. objicio, objectum, Lat.]

1. To oppose; to present in opposition.

Palas to their eyes
The mist objected, and condensa'd the skies. Pope.

2. To propose as a charge criminal; or a reason adverse: often with to or against.

Were it not some kind of blench to be like unto Infidels and Heathens, it would not so usually be objected; men would not think it any advantage in the cause of religion to be able thereof with justly to charge their adversaries. Hooker.

The book requireth due examination, and giveth liberty to object any crime against such as are to be ordered. Wheatley.

Men in all deliberations find cause to be of the negative side, and affect a credit to object and fretful difficulties; for when propositions are denied, there is an end of them; but if they be allowed, it requires a new work; which false point of wisdom is the bane of business. Bacon.

The old truth was, object ingratitude, and ye object all crimes: and is it not as old a truth, is it not a higher truth, object rebellion, and ye object all crimes. Hidgely.

Thus the adversaries of faith have too much reason to object against too many of its professors; but against the faith itself nothing at all. Spratt.

It was objected against a late painter, that he drew many graceful pictures, but few of them were like, Dryden.

Others object the poverty of the nation, and difficulties in furnishing greater supplies. Addison, State of the War.

There was but this single fault that Erasmus, though an enemy, could object to him. Asterbury.

OBJECT. * part. adj. Opposed; presented in opposition.

His mercy is so object even unto sense. Alp. Scindely, Sermon, fol. 110.

Flowers, growing scattered in divers beds, will show more so as that they be object to view at once. Bacon.

OBJECTABLE. * adj. [from To object.] That may be opposed. The word is now objectionable.

It is as objectionable against all those things, which either nature leaves or offers. By. Taylor, Arif. Handsum, p. 145.

OBJECTION. * n. s. [objection, Fr. objectio, Latin.]

1. The act of presenting any thing in opposition.

2. Criminal charge.

Speak on, sir,
I dare your worst objections. Shakespeare, Hen. VIII.

3. Adverse argument.

There is ever between all estates a secret war. I know well this speech is the objection and not the decision; and that it is after refuted. Bacon, War with Spain.

Whosoever makes such objections against an hypothesis, hath a right to be heard, let his temper and genius be what it will. Burnet, Theory of the Earth.

4. Fault found.

I have shewn your verses to some, who have made that objection to them. Watts, Lat.

OBJECTIONABLE. * adj. Exposed or liable to objection.

OBJECTIVE. * adj. [objectif, Fr. objectus, Latin.]

1. Belonging to the object; contained in the object.

Certainly, according to the schools, is distinguished into objective and subjective. Objective certainly is when the proposition is certainly true in itself; and subjective, when we are certain of the truth of it. The one is in things, the other in our minds. Watts, Logic.

2. Made an object; proposed as an object; residing in objects.

If this one small piece of nature still affords new matter for our discovery, when should we be able to search out the vast treasures of objective knowledge that lies within the compass of the universe? Hale, Orig. of Mankind.

3. [In grammar.] A case which follows the verb active, or the preposition, answers to the oblique cases in Latin, and may be properly enough called the objective case. Loach.

OBJECTIVELY. * adv. [from objective.]

1. In manner of an object.

This may fitly be called a determinate idea, when, such as it is at any time objectively in the mind, it is annexed, and without variation determined to an articulate sound; so that it is steadily the sign of that same object of the mind. Locke.

2. In the state of an object.

The ballad which was destroyed, in regard he first received the rays of his antiquity and venerable emission, which objectively move his sense. Brown.

OBJECTIVENESS. * n. s. [from objective.] The state of being an object.

Is there such a motion or objectiveness of external bodies, which produces light? The faculty of light is fitted to receive that impression or objectiveness, and that objectiveness fitted to that faculty. Hale, Orig. of Mankind.

OBJECTOR. * n. s. [from object.] One who offers objections; one who raises difficulties.

But these objectors must take charge upbraided, That has not mortal man, immortal made. Blackmore.

Let the objectors consider, that those irregularities must have come from the laws of mechanism. Bentley.

O'BIT. * n. s. [obit, old Fr. a corruption of the Lat. obit, or obit.] Funeral solemnity; anniversary service for the soul of the deceased, on the day of his death. Bullock.

Homer, his successor, embraced him there; appointed an obit and anniversary for him there. Montagu, App. to Cæsar, p. 154.

In this chapel of St. George were heretofore several anniversaries or obits held and celebrated. Abnide, Herk. lib. iii. 125.

OBJURGATION.† n. s. [objurgation, old Fr. objurgatio, Lat.] Reproof; reprehension.

If there be no true liberty, but all things come to pass by inevitable necessity, then what are all interrogations and objurgations, and reprehensions and expostulations? Bramhall.

Our Saviour replies shortly by way of objurgation or expostulation, as it were, upon his incredulity with indignation. Knotchbull, Ann. N. Test. Tr. p. 51.

OBJURGATORY.† adj. [objurgatoire, old Fr. objurgatorius, Lat.] Reprehensory; culpatory; chiding.

Letters, though they be capable of any subject, yet commonly they are either narratory, objurgatory, consolatory, monitory, or congratulatory. Hewitt, Lett. l. i. 1. (dat. 1695.)

The concluding sentence brings back the whole train of thoughts to the objurgatory question of the Pharisees. Polay, Evol. of the Chr. Rel. li. ch. 4.

OBLATE. adj. [oblatus, Latin.] Flatted at the poles. Used of a spheroid.

By gravitation bodies on this globe will press towards its centre, though not exactly there, by reason of the oblate spheroidal figure of the earth, arising from its diurnal rotation about its axis. Cheyne, Phil. Prin.

OBLATION. n. s. [oblation, French; oblatio, Latin.] An offering; a sacrifice; any thing offered as an act of worship or reverence.

She looked upon the picture before her, and straight aghast, and straight tears followed; as if the idol of duty ought to be honoured with such oblations. Sidney.

Many conceive in the oblation of Jephthah's daughter, not a natural but a civil kind of death, and a separation from, though not exactly there. Brown.

The will gives worth to the oblation, as to God's acceptance, acts the poorest giver upon the same level with the richest. South.

The kind oblation of a falling tear. Dryden.

Behold the coward, and the brave, All make oblations at this shrine. Swift.

OBLECTATION.† n. s. [oblectatio, Latin.] Delight; pleasure.

That which had once experienced the contentment of innocent piety will hardly believe there are such oblectations that can be hid in good ones. Fiddam, Rev. v. 66.

TO OBLIGATE. v. a. [obligo, Latin.] To bind by contract or duty.

OBLIGATION. n. s. [obligatio, from obligo, Latin; obligation, French.]

1. The binding power of any oath, vow, duty; contract.

Your father lost a father; That father his; and the survivor bound To filial obligation, for some term, To do obsequious sorrow. Shakespeare, Hamlet.

There was no means for him as a Christian, to satisfy all obligations both to God and man, but to offer himself for a mediator of an accord and peace. Bacon, Hen. VII.

Nothing can be more reasonable than that such creatures should be under the obligation of accepting such evidence, as in itself is sufficient for their conviction. Widdis.

The better to satisfy this obligation, you have early cultivated the genius you have to arms. Dryden.

No ties can bind, that from constraint arise, Where either's force'd, all obligation dies. Gronville.

2. An act which binds any man to some performance.

The heir of an obliged person is not bound to make restitution, if the obligation passed only by a personal act; but if it passed from his person to his estate, then the estate passes with all its burden. Joy, Taylor, Rule of Holy Living.

3. Favour by which one is bound to gratitude.

Where is the obligation of any man's making me a present of what he does not care for himself? L'Etourge.

So quick a sense did the Israelites entertain of the merits of Gideon, and the obligation he had laid upon them, that they tender him the regal and hereditary government of that people. South.

OBLIGATO.* [Italian.] A musical term, signifying necessary, on purpose, for the instrument named.

OBLIGATORY. adj. [obligatoire, French; from obligate.] Imposing an obligation; binding; coercive; with to or on.

And concerning the lawfulness, not only permissively, but whether it be not obligatory in Christian prices and states. Bacon.

As long as the law is obligatory, so long our obedience is due. Joy, Taylor, Rule of Holy Living.

A people long used to burdens, look upon themselves as creatures at mercy, and that all impositions laid on them by a stronger hand, are legal and obligatory.

If this patent is obligatory on them, it is contrary to acts of parliament, and therefore void. Swift.

TO OBLIGE. v. a. [obliger, Fr. obligeo, Latin.]

1. To bind; to impose obligation; to compel to something.

All these have moved me, and some of them obliged me to commend these my labours to your grace's patronage. White.

The church hath been thought fit to be called Catholic, in reference to the universal obedience which it prescribeth; both in regard of the persons, obliged men of all conditions, and in relation to the precepts, requiring the performance of all the evangelical commands. Pratt.

Religion obliges men to the practice of those virtues which conduce to the preservation of our peace and tranquillity. Tillotson.

The law must oblige in all precepts, or in none. If it oblige in all, all are to be obeyed; if it oblige in none, it has no longer the authority of a law. Rogers.

2. To indent; to lay obligations of gratitude.

He that depends upon another, must oblige his honour with a boundless trust. Waller.

Since love obliges not, I from this hour Assume the right of man's despotic power. Dryden.

Vain wreathed creature, how art thou misled, To think thy wit these godlike notions bred: These truths are not the product of thy mind, But drop from heav'n, and of a nobler kind:

Reveal'd religion first inform'd thy sight, And reason saw not, did fall through the light. Thus man by his own strength to heaven would soar, And would not be oblig'd to God for more. Dryden.

When int'rest calls off all her weakening train, When all the obli'd d'wert, and all the vain, She waits or in the scaffold or the cell. Pope.

To those hills we are oblig'd for all our metals, and with them for all the conveniences and comforts of life. Bentley.

3. To please; to gratify.

A great man gets more by obliging his inferior, than by disdaining him; as a man has a greater advantage by sowing and dressing his ground, than he can have by trampling upon it. Smith.

Some satures are so sour and so ungrateful, that they are never to be oblig'd. L'Etourge.

Happy the people, who preserve their honour By the same duties that oblige their prince. Aldison, Cato.

OBLIGE'E.† n. s. [from oblige.] The person to whom another, called the obligor, is bound by a legal or written contract. See Cowell.

The bond had been taken in the obligee's own name, and not in the king's. Sawderam, Cases of Cons. p. 85.

OBLIGEMENT. n. s. [obligement, French.] Obligation.

I will not resist, whatever it is, either of divine or human obligation, that you lay upon me. Milton, Education.

Let this fair princess but one minute stay, A look from her will your obligations pay. Dryden.

OBLIGER.† n. s.

May they not pity us, condemn'd to bear
The various heaven of an oblique sphere; Bacon, Nat. Hist.

While by fix'd laws, and with a just return,
They feel twelve hours that shade, for twelve that burn. Prior.

Berard's stars must be accus'd which done,
That fatal day the mighty work was done,
With rays oblique upon the Gallick sun. Prior.

It has a direction oblique to that of the former motion. Cheyne, Phil. Prin.

Criticks form a general character from the observation of particular errors, taken in their own oblique or imperfect views; which is as unjust, as to make a judgement of the beauty of a woman's body, from the shade it casts in such and such a position. Brown on the Obliquity.

2. Not direct; indirect; by a side glance.

Has he given the lie
In circle, or oblique, or semicircle,
Or direct parallel; you must challenge him. Shakespeare.

3. [In grammar.] Any case in nouns except the nominative.

OBLI'QUELY. adv. [from oblique.]

1. Not directly; not perpendicularly.
Of meridian altitude, it bathes in three degrees, so that it plays but obliquely upon us and as the sun doth about the twenty-third of January. Brown.

Declining from the noon of day,
The sun obliquely shoots his burning ray. Pope.

There is in rectitude, beauty; as contrivance in obliquity, deformity. Hooker.
Count Rhodolph cut out for government and high affairs, and balancing all matters in the scale of his high understanding, bath rectified all obliquities. Hovell.

For a rational creature to conform himself to the will of God in all things, carries in it a rational rectitude or goodness; and to disobey or oppose his will in any thing, imports a moral obliquity. South
To OBLI'TERATE. v. a. [oblitero, ob and litem, Latin.]

1. To efface any thing written.

2. To wear out; to destroy; to efface.

Wars and desolations obliterate many ancient monuments. Hale, Orig. of Monks.
Let men consider themselves as covered in that unhappy contract, which has rendered them part of the Devil's possession, and contrive how they may obliterate that reproach, and disentangle these mangled souls. Decay of Chr. Party.

These simple ideas, the understanding can no more refuse to have, or alter, or blot them out, than a mirror can refuse, alter, or obliterate the images, which the objects set before it produce. Locke.

OBLITERA'TION. n. s. [obliteratio, Latin.]

Effacement; extinction.

Considering the casualties of wars, transmissions, especially that of the general flood, there might probably be an obliteration of all those monuments of antiquity that ages precedent at some time have yielded. Hale, Orig. of Monks.

OBLIVION.† n. s. [oblivio, old French; oblitio, Latin.]

1. Forgetfulness; cessation of remembrance.

Water drops have worn the stones of Troy,
And blind oblivion swallow'd cities up,
And mighty states characteristic are graced
To dusty nothing. Shakespeare, Troil and Cress.

Thus shouldst have heard many things of worthy memory, which now shall lie in oblivion, and thou return unexperienced to thy grave. Shakespeare, Tam. of the Shrove.

Knowledge is made by oblivion, and to purchase a clear and unobscured body of truth, we must forget and part with much we know. Brown.

Can they imagine, that God has therefore forgot their sins, because they are not willing to remember them? Or will they measure his pardon by their own oblivion? South.

Among our crimes oblivion may be set;
But 'tis our king's perfection to forget. Dryden.

2. Amnesty; general pardon of crimes in a state.

By the act of oblivion, all offences against the crown, and all particular transgressions between subject and subject, were pardoned, remitted, and utterly extinguished. Daines.

Newton, Fragm. Regal. Oba. on Q. Edis.

O'BLOQUY. n. s. [obloquor, Lat.]

1. Censorious speech; blame; slander; reproach.

Reasonable moderation hath freed us from being severely subject unto that bitter kind of obloquy, whereby the church of Rome doth, under the colour of low towards those things which be harmful, maintain extremely most hurtful corruptions; so we peradventure might be upbraided, that under colour of hatred towards those things that are corrupt, we are on the other side as extreme, even against most harmless ordinances. Hooker.

Here new aspersions, with new obloquies,
Are laid on old deserts. Daniel, Civil Wars.

Canst thou with impious obloquy condemn
The just decree of God, pronounc'd and sworn?

Milton, P. L.

Shall names that made your city the glory of the earth, be mentioned with obloquy and detraction?

Addison.
Every age might perhaps produce one or two true genius, if they were not sunk under the censure and obloquy of plodding, servile, imitating pedants. Swift.

2. Cause of reproach; disgrace. Not proper.

My chastity's the jewel of our house,
Requested down from many ancestors;
Which were the greatest obloquy 't the world
In me to lose. Shakespeare, All's Well.

1. Loss of speech.

A vehement fear often produceth obmutescence. Brown.

2. Observation of silence.

Compare Christianity, as it came from Christ, with the same religion, after it fell into other hands: — with the extravagant merit very soon ascribed to civility, solitude, voluntary poverty; with the rigours of an ascetic, and the vows of a monastic life; the hair-shirt, the watchings, the midnight prayers, the obmutescence, the gloom and mortification of religious orders, and of those who aspired to religious perfection. Philips.

En. of the Chr. Rel. ii. P. ii. ch. v.

OBSO'XIOUS. adj. [obnoxius, Lat.]

1. Subject.
I propound a character of justice in a middle form, between the speculative discourses of philosophers, and the writings of lawyers, which are tied and obnoxious to their particular laws. Bacon, Holy War.

2. Liable to punishment.

All are obnoxious, and this faculty land,
Like faltering Hester, does before you stand,
Watching your sceptre.

Waller.

We know ourselves obnoxious to God's severe justice, and that he is a God of mercy and hath sin; and that we might not have the least suspicion of his unwillingness to forgive, he hath sent his only begotten Son into the world, by his dismal sufferings and cursed death, to expiate our offences.

Culamy.

Thy name, O Varus, if the kinder powers Preserve our plains, and shield the Mantuan towers,

Obnoxious by Cremona's neighbouring crime
The wings of swans, and stronger pinion'd rime
Shall rule aloft.

Dryden.

3. Reprehensible; not of sound reputation.

Conceiving it most reasonable to search for primitive truth in the primitive writers, and not to suffer his understanding to be prepossessed by the contrived and interested schemes of moderns, and withal obnoxious authors.

Fell.

4. Liable; exposed.

Long hostility had made their friendship weak
In itself, and more obnoxious to jealousies and distrusts.

Haywood.

But what will not ambition and revenge
Descend to? who aspires, must down as low
As high he soar'd; obnoxious first or last,
To basest things.

Milton, P. L.

Beasts lie down,
To dew obnoxious on the grassy floor. Dryden.
They leave the government a trunk naked, defenceless, and obnoxious to every storm. Davenant.

OBNOXIOUSNESS.† n. s. [from obnoxius.]

Subjection; liability to punishment.
Every man is both to be an informer, whether out of the office, or out of the conscience of his own obnoxiousness.

Dry. Hall, Cher of Consc. D. 2. C. 5.

Men, by incurring guilt and being exposed to vengeance, are subject to restless fears and stinging remorses of conscience; nor can they be exempted from such obnoxiousness otherwise than by the free grace and mercy of God.

Barnes on the Forgiveness of Sins.

OBNOXIOUSLY. adv. [from obnoxius.]

In a state of subjection; in the state of one liable to punishment.

To OBNUBILATE.† v. a. [obnubilo, Latin; obnubilator, Fr.] To cloud; to obscure.

As a black and thick cloud covers the sun, and intercepts his beams and light; so does this melancholy vapour obnubilate the mind.

Barton, Anst. of Med. p. 200.

But corporal life doth no obnubilator
Our inward eyes, that they be nothing bright.

Mere, Sleep of the Soul, C. 2. st. 10.

OBNUBILATION. n. s. [from obnubilare.]

The act of making obscure.
Let others glory in their triumphs and trophies, in their obnubilation of bodies conspurcous; that they have brought up upon claspings.

2. A state of being darkened.

As to the sun and moon, their obscuration or change of colour happens commonly before the eruption of a fiery mountain.

Barnet.

OBSCURE.† adj. [obscure, Fr. obscurus, Lat. This word was formerly accented on the first syllable; as in the examples, which follow from Shakespeare, and Davies, and Beaumont and Fletcher.]

1. Dark; unenlightened; gloomy; hindering sight.

Whoso curseth his father or mother, his lamp shall be put out in obscure darkness. Prov. ix. 20.

Who shall tempt with wand'ring feet
The dark bottom'd infinite abyss,
And through the palpable obscure find out
His uncouth way?

Milton, P. L.

2. Living in the dark.
The obscure bird clamour'd the live-long night.

Shakespeare.

Not easily intelligible; abstruse; difficult.

I explain some of the most obscure passages, and those which are most necessary to be understood, and this according to the manner wherein he used to express himself.

Dryden.

4. Not noted; not observable.

My short-wing'd Muse doth lament
None but the obscure corners of the earth.
Davies, Bien Venu, (1606.) C. 2.

To see their warlike eagles meet their honours
In obscure towns.

Brown, and Ft.

He says that he is an obscure person; one, I suppose, that is in the dark.

Atterbury.

To OBSCURE. v. a. [obscurare, Lat.]

1. To darken; to make dark.

They are all couched in a pit hard by Hearn's oak, with obscured lights; which at the very instant of Falstaff's and our meeting, they will at once display to the night.

Shakespeare.

Sudden the thunder blackens all the skies,
And the winds whistle, and the surges roll
Mountains on mountains, and obscure the pole.

Pope.

2. To make less visible.

What must I hold a candle to my shames?
They in themselves, good sooth, are too, too light.
Why, 'tis an office of discovery, love,
And I should be obscur'd.

Shakespeare, Mech. of Ven.

Thinking by this retirement to obscure himself from God, he infringed the omniscience and essential ubiquity of his Maker. Brown, Vols. Error

3. To make less intelligible.

By private consent it hath been used in dangerous times to obscure writing, and make it hard to be read by others not acquainted with the intrigue.

Holder.

There is scarce any duty which has been so obscured by the writings of learned men, as this.

Waller.

4. To make less glorious, beautiful, or illustrious.

Think't thou, vain spirit, thy glories are the same,
And seest not sin obscure thy godlike frame;
I know thee now by thy ungrateful pride,
That shows me how thy faded looks die obscure.

Dryden.

5. To conceal; to make unknown.

O might I here

In solitude live savage, in some glade
Obscur'd, where highest woods, impenetrable
To sun or starlight, spread their umbrage broad.

Milton, P. L.

OBSCURELY.† adv. [from obscure.]

1. Not brightly; not luminously; darkly.
The lightning's light is lost; it shines not clear,
But shows obscurely through night's stormy air.

Mary, Lavens, B. 5.

Through the thick shades obscurely might you
see

MINOTAURS, cyclopes. Creskine, Sup. of Herode.

not conspicuously.

After many years wandering obscurely through all the island. Milton, Hist. of Engl. B. 4.

Such was the rise of this prodigious fire,
Which in ocean buildings first obscurely bred,
From thence did issue to open streets avoyre.

Dryden.

There live retir'd,
Content thyself to be obscurely good.

Addison, Cute.

3. Not clearly; not plainly; darkly to the mind.

The woman's seed at first obscurely told.
Now ampler known, thy Saviour and thy Lord.

Milton, P. L.

OBSCURENESS.† n. s. [obscureté, Lat. from OBSCURITY. } obscure.] 1. Darkness; want of light.

Lo! a day of darkness and obscurety, tribulation and anguish upon the earth.

Ether, ch. 8.

Should Cynthia quit thee, Venus, and each star,
It would not form one thought dark as mine are:

Dryden.

I could lend them obscurus now, and say,
Out of myself there should be no more day.

Dante.

2. Unnoticed state; privacy.

You are not for obscurity design'd,
But like the sun, must cheer all human kind.

Dryden.

3. Darkness of meaning.

Not to mention that obscurus that attends prophetic raptures, there are divers things know-able by the bare light of nature, which yet are so unusual to be satisfactorily understood by our imperfect intellects, that let them be delivered in the clearest expressions, the notions themselves will yet appear obscure. Baile on Cædmon.
That this part of sacred Scripture had difficulties in it: many causes of obscurity did readily occur to me. Locke.

What lies beyond our positive ideas towards infinity, lies in obscurity, and has the undetermined confusion of a negative idea, wherein I know I do not comprehend all I would, it being too large for a finite capacity. Locke.

OBSCURER.* n. s. [from obscurus.] Whitever or whoever obscures.

It was pity desolation and loneliness, should be such a waster and obscurer of such treasures.
Lord's Hist. of the Banians, (1680), p. 24.

TO 'OBSCRATE.* v. a. [obscurus, Lat.] To beseech; to intreat. Not now in use. Sir T. Wyatt somewhere employs it.
*Cockram.*OBSCRATION.* n. s. [obscuratio, from ob-scuro, Lat.] Intreaty; supplication.
That these were comprehended under the sacra,
is manifest from the old form of obscration.
*Stillingfleet.*OBSSEQUENT.* adj. [obsequens, Lat.] Obse-dient; dutiful; submitting to. A very useful word.

Unto himself he hath reserved an infinite power to put any matter upon any matter; which he always kindly plant, and obedient to his pleasure, even against the propriety of its own particular nature. Fosterly Aethem. (1692), p. 181.

OBSQUES.† n. s. [obsequies, French. I know not whether this word be not anciently mistaken for exsequies, exsequi, Latin: this word, however, is apparently derived from obsequium.]

1. Funeral rites; funeral solemnities.

There was Doriaus valiantly requiring his friend's help, in a great battle deprived of life, his obsequies being not more solemnized by the tears of his partakers, than the blood of his enemies. Sidney.

Fair Juliet, that with angels dost remain,
Accept this latest favour at my hand;
That living honour'd thou, and lying dead,
With funeral obsequies adorn thy tomb. Shakespeare.
I spare the widows' tears, their woeful cries,
And howling at their husbands' obsequies;
How Theseus at these funerals did assist,
And with what gifts the mourning dames dismiss.
Dryden.

His body shall be royally interr'd,
I will, myself
Be the chief mourner at his obsequies. Dryden.
Alas! poor fool, my Indian tatter'd dress,
Go hither and celebrate his obsequies. Crouch.

2. It is found in the singular, perhaps more properly.

M. Grindall, in his late funeral sermon at the obsequy of Ferdinandus, saith and confesseth, that it cannot be denied but that after S. Gregories time purgatory went with full sail.
Shapton, Fort. of the Faith, (1565), fol. 8. b.
In this last solemnity of obsequy unto his ever honoured sovereign and mistress, he was the most eminent person of the whole land, and principal mourner.

Sir G. Ford, Life of Alip. Whiffgiff, p. 116.
Or tune a song of victory to me,
Or to thyself, sing thine own obsequy. Chester.
Him I'll solemnly attend,
With silent obsequy and funeral train,
Hence to his father's house. Milton, S. A.

OBSERQUIOUS. adj. [from obsequium,
Latin.]

1. Obedient; compliant; not resisting.

Adore not so the rising sun, that you forget the father, who raised you to this height; nor be you so obsequious to the father, that you give just cause to the son to suspect that you neglect him.
Bacon, Adv. to Villiers.

At his command the up-rooted hills retir'd
Each to his place; they heard his voice, and went Obsequious. Milton, P. L.

I follow'd her; she what was honour knew,
And with obsequious majesty approv'd
My pious reason. Milton, P. L.

See how the obsequious wind and liquid air,
The obsequious swan does upward bear. Cowley.
A genial cherishing heat acts so upon the fit and obsequious matter, as to organize and fashion it according to the exigencies of its own nature.
Boyle.

His servants weeping,
Obsequious to his orders, bear him thither.
Addison, Cato.

The vote of an assembly, which we cannot reconcile to public good, has been conceived in a private brain, afterwards supported by an obsequious party. Swift.

2. In Shakespeare it seems to signify, funereal; such as the rites of funerals require.

Your father lost a father;
That father his; and the survivor bound
In filial obligation, for some time,
To do obsequious sorrow. Shakespeare, Hamlet.

OBSERQUIOUSLY. adv. [from obsequious.]

1. Obediently; with compliance.

They rise, and with respectful awe,
At the word given, obsequiously withdraw. Dryden.

We cannot reasonably expect, that any one should readily and obsequiously quit his own opinion, and embrace ours with a blind resignation. Locke.

2. In Shakespeare it signifies, with funeral rites; with reverence for the dead.

I a while obsequiously lament
The untimely fall of virtuous Lancaster.
Shakespeare, Rich. III.

OBSERQUIOUSNESS.† n. s. [from obsequious.]

Obedience; compliance.

No less famous for his liberty, than obsequious-ness towards her husband.

Bacon, Hist. of Life and Death.
An heart — of singular obsequiousness towards your father. Watson, Parnell, to E. Charles I.

They apply themselves both to his interest and humour, with all the arts of flattery and obsequiousness, the surest and the readiest way to advance a man. Swift.

OBSSEQUI.* n. s. [obsequium, Lat.]

1. Funeral ceremony. See OSESQUIES.
2. Obsequiousness; compliance. Not in use.

Sway'd by strong necessity,
I am enforc'd to eat my careful bread With too much obsequy. B. Jonson, For.

TO 'OBSERATE.* v. a. [observo, Lat.] To look up; to shut in. *Cockram.*OBSERVABLE. adj. [from observo, Latin.] Remarkable; eminent; that may deserve notice.

They do bury their dead with observable ceremonies. Abbot.

These proprieties affixed unto bodies from considerations deduced from east, west, or those observable points of the sphere, will not be justified from such foundations. Brown.

I took a just account of every observable circumstance of the earth, stone, metal, or other matter, from the surface quite down to the bottom of the pit, and entered it carefully into a journal.
Woodward, Nat. Hist.

The great and more observable occasions of exercising our courage, occur but seldom. Rogers.

OBSERVABLY. adv. [from observable.] In a manner worthy of notice.

It is prodigious to have thunder in a clear sky,
as is observable indeed in some histories. Brown, Vulg. Err.

OBSERVANCE. n. s. [observance, Fr.
observo, Lat.]

1. Respect; ceremonial reverence.

In the wood a league without the town,
Where I did meet thee once with Helena,
To do observance on the morn of May. Shakespeare.
Arcite left his bed, resolv'd to pay
Observance to the month of merry May. Dryden.

2. Religious rite.

Some represent to themselves the whole of religion as consisting in a few easy observances, and never lay the least restraint on the business or diversions of this life. Rogers.

3. Attentive practice.

Use all the observance of civility,
Like one well studied in a sad ostent
To please his grandam. Shakespeare, Merch. of Ven.

Love rigid honesty
And strict observance of impartial laws. Raccommen.

If the divine laws were proposed to our observance, with no other motive than the advantages attending it, they would be little more than an advise. Rogers, Sermon.

4. Rule of practice.

There are other strict observances;
As, not to see a woman. Shakespeare, Love's Lab. Lost.

5. Careful obedience.

We must attend our Creator in all those ordinances which he has prescribed to the observance of his church. Rogers.

6. Observation; attention.

There can be no observation or experience of greater certainty, as to the increase of mankind, than the strict and vigilant observance; of the calculations and registers of the bills of births and deaths. Hale, Orig. of Mankind.

7. Obedient regard; reverential attention.

Having had such experience of his fidelity and observance abroad, he found himself engaged in honour to support him. Fatton.

OBSERVANCY.* n. s. [from observance.]
Attention.

We must think, men are not gods;
Nor of them look for such observancy,
As fits the bridal. Shakespeare, Othello.

OBSERVANDA.* n. s. i. pl. [Latin.]
Things to be observed.

The issues of my observanda begin to grow too large for the receipts. Swift, Tale of a Tub, Concl.

OBSERVANT. adj. [observans, Latin.]

1. Attentive; diligent; watchful.
These writers, which gave themselves to follow and imitate others, were observant sectators of those masters they admired. Raleigh, Hist. of the World.

Wandering from climate to climate observant stray'd,
Their manners noted, and their states survey'd.
Pope.

2. Obedient; respectful; with of.

We are told how observant Alexander was of his master Aristotle. Digby on the Soul, Ded.

3. Respectfully attentive; with of.

She now observant of the parting ray.
Eyes the calm sun-set of thy various day. Pope.
4. Meantly dutiful; submissive.

How could the most base meet again to honour but by such an observant slavish course? Religio.

OBSERVANT† n. s. [This word has the accent on the first syllable in Shakespeare.]

1. A slavish attendant. Not in use.

These kind of knaves I know, which in this plainness
Harbour more craft and more corrupter ends,
Than twenty ally'd cunning observants
That stretch their duties strict. Shaksp. K. Lear.

2. A diligent observer.

Such observants they are thereof, [of the law.]
Hooker, Ecc. Pol. l. § 4.

OBSERVATION† n. s. [observatio, from observo, Latin; observation, Fr.]

1. The act of observing, noting, or remarking.

These cannot be infused by observation, because they are the rules by which men take their first apprehensions and observations of things; as the being of the rule must be before its application to the thing directed by it. South.

The rules of our practice are taken from the conduct of such persons as fall within our observation. Bogers.

2. Show; exhibition.

The kingdom of God cometh not with observation. St. Luke, xvii. 20.

3. Notion gained by observing; note; remark; animadversion.

In matters of human prudence, we shall find the greatest advantage by making wise observations on our conduct, and of the events attending it. Watts, Logic.

4. Obedience; ritual practice.

He freed and delivered the Christian church from the external observation and obedience of all such legal precepts, as were not simply and formally moral. Whitt.

OBSERVATOR† n. s. [observator, Fr. from observo, Latin.] One that observes; a remarker.

The observator of the bills of mortality, hath given us the best account of the number that daily plagues have swept away. Hale, Orig. of Mankind.
They may be handsome, yet be chaste, you say.—
Good observator, not so fast away. Dryden.

OBSERVATORY† n. s. [observatoire, Fr.] A place built for astronomical observations.

Another was found near the observatory in Greenwich Park. Woodward on Fossils.

TO OBSERVE† v. a. [observo, French, observo, Lat.]

1. To watch; to regard attentively.

Remember, that as divine eye observes others, so art thou observed by angels and by saints. Rip. Taylor.

2. To find by attention; to note.

It is observed, that many men who have seemed to repent when they have thought death approaching, have yet, after it hath pleased God to restore them to health, been as wicked, perhaps worse, as ever they were. W. D. Duty of Men.

If our idea of infinity be got from the power we observe in ourselves, of repeating without end our own ideas, it may be demanded why we do not attribute infinity to other ideas, as well as those of space and duration. Locke.

Full may observe them discourse and reason pretty well, of several other things, before they can tell twenty. Locke.

3. To regard or keep religiously.

A night to be much observed unto the Lord, for bringing down out of Egypt. Ex. xii. 42.

In the days of Esau, people observed not circumcision, or the Sabbath. White.

5. To obey; to follow.

TO OBSERVE† v. n.

1. To be attentive.

Observing men may form many judgments by the rules of similitude and proportion, where causes and effects are not entirely the same. Watts, Logic.

2. To make a remark.

I observe, that when we have an action against my men, we must for all that look upon him as our neighbour, and love him as ourselves, paying him all that justice, peace and charity, which are due to all persons. Kettelwell.

Whether I have found her notes to be wisely another's, which is the case in some hundreds, I have barely quoted the true proprietor, without observing upon it. Pope, Lett.

OBSERVER† n. s. [from observe.]

1. One who looks vigilantly on persons and things; close remarker.

He reads much;
He is a great observer; and he looks
Quite through the deeds of men. Shakspere, Jul. Cæs.

Angelo,
There is a kind of character in thy life,
That to the observer doth thy history
Fully unfold. Shakspere, Meas. for Meas.

Careful observers may forecast the hour,
By sore prognostics when to dread a shew'r. Smyth.

2. One who looks on; the beholder.

If slow-paced star had stol'n a way,
From the observer's marking, he might stay
Three hundred years to see't again. Dennis.
Company, he thinks, lessens the shame of vice,
by sharing it; and therefore, if he cannot wholly avoid the eye of the observer, he hopes to distract it at least by a multiplicity of objects. South.

Sometimes purulent matter may be discharged from the glands in the upper part of the wind-pipe, while the lungs are sound and uninfected, which now and then has imposed on undistinguishing observers. Blackmore.

3. One who keeps any law, or custom, or practice.

Many nations are superstitious, and diligent observers of old customs, which they receive by tradition from their parents, by recording of their bards and chronicles. Sponcer.

The king after the victory, as one that had been bred under a devout mother, and was in his nature a great observer of religious forms, caused Te Deum to be solemnly sung in the presence of the whole army upon the place. Bacon.

He was so strict an observer of his word, that no consideration whatever could make him break it.
Prior.

Himself often read useful discourses to his servants on the Lord's day, of which he was always a very strict and solemn observer. Atterbury.

OBSERVINGLY† adv. [from observing.] Attentively; carefully.

There is some soul of goodness in things evil,
Would men observingly disit it out. Shakspere, Hen. F.

TO OBSERVE† v. a. [obsideo, obsessus, Lat.]

1. To besiege; to compass about. Not in use.

The mind is obsessed with inordinate glory. St. T. Ely, Gen. fol. 92.

2. A man is said to be obsessed, when an evil spirit followeth him, troubling him, and seeking opportunity to enter into him. See the second sense of Obsession. Bullock.

OBSSESSION† n. s. [obsessio, Lat.]

1. The act of besieging.

2. The first attack of Satan, antecedent to possession.

Melancholy persons are most subject to diabolical temptations and illusions, and most apt to entertain them; and the devil best able to work upon them; but whether by illusion or possession, I will not determine. Barton, Ann. of M.d. p. 52.
Grave fathers, he's possess'd; again, I say,
Possess'd: nay, if there be possession,
And sedition, he has both. B. Jonson, For.

OBSIDIONAL† adj. [obsidional, French; obsidionalis, Latin.] Belonging to a siege. Sherwood.

Their honorary crowns, triumph, ovary, civil, obsidional, had little of flowers in them. Sir T. Brown, Miscell. p. 91.

TO OBSIDGNATE† v. a. [obsignare, Lat.] To ratify; to seal up.

As circumcision was a seal of the covenant made with Abraham and his posterity, so keeping the Sabbath did obsignate the covenant made with the children of Israel, after their delivery out of Egypt. Barnes on the Leviticus.

OBSIGNATION† n. s. [from obsignare.] Ratification by sealing; act of fixing a seal; confirmation.

As the spirit of obsignation was given to them under a seal, and within a veil; so the spirit of manifestation or satisfaction was the gift of a vine, or the leaf of a rose, plain indices and significations of life. Rp. Taylor, Sermon on Whimsunday.

They are builders also of God's house, founded on initial confession, resting it by continued instruction, covering and finishing it by sacramental obsignation. Barnes, vol. i. § 12.

By way of obsignation of that covenant, by which we are engaged to that obedience. Whitby on the N. Test. ii. 702.

OBSIGNATORY† adj. [from obsignare.] Ratifying.

Merely obsignatory signs.
Dr. Ward to Bp. Bedel, Farr's Letts of Usher, p. 441.

All the words compounded of here, and a preposition, are obsolescent or obsolete. Dr. Johnson.

OBSOLETE† adj. [obsoleto, Lat.] Worn out of use; disused; unfashionable.

Obsolete words may be laudably revived, when they are more sounding, or more significant than those in practice. Dryden.

What if there be an old dormant statute or two against him, are they not now obsolete? Smyth.

OBSOLETENESS† n. s. [from obsoleto.] State of being worn out of use; unfashionableness.

The reader is embarrassed at once with dead and with foreign languages, with obsolescences and innovation. Dr. Johnson, Prop. for printing Shakspere.

OBSTACLE† n. s. [obstacle, French; obstaculum, Latin.] Something opposed; hindrance; obstruction.

Conscience is a blushing shame-fac'd spirit,
That mutinies in a man's bosom: it fills
One full of obstacles. Shakspere, Rich. III.

If all obstacles were cut away,
And that my path were even to the crown,
As the ripe reverence and the due of birth.

Shakespeare, Rich. III.
Disparity in age seems a greater obstacle to an intimate friendship than inequality of fortune. For the humours, business, and diversions, of young and old, are generally very different.

Cicero on Friendship.
Some conjectures about the origin of mountains and islands, I am obliged to look into that they may not remain as obstacles to those who take voyages, than winds and storms: Pope.

What more natural and usual obstacle to those who take voyages, than winds and storms: Pope.

OBS'TANCY,* n. s. [obstantia, Latin.] Opposition; impediment; obstruction. Not in use.

After marriage it is no obstancy.

B. Jonson, Epitaph.

TO OBSTETRICAL,* v. n. [obstetricor, Latin.] To perform the office of a midwife.

Nature does obstetricate, and do that office of herself, when it is the proper season.

Evelyn, i. c. 6.

TO OBSTETRICAL,* v. a. To assist as a midwife.

Nene so obstetricated the birth of the expedient to answer both brute and his Trojans' rage.
Waterhouse on Fortescue (1683), p. 302.

OBSTETRICAL,* n. s. [obstetricor, Latin.] The office of midwife.

There be most like, in so smooth posture, for his appointed doom, till the osseous bones being loosed, and the doors forced open, he shall be by a helpful obstetrication drawn forth into the larger prison of the world. Bp. Hall, Free Prisoner, § 4.

OBSTETRICK,* adj. [obstetricor, Latin.] Midwifish; befitting a midwife; doing the midwife's office.

There all the lears' shall at the labour stand,
And Douglas lead his soft obstetric hand. Pope.

OBS'TINACY,* n. s. [obstinatio, French; obstinatio, Latin; from obstinare.] Stubbornness; contumacy; pertinacity; persistency.

Choosing rather to use extremities, which might drive me to desperate obstinacy, than apply moderate remedies.

K. Charles.

Most writers use their words loosely and uncertainly, and do not make plain and clear deductions of words one from another, which were not difficult to do, did they not find it convenient to shelter their ignorance, or obstinacy, under the obscurity of their terms. Locke.

What crops of wit and honesty appear,
From speech, from obstinacy, hate or fear. Pope.

OBS'TINATE,* adj. [obstinatus, Latin.] Stubborn; contumacious; fixed in resolution. Absolutely used, it has an ill sense; but relatively, it is neutral.

The queen is obstinately,
Stubborn to justice, apt to accuse it, and Disdainful to be try'd by't. Shakspeare, Hen. VIII.

Except you mean with obstinately repulse,
To slay your son's reign. Shakspeare.

I have known great crews done by obstinately resolutions of drinking no wine. Temple.

Her father did not fail to find
In all she spoke, the greatness of her mind;
Yet thought she was not obstinately to die,
Nor deem'd the death she promis'd to be slight.

Look on Simo's mate;
No am so meek, no am so obstinately. Pope.

OBS'TINATELY,* adv. [from obstinately.] Stubbornly; inflexibly; with unshaken determination.

Pembroke abhorred the war as obstinately, as he loved hunting and hawking. Clarendon.

A Greek made himself obstinately prey.
To impose on their belief, and Troy betray;
Fix'd on his aim, and obstinately bent
To the undaunted, or to circumvent. Dryden.

The man resolv'd, and steady in his trust, Inferable to ill, and obstinately just,
Can the rude rubble's influence despise. Addison.

My spouse maintains her royal trust,
Though tempted, chaste, and obstinately just. Pope.

OBS'TINATELY,* n. s. [from obstinately.] Stubbornness.

We had like to have forgotten the neck and shoulders of the world, which have so ill facility of stiffness and inflexible obstinateness, stubbornly refusing to stoop to the yoke of the Law, or the Gospel. Bp. Hall, Fashions of the World.

OBSTIPATION,* n. s. [from obstipo, Latin.] The act of stopping up any passage.

OBSTREPEROUS,* adj. [obstreperus, Latin.] Loud; clamorous; noisy; turbulent; vociferous.

These obstreperous scepticks are the bane of divinity, who are so full of the spirit of contradiction, that they raise daily new disputes.

Havel, Vol. Far.

These obstreperous villains about, and know not for what they make a noise. Dryden.

The players do not only contrive at his obstreperous approbation, but repair at their own cost whatever damages he makes. Addison, Spect.

He hath full right to exempt
Whom so it pleases him by choice,
From national obstriction. Milton, S. A.

TO OBSTRUCT,* v. a. [obstruo, Latin.] 1. To block up; to bar.

He then beholding, soon,
Comes down to see their city, ere the tow'r Obstruct Heav'n's towers. Milton, P. L.

In their passage through the glands in the lungs, they obstruct and swell them with little tumours. Blackstone.

Fat people are subject to weakness in fevers, because the fat, melted by feverish heat, obstructs the small canals. Arbuthnot.

2. To oppose; to retard; to hinder; to be in the way of.

No cloud intercepts,
Or star to obstruct his sight. Milton, P. L.

OBSTRUCTER,* n. s. [from obstruct.] One that hinders or opposes.

O best obstructor of justice!

Waldick, Menn. of the Eng. (1654), p. 98.

OBSTRUCTION,* n. s. [obstruction, Latin; obstruction, French; from obstruct.]

1. Hindrance; difficulty.

Sure God by these discoveries did design,
That his clear light thro' all the world should shine;
But the obstruction from that discern'd springs,
The price of darkness masks 'twixt Christian kings. Dehnam.

2. Obstacle; impediment; that which hinders.

All obstructions in parliament, that is, all freedom in differing in votes, and debating matters with reason and candour, must be taken away. King Charles.

In his winter quarters the king expected to meet with all the obstructions and difficulties his enraged enemies could lay in his way. Clarendon.

Whenever a popular assembly free from obstructions, and already possessed of more power than an equal balance will allow, shall continue to think that they have not enough, I cannot see how the same causes can produce different effects among us, from what they did in Greece and Rome. Swift.

3. [In physics.] The blocking up of any canal in the human body, so as to prevent the flowing of any fluid through it, on account of the increased bulk of that fluid, in proportion to the diameter of the vessel. Quincy.

Obstructions are the cause of most diseases. Herbert, Country House, p. 10.

4. In Shakespeare it once signifies something heaped together.

Aye, but to die, and go we know not where;
To lie in cold obstruction, and to rot;
This sensible warm motion to become A knotted clod. Shakespeare, Mens. for Mens.

OBSTRUCTIVE,* adj. [obstructivus, French; from obstruct.] Hindering; causing impediment.

Having thus separated this doctrine of God's predetermining all events from three other things confounded with it, it will now be discernible how noxious and obstructive this doctrine is to the superstrating all good life. Hammond.

Being immediately taken, it [ flesh ] is exceeding obstructive. Herbert, Country House, ch. 10.

OBSTRUCTIVE,* n. s. Impediment; obstacle.

OCCASION. n. s. [occasio, Fr. occasio, Latin.]

1. Occurrence; casualty; incident.

The laws of Christ we find rather mentioned by occasion in the writings of the Apostles, than any solemn thing directly written to comprehend them in legal sort.

2. Opportunity; convenience.

Me unwetting, and unware of such mishap,
She brought to mischief through occasion,
Where this same wicked villain did me light upon.

Because of the money returned in our sacks we were brought in, that he may seek occasion, fall upon us, and take us for bondmen.

Let me not let pass Occasion which now smiles.

I'll take this occasion which he gives to bring him to his death.

With a mind as great as theirs he came
To find at home occasion for his fame,
Where dark confusions did the nations hide.

From this admonition they took only occasion to redden their fault, and to sleep again.

This one has occasion of observing more than once to several fragments of antiquity, and are still to be seen in Rome.

3. Accidental cause.

Have you ever heard what was the occasion and first beginning of this custom?

That woman that cannot make her fault her husband's occasion, let her never nurse her child herself, for she will breed it like a fool.

The fair for whom they strove,
Nor thought, when she beheld the fight from far,
Her beauty was the occasion of the war.

Concerning ideas lodged in the memory, and upon occasion revived by the mind, it takes notice of them as of a former impression.

4. Reason not cogent, but opportune.

Your business calls me you,
And you embrace the occasion to depart.

5. Incidental need; casual exigence.

Never master had
A page so kind, so dutiful, diligent,
So tender over his occasions.

They who are conscious of a name in painting, should read with diligence, and make their observations of such things as they find for their purpose, and of which they may have occasion.

My occasions have found time to use them to ward a supply of money.

They who are conscious of a name in painting, should read with diligence, and make their observations of such things as they find for their purpose, and of which they may have occasion.

The ancient canons were very well fitted for the occasion of the church in its purer ages.

God hath put us into an imperfect state, where we have perpetual occasion of each other's assistance.

A prudent chief not always must display
His pow'r in equal ranks, and fair array,
But with the occasion and the place comply,
Conceal his force, nor, when sometimes it fly.

To OCCASION. v. a. [occasionner, Fr. from the noun.]

1. To cause casually.

Who can find it reasonable that the soul should, in its retirement, during sleep, never light on any of those ideas it borrowed not from sensation, preserve the memory of no ideas but such, which being occasioned from the body, must needs be less natural to a spirit.

The good Palmist condemns the foolish thoughts, which a reflection on the prosperous state of his affairs had sometimes occasioned in him.

2. To cause; to produce.

I doubt not, whether the great increase of that disease may not have been occasioned by the custom of much wine introduced into our common tables.

A consumption may be occasioned by running sores, or sinous fistulas, whose secret cures and winding bowdies empty themselves by copious discharges.

By its styptic quality it affects the nerves, very often occasioning tremors.

3. To influence.

If we enquire what it is that occasions men to make several combinations of simple ideas into distinct modes, and neglect others which have as much an aptness to be combined, we shall find the reason to be the end of language.

OCCASIONABLE. adj. [from occasion.]

That may be occasioned.

This practice, of constantly and carefully observing our hearts, will fence us against immoderate pleasure, occasioned by men's loud opinions or harsh censures passed on us.

Barrow, vol. iii. § 15.

OCCASIONAL. adj. [occasional, Fr. from occasion.]

1. Incidental; casual.

Thus much is sufficient out of Scripture, to verify our explication of the deluge, according to the Mosaic history of the flood, and according to many occasional reflections dispersed in other places of Scripture concerning it.

2. Producing by accident.

The ground of occasional original heresy, was the amendment and sudden change the unexpected appearance of wolves does often put upon travellers.

3. Produced by occasion or incidental exigence.

Besides these constant times, there are likewise occasional times for the performance of duty.

Those letters were not writ to all; Nor first intended but occasional.

Those letters were not writ to all; Nor first intended but occasional.

Those letters were not writ to all; Nor first intended but occasional.

OCCASIONALLY. adv. [from occasional.]

According to incidental exigence; incidentally.

Authority and reason on her way,
As one intended first, not after made

I have endeavoured to interweave with the assertions some of the proofs whereon they depend, and occasionally scatter several of the more important observations throughout the work.

Occasioner. n. s. [from occasion.]

One that causes, or promotes by design or accident.

She with true lamentations made known to the world, that her new greatness did no way comfort her in respect of her brother's loss, when she studied all means possible to revenge upon every one of the occasioners.

Some men will load me as if I were a willful and revolved occasioner of my own and my subjects' miseries.

In case a man dig a pit and leave it open, whereby it happens his neighbour's beast to fall therein and perish, the owner of the pit is to make it good, in as much as he was the occasioner of that loss to his neighbour.

Sanderus.

OCCURRATIO, f. n. s. [occurreo, from occeo, Lat.] The act of blinding or making blind; state of being blind.

It is an addition to the misery of this inward occurance.

O'CULIST. n. s. [from oculus, Lat.] One who professes to cure distempers of the eyes.

If there be a speck in the eye, we take it off; but he wears a strange oculus who would pull out the eye.

I am no oculist, and if I should go to help one eye and put out the other, we should have an untoward business.

O'CULUS beli, [Latin.]

The oculus beli of jewellers, probably of Pliny, is an accidental variety of the agat kind; having a grey horny ground, circular delineations, and a spot in the middle, resembling the eye; whence its name.

ODD, adj. [udda, Swedish. Dr. Johnson and others. Junius thinks it to be derived from added. Mr. H. Tooke contends, that it is the participle owed, ow'd. "Thus," he says, "when we are counting by couples, or by pairs, we say, one pair, two pairs, &c. and one owed, ow'd, to make up another pair. It has the same meaning when we say, an odd man, or an odd action; it still relates to pairing; and we mean — without a fellow, unmatched, not such another, one owed to make up a couple." Div. of Purley, ii. 38. This specious etymon will hardly be received. A later writer carries it to the Greek ἄδδ, "which signifies every thing that can relate to the unity, if I may so express myself, of a being. ἄδδ, say the ordinary lexicographers, peculiaris, sui generis, suus, privatus." Whiter, Etym. Mag. p. 478. Our word is thus to be traced to the first syllable (id) of the Greek word; but the same etymologist also notices the Arab, ahd, the term for one.]

1. Not even; not divisible into equal numbers.

This is the third time; I hope Good luck lies in odd numbers.

What verity there is in that general conceit, in the lateral division of man by even and odd; ascribing the odd unto the right side, and the even unto the left; and so by parity, or imparity of letters in men's names, to determine misfortunes.

 All the air's bladders, that were of stormie kind. Chapman.
- Any man that shall live to see thirty persons descended of his body alive together, and all above three years old, makes this feast, which is done at the cost of the state. Bacon.
7. Subsisting before something else.
 Equal society with them to hold, Thou need'st not make new songs, but sing the old. Cowley.
 The Latian king, unless he shall submit,
 Ours his old promise, and his new forget,
 Let him in arms the power of Turnus prove. Dryden.
- He must live in danger of his house falling about his ears, and will find it cheaper to build from the ground in a new form; which may not be so convenient as the old. Swift.
8. Long practised.
 Then said I unto her that was old in adulteries, will they now commit whoredoms with her?
Ezek. xliii. 43.
9. A word to signify, in burlesque language, more than enough. Dr. Johnson.
 — It is a common expression, in the middle and northern parts of England, for great, without burlesque intention.
 I shall have old laughing. Trag. of Solomon and Persida, (1599.)
 Here will be old us; it will be an excellent stratagem. Shakspere.
 Here's a knocking indeed; if a man were porter of hell gate, he should have old turning the
 key. Shakspere.
10. Of old. Long ago; from ancient times.
 These things they cancel, as having been instituted in regard of occasions peculiar to the times of old, and as being now superfluous. Hobbes.
 Whether such virtue spent of old now fall'd
 More angels to create. Milton, P. L.
 A land there is, Hesperia nam'd it;
 The soil is fruitful, and the wren are small;
 Nor call'd Italia, from the leader's name. Dryden.

- In days of old there liv'd of mighty fame,
 A valiant prince, and Theseus was his name. Dryden.
- OLDEN. adj. [from old; perhaps the Saxon plural.] Ancient. This word is not now in use.
 Blood hath been shed ere now, 't'ill' olden time,
 Ere human statute purg'd the general woe. Shakspere.
- OLDFASHIONED. [old and fashion.] Formed according to obsolete custom.
 Some are offended that I turned these tales into modern English; because they look on Chaucer as a dry, oldfashioned wit, not worth reviving. Dryden.
- He is one of those oldfashioned men of wit and pleasure, that shews his parts by military on marriage. Addison.
- OLDISH.* adj. [from old.] Somewhat old. Sherwood.
- OLDNESS.† n. s. [from old.] Old age; antiquity; not newness; quality of being old.
 This policy and reverence of ages, makes the world bitter to the best of our times; keeps our fortunes from us till our oldness cannot relish them. Shakspere, K. Lear.
 We should see in newness of spirit, not in oldness of the letter. Rom. vii. 16.
- OLEAGINOUS. adj. [oleaginus, Lat. from oleum, oleagineus, Fr.] Oily; unctuous.
 The sap when it first enters the root, is earthy, watery, poor, and scarce oleaginous. Arbuthnot on Aliments.
- OLEAGINOUSNESS. n. s. [from oleaginous.] Oiliness.
 In speaking of the oleaginousness of urinous spirits, I employ the word moist rather than all.
 Boyle.
- OLEANDER. n. s. [oleandre, Fr.] The plant rosebay.
- OLEASTER.* n. s. [Latin.] Wild olive;
 a species of olive. It is a native of Italy, but will endure the cold of our climate, and grow to the height of sixteen or eighteen feet. It blooms in June, and perfumes the circumambient air to a great distance. Miller.
- O'LEAKE.* adj. [oleaceous, Lat.] Oily.
 O'LEOUS.* adj. [oleus, Lat.] Oily.
 Rain water may be endued with some vegetal, or profligate virtue, derived from some saline or oleose particles it contains. Ray on the Creation.

 kind of tree. Sir T. Brown, Musciv. p. 28.
- TO OLFA'CT. v. a. [olfactio, Latin.] To smell. A burlesque word.
 There is a masculine epithet,
 Tho' every rare object it not. Hudibras.
- OLFA'CTORY. adj. [olfactoire, Fr. from olfacio, Latin.] Having the sense of smelling.
 Effluvia, or inviolable particles that come from bodies at a distance, immediately affect the olfactory nerves. Locke.
- OL'ID.* adj. [olidus, Latin.] Stinking; fetid.
 In a civil cat a different and offensive odour proceeds partly from his food, that being especially fish, whereof this humour may be a gross excretion and olidus separation. Brown.
- The fat salt would have been not unlike that of men's urine; of which odd and despicable liquor I choose to make an instance, because elements are not wont to take care for extracting the fat salt of it. Boyle.
- OLIGA'RCHICAL.* adj. [from oligarchy.]
 Belonging to or denoting an oligarchy.
 I cannot by royal favour, or by popular delusion, or by oligarchical cabal, elevate myself above a certain very limited point. Burke, Speech in Parl. (1785.)
- OLIGARCHY. n. s. [oligarchia.] A form of government which places the supreme power in a small number; aristocracy.
 The worst kind of oligarchy, is when men are governed indifferently by a few, and yet are not taught to know what those few be, whom they should obey. Sidney.
- We have no aristocracies but in contemplation;
 all oligarchies, wherein a few men dominate, do what they like. Burton.
- After the expedition into Sicily, the Athenians chose four hundred men for administration of affairs, who became a body of tyrants, and were called an oligarchy, or tyranny of the few; under which black denomination they were soon after deposed. Swift.
- OL'IO. v. s. [olla, Span.] A mixture; a medley. See OLIO.
 Ben Jonson, in his Sejanus and Catiline, has given us this olio of a play, this unnatural mixture of comedy and tragedy. Dryden on Dray. Poetry.
- I am in a very chafe, so this I should not forget myself; but I have such an olio of affairs, I know not what to do. Congreve, Way of the World.
- OL'ITORY. n. s. [olitor, Latin.] Belonging to the kitchen garden.
 Gather your olitory weeds. Beeley, Kalendar.
- OLIVA'STER.* adj. [olivaster, Fr.] Darkly brown; tawny.

 Peru, where they are tawny, olivaster, and pale,
 are generally more sandy. Bacon, Nat. Hist.
 The Banyans are olivaster, or of a tawny complexion. Sir T. Herbert, Trav. p. 45.
- OL'IVE.* n. s. [olive, Fr. olea, Lat. from the Greek ἔλαια, having the digamma inserted, i. e. ἔλαια.] Morin. The tree was brought into Europe from Greece.
 A plant producing oil; the emblem of peace; the fruit of the tree.
 The leaves are for the most part oblong and evergreen; the flower consists of one leaf, the lower part of which is hollowed, but the upper part is divided into four parts; the ovary, which is fixed in the centre of the flower cup, becomes an oval, soft, pulpy fruit, abounding with a fat liquor inclosing an hard rough stone. Miller.

To thee the heavens, in thy oakivty,
Adjung'd an olive branch and laurel crowns,
As likely to be blest in peace and war.

Shakespeare, Hen. VI.
In the parulis of this forest, stands
A sheepshead feed'd about with olive trees.

Shakespeare.
The seventh year thou shalt let it rest, in like manner thou shalt deal with thy vineyard and olive yard. Ecc. xxiii. 11.
Their olive-bearing town. Dryden, Ann.

It is laid out into a grove, a vineyard, and an allotment for silvers and beehives. Broomer.

O'LIVED.* adj. [from olive.] Decorated with olive trees.

Green as of old each adieu portal smiles,
And still the Graces build my Grecian piles:
My Gothic spires in ancient glory rise,
And dare with wond'ring pride to rush into the skies.

Watson, Triumph of Isis.

O'LLA.* n. s. [Spanish.] An oglio.

I was at an olla podrida of his making.

B. Jonson, Staple of News.
Not to tax him for want of elegance as a courtier, in writing oglio like the Spanish word. Milton, Eikonast. § 15.

OLYMPIAD.* n. s. [olympeia, Latin.] A Grecian epoch; the space of four years.

The Olympic games were celebrated every fifth year; and the interval was called an olympiad, consisting of four Julian years.

Gregory, Potham. p. 151.
The same was 316 years before the first olympiad, the reckoning of the annals of the Greeks. Dodder, Hist. of the Septuagint. p. 509.

O'MBRE. n. s. [hombr, Spanish.] A game of cards played by three.

He would willingly carry her to play; but she had rather go to lady Centaure's and play at ombre. Tadler.

When ombre calls his hand and heart are free,
And, join'd to two, he fails not to make three.

Young.
OME'GA. n. s. [ωφωγω.] The last letter of the Greek alphabet, therefore taken in the Holy Scripture for the last.

or bad; a prognostick.

Hammond would steal from his fellows into places of privacy, there to say his prayers, omens of his future pacific temper and eminent devotion.

Fell.
When young kings begin with scorn of justice,
They make an omen to their after reign. Dryden.
The speech had once that the Trojan race
Should find repose, and this the time and place.

Dryden.
Choose out other smiling hours,
Such as have lucky omens shed
O'er forming fates and empires rising. Prior.

O'MENED. adj. [from omen.] Containing prognosticks.

Fame may prove,
Or omen'd voice, the messenger of Jove, Propitious to the search. Page, Odys.

OMENTUM. n. s. [Latin.]

The cawl, called also reticulum, from its structure, resembling that of a net.
Within the peritonæum is cut, as usual, and the cavity of the abdomen laid open, the omentum or cawl presents itself first to view. This membrane, which is like a wide and empty bag,
covers the greatest part of the guts.

Quincy.

humility, meekness, doing our own business,
Farinon, Sermon. (1647.) p. 151.

To O'MINATE. v. n. [ominor, Latin.] To foretoken; to shew prognosticks.

This omimates sadly, as to our divisions with the Romanists. Decoy of Chr. Fiaty.

To O'MINATE.* v. a. To foretoken.

I take no pleasure, God knows, to ominate ill to my dear nation, and dower mother the Church of England. Seasonable Sermon. (1644.) p. 25.

OMINATIOUS.* n. s. [from ominor, Latin.] Prognostick.

The falling of salt is an authentick presagement of ill luck, yet the same was not a general prognostick of future evil among the ancients; but a particular ominatio concerning the breach of friendship. Brown.

Ominations by words, oracles, places, times, in so many several chapters full of elaborate vanity.
Sprenger on Prodiges. p. 102.

O'MINOUS. adj. [from omen.]

foreshewing ill; inauspicious.

Let me be duke of Clarence;
For Glo'ster's dukedom is ominous. Shakespeare, Hen. VI.

Pomfret, thou bloody prison,
Fatal and ominous to noble peers.

Shakespeare, Rich. III.
These accidents the more rarely they happen, the more ominous are they esteemed, because they are never observed but when sad events do ensue.

Hayward.
Raving the Celtic and Iberian fields,
[He] betakes him to this ominous wood. Milton, Comus.

As to the heathen worship of God, a sacrifice without an heart was accounted ominous; so in the christian worship of him, an heart without a sacrifice is worthless. South.

Pardon a father's tears,
And give them to Charinus' memory;
May they not prove as ominous to thee. Dryden.

2. Exhibiting tokens good or ill.

Though he had a good ominous means to have made a peace, nothing followed. Bacon, Hen. VII.

It brave to him, and ominous does appear,
To be oppos'd at first, and conquer here. Cowley.

O'MINOUSLY.* adv. [from ominous.] With good or bad omen.

Philo Judeus collecteth, that this his sublime and celestial disposition was ominously foretold him, in his very name. Fotherby, Athanas. p. 319.
To me how ominously the prophets sung,
Even from the time that heavenly infant sprung

In my cluste womb! Old Simcon this reveal'd,
And in my soul the deadly wound beheld.

Barley's Christ's Passion, p. 65.
We see then how credible an author Masebio is, and what truth there is like to be in the account of ancient times given by the Egyptian historians, when the chief of them so lamentably and ominously stumble in his very entrance into it.

Silbling, Poet. Orig. Sec. i. 2.

O'MINOUSNESS.* n. s. [from ominous.]

The quality of being ominous.
When the day, set for his audience, came, there happened to be such an extraordinary thunder, and such deluges of rain, as disgraced the show, and heightened the opinion of the ominousness of this embassy. Barnet, Hist. of his own Times, (an. 1687.)

O'MISSIOM. n. s. [omissus, Lat.]

1. Neglect to do something; forbearance of something to be done.

Whilst they were held back purely by doubts and scruples, and want of knowledge without their own faults, their omission was fit to be commended
at. Kettwell.

If he has made no provision for this change, the omission can never be repaired, the time never redeemed. Rogers.

2. Neglect of duty, exposed to commission or perpetration of crimes.

Omission to do what is necessary,
Seals a commission to a blank of danger.

Shakespeare.
The most natural division of all offences, is into those of omission and those of commission.

Addison, Freeholder.
O'MISSIVE.* adj. [omissus, Lat.] Leaving out; overpassing.

This silence is no argument of their existence, because we find him omissive in other particulars of the like nature. Blackmour, Hist. of the Noble, B. 7. ch. 4.

To OMIT. v. a. [omitto, Lat.]

1. To leave out; not to mention.

These personal comparisons I omit, because I would say nothing that may savour of a spirit of flattery. Bacon.

Great Cato omits, for gravity renown'd,
Who can omit the Gracchi, who declare The Scipio's worth? Dryden.

2. To neglect to practise.

Her father omitted nothing in her education that might make her the most accomplished woman of her age.

OMITTANCE. n. s. [from omit.] Forbearance. Not in use.

He said, mine eyes were black, and my hair black.

And now I am remember'd, scorn'd at me!

I marvel why I am not yet again;
But that's all one, omittance is no quitance.

Shakespeare.
OMNIFARIOUS. adj. [omnifarius, Latin.]
Of all varieties or kinds.

These particles could never of themselves, by omnifarius kinds of motion, whether fortuitous or mechanical, have fallen into this visible system.

Hewley.
But if thou omnifarius drinks wouldst brew;
Besides the orchard, cry'd edge and bush

Affords assistance. Philips.

An optic glass that is convex on both sides, commonly called a convex lens.

Dict.

OMV.* adj. [em, Su. Goth.; im, Icel.]
vapour, which Verelius derives (as Dr. Jamieson observes, noticing the affinity of our word to the Scottish om, steam), from the M. Goth. ahma, spiritus; to which we may add the Gr. αἶμα, aitma; Mellow: spoken in the north, of land.

Ray, and Grose.

ON.* prep. [ana, Gothic; an, Germ.; aen, Teut.]

1. It is put before the word, which signifies that which is under, that by which any thing is supported, which any thing strikes by falling, which any thing covers, or where any thing is fixed.

He is not lying on a level low-bed, But on his knees at meditation.

Shakespeare, Rich. III.

What news was —
— Richmond is on the seas. —
— There let him sink, and be the seas on him.

Cupids. Shakespeare, Ant. and Cleop.

9. It denotes the motive or occasion of any thing.

The same prevalence of genius, the world cannot pardon your concealing, on the same consideration; because we neither have a living Varus nor a Horace. Dryden.

The joy of a monarch for the news of a victory, must not be expressed like the ecstasy of a harlequin on the receipt of a letter from his mistress. Dryden, Dufores.

The best way to be used by a father on any occasion, to reform any thing he wishes mended in his son. Locke.

We abstain, on such solemn occasions from things lawful, out of regard to those who have often gratified themselves in things unlawful. Smalridge, Sermon.

10. It denotes the time at which any thing happens: as, this happened on the first day.

On is used, I think, only before day or hour, not before denominations of longer time. Dryden, Dufores.

In the second month on the seven-and-twentieth day. Gen. viii. 14.

11. It is put before the object of some passion.

Commission on the king commands me stoop.
Could tears recall him into wretched life,
Their sorrow hurts themselves; on him is lost. Dryden.

12. In forms of denunciation it is put before the thing threatened.

Hence on thy life: the captive maid is mine,
Whom not for price or pray'r I will resign. Dryden.

13. Noting imprecation.

Sorrow on thee, and all the pack of you,
That triumph thus upon my misery. Shakespeare.

14. Noting invocation.

On thee, dear wife, in deserts all alone
He call'd. Dryden, Georg.

15. Noting the state of a thing fired. This sense seems peculiar, and is perhaps an old corruption of a fire.

— The earth shook to see the heavens on fire
And not in fear of your match. Shakespeare, Hen. IV.

The horses burnt as they stood fast in the stables, or by chance breaking loose, ran up and down with their tails and manes on a light fire. Kneller, Hist. of the Turks.

His fancy grows in the progress, and becomes on fire like a chariot wheel by its own rapidity. Pope, Pref. to Iliad.

16. Noting stipulation or condition.

I can be satisfied on more easy terms. Dryden.

17. Noting distinction or opposition.

Dashing the garment of peace, aloof
The sudden breach on 'em. Shakespeare, Hen. VIII.
A thriving gamester has but a poor trade on 'a,
who fills his pockets at the price of his reputation. Locke on Education.

19. Noting the matter of an event.

Note,
How much her grace is alter'd on the sudden? Shakespeare.

20. On, the same with upon. See UPON.

21. Formerly common for in: as, on live,
i. e. in life. Chaucer. See the ninth sense of A, and also the adjective ALIVE.

ON. adv.

1. Forward; in succession.

As he forbore one act, so he might have forbore another, and after that another, and so on, till he had by degrees weakened, and at length mortified and extinguished the habit itself. South, Sermon.

If the tenant fail the landlord, he comes to his creditor, and he his, and so on. Locke.

These smaller particles are again composed of others much smaller, all which together are equal to all the pores or empty spaces between them;
and so on perpetually till you come to solid particles,
such as have no pores. Newton.

2. Forward; in progression.

On indeed they went; but oh! not far;
A fatal step travers'd their head-long course. Daniel.

So saying, on he led his radiant files. Milton, P. L.

My hasting days fly on with full career. Milton, Sonnet.

Hopping and flying, thus they led him on
To the slow lake. Dryden.

What kindled in the dark the vital flame,
And ere the heart was form'd, push'd on the red-dening stream? Blackmore on Creation.

Go to, I did not mean to elude you;
On with your tale. Rowe, Jane Shore.

3. In continuance; without ceasing.

Let them sleep, let them sleep on,
Till this stormy night be gone,
And the eternal morrow dawn. Crowden.

Sing on, sing on, for I can ne'er be cloy'd. Dryden.

You roam about, and never are at rest;
By new desires, that in new torments still possess:
As in a feverish dream you still drink on,
And wonder why your thirst is never gone. Dryden.

The planets duty the sun; they work on in the hottest part of the day without intermission. Locke.

4. Not off; as, he is neither on nor off if that is, he is irresolute.

5. Upon the body, as part of dress. His cloaths were neither on nor off; they were disordered. See OFF.

A long clock he had on.
Stiff in brocade, and pin'd in stays,
Her jetties, paint, and jewels on;
All day let envy view her face,
And Phyllis is but twenty-one. Prior.

A painted vest prince Votager had on,
Which from a naked Pict his grandaunt won. Blackmore.

6. It notes resolution to advance forward; not backward.

Since 'tis decreed, and to this period led
A thousand ways, the subtlest path we'll tread;
And bravely on, till they or we, or all,
A common sacrifice to honour fall. Denham.

7. It is through almost all its significations opposed to off, and means approach, junction, addition, or presence.

ON. interject. A word of incitement or encouragement to attack; elliptically for go on.

Therefore on, or strip your sword stark-naked;
for middle you must. Shakespeare, Tw. Night.

Chaucerly on, courageous friends,
To reap the harvest of perpetual peace,
By this one bloody trial of sharp wars. Shakespeare, Rich. III.

On then, my muse! and souls and knaves expose, Young.

And, since thou can't not make a friend, make foes. Young.

ONCE. adv. [the genitive case of one;
and, aney, Sax. of an. At enat, una-vice, Sueth. ant. Kon. Styr. Serene.

1. One time.

Trees that bear mast, are fruitful but once in two years; the cause is the expence of sap. Bacon.

Forthwith from out the ark a raven flies,
And after him the surer messenger,
A dove, sent forth once and again to spy
Green trees or ground. Milton, P. L.

Once every month he march'd, and once at night. Cowley.

You came out like some great monarch, to take a town but once a year, as it were for your diversion, which he had no need to extend your territories. Dryden.

O virgin! daughter of eternal night,
Give me this once thy labour, to sustain
My right, and execute my just disdain. Dryden.

In your turnful lays,
Once more resound the great Apollo's praise. Pope.

2. A single time.

Who this heir is, he does not once tell us. Locke.

3. The same time.

At once with him they rose;
Their rising all at once was the sound
Of thunder heard remote. Milton, P. L.

For'd at this thought, at once he stral'd the breast,
And on the lips a burning fire impress'd. Dryden.

4. At a point of time indivisible.

Night came on, not by degrees prepared,
But all at once; at once the winds arise,
The thunders roll. Dryden, Cato and Iphig.

Now that the fixed stars, by reason of their immense distance, appear like points, unless so far as their light is dilated by refraction, may appear from hence, that when the moon passes over them and eclipses them, their light vanishes, not gradually like that of the planets, but all at once. Newton.

5. One time, though no more.

Fuscious, those ill deeds that suitly fume,
In blood once tainted, like a current run
From the low'd farther to the low'd son. Dryden.

6. At the time immediate.

This hath all its force at once upon the first impression, and is ever afterwards in a declining state. Atterbury.

7. Formerly; at a former time.

Therewith his arms and once-lod'd portrait lay,
Thither our fatal marriage-bed convey. Denham.

My soul had once some foolish fondness for thee,
But hence 'tis gone. Addison.

8. At a future time. Obsolete.

The wisdom of God thought fit to acquaint David with that court which we shall once govern. Bp. Hall, Contempl.

9. Once seems to be rather a noun than an adverb, when it has at before it, and when it is joined with an adjective: as, this once, that once.

ONCE. adj. [an, en, Saxon; een, Dutch;
ein, German; ts, Gr.]

1. Less than two; single; denoted by an unit.

The man he knew was one that willingly,
For our good look would hazard all. Dryden.
Toujours the Poet, and one of the wisest, acknowledge also one God, the most high, to be the father and creator of all things. Raleigh.
Love him by parts in all your numerous race,
And from those parts form one collected grace;
Then when you have refra'd to that degree,
Imagine all in one, and think that one is he. Dryden.

2. Indefinitely : any ; some one.

We shall Present our services to a fine new prince,
One of these days. Shakespeare.
I took pains to make three speak, taught these each hour
One thing or other. Shakespeare, Tempest.

3. It is added to any.

When any one heareth the word of the kingdom, and understandeth it not, then cometh the wicked one, and catcheth away that which was sown in his heart. St. Matt. xiii. 19.

If any one prince made a felicity in this life, and left fair fame after death, without the love of his subjects, there were some colour to despise it.

4. Different ; diverse : opposed to another.

What a precious comfort to have so many, like brothers, commanding one another's fortunes.

It is one thing to draw outlines true, the features like, the proportions exact, the colouring tolerable, and another thing to make all these graceful. Dryden.

Suppose the common depth of the sea, taking one place with another, to be about a quarter of a mile. Burnet.

It is one thing to think right, and another thing to know the right way to lay our thoughts before others with advantage and clearness. Locke.

My legs were clodded together by so many wrappers one over another, that I looked like an Egyptian mummy. Addison.

There can be no reason why we should prefer any one action to another, but because we have greater hopes of advantage from the one than from the other. Saunders.

Two bones rubbed hard against one another, or with a file produce a fetid smell.

At one time they keep their patients so warm, as almost to stifle them, and all of a sudden the cold regimen is in vogue. Baker on Learning.

5. One of two opposed to the other.

Ask from the one side of heaven unto the other,
whether there hath been any such thing as this.

Both the master of the stone and marble, had been at once fluid bodies, all one of them probably the marble, first growing hard, the other, as being yet of a more yielding consistence, accommodated itself to the harder's figure. Huyde.

6. Not many ; the same.

The church is therefore one, though the members may be many ; because they all agree in one faith. There is one Lord and one faith, and that truth once delivered to the saints, which whosoever shall receive, embrace, and profess, must necessarily be accounted one in reference to that profession ; for if a company of believers become a church by believing, they must also become one church by believing one truth. Penrose.

7. Particularly one.

One day when Phoebe fair,
With all her band was following the chase,
This nymph quite tir'd with heat of working air,
Sat down to rest. Spenser.

One day, in turning some uncultured ground,
In hopes a free-stone quarry might be found,
His mallet met resistance, and behold
A casket burst, with diamonds fill'd it, and gold. Harte.

8. Some future.

Heaven watch old, and all the spheres above
Shall one day fall, and their swift motion stay ;
And time itself, in time shall cease to move.
Only the soul survives and lives for aye. Devin.

ONE, n. s. [There are many uses of the word one, which serve to denominate it a substantive, though some of them may seem rather to make it a pronoun relative, and some may perhaps be considered as consistent with the nature of an adjective, the substantive being understood.]

1. A single person.

If one by one you wedded all the world,
She should beget us unparallel'd. Shakspeare.

Although the beauties, riches, honours, sciences, virtues, and perfections of all men were in the present possession of one, yet somewhat beyond and above all this there would still be sought and earnestly thirsted for. Hobbes.

From his lofty steed he flew,
And raising one by one the suppliant crew,
To comfort each. Dryden, A. T. C.

If one must be rejected, one succeed,
Make him my Lord, within whose faithful breast
Is hid my image, and who loves me best. Dryden.

When join'd in one, the good, the fair, the great,
Descends to view the muse's humble seat. Granville.

2. A single mass or aggregate.

It is one thing only as a heap is one. Blackmore.

3. The first hour.

Till 'tis one o'clock, our dance of custom Will us not forget. Shakspeare, M. Wives of Windsor.

4. The same thing.

I answer'd not again :
But that's all one. Shakspeare.

To be in the understanding, and not to be understood, is all one as to say any thing is, and is not in the understanding. Locke.

5. A person, indefinitely and loose.

A good acquaintance with method will greatly assist every one in ranging human affairs.

Watts, Logic.

6. A person by way of eminence.

Ferdinand
My father, king of Spain, was reckon'd one,
The wisest prince that there had reign'd. Shakspeare.

7. A distinct or person.

That man should be the teacher is no part of the matter ; for birds will learn one of another.

No nations are wholly alien and strangers the one to the other. Bacon, Hist. Nat.

The obedience of the one to the call of grace, when the other, supposed to have sufficient, if not an equal measure, obeys not, may reasonably be imputed to the humble, malleable, melting temper.

Hammond.

One or other sees a little box, which was carried away with her, and so discovers her to her friends.

Dryden.

8. Persons united.

As I have made ye one, lords, one remain :
So I grow stronger, you more honour gain. Shakspeare.

9. Concord ; agreement ; one mind.

The king was well instructed how to carry himself between Ferdinand and Philip, resolving to keep them at one within themselves. Bacon, Hen. VII.

He is not at one with himself what account to give of it. Tillotson.

10. [On, Fon, French. It is used sometimes as a general or indefinite nominative for any man, any person. For one the English formerly used men ; as, they live obscurely, men know not how ; or die obscurely, men mark not when. Asscham. For which it would now be said, one knows not when, one knows not when ;

or it is not known how.] Any person ;
any man indefinitely.

It is not worthy to be brought to heretical errors by fortune or necessity, like Ulysses and Æneas, as by one's own choice and working.

Silvery.

One may be little the wiser for reading this dis-logue, since it neither sets forth what Erona is, nor what the cause should be which threatens her with death.

Silvery.

One would imagine these to be the expressions of a man blessed with ease, affluence, and power ; not of one who had been just stripped of all those advantages.

For provoking of urine, one should begin with the gentlest first. Arbuthnot on Disasters.

For some time one was not thought to understand Aristotle, unless he had read him with Averro's comment. Shakspeare.

11. A person of particular character.

Then must you speak
Of one that lov'd not wisely but too well ;
Of one not easily jealous ; but being wrought
Perplex'd in the extreme. Shakspeare, Othello.

With lives and fortunes trusting one
Who so discreetly us'd his own. Waller.

Edward I. was one who very well knew how to use a victory, as well as obtain it. Hale.

One who contemned divine and human laws.
Dryden.

Forgive me, if that title I afford
To one, whom Nature meant to be a lord. Harte.

12. One has sometimes a plural, either when it when it stands for persons indefinitely ;
as, the great ones of the world ; or when it relates to something going before, and is only the representative of the antecedent noun. This relative mode of speech, whether singular or plural, is in my ear not very elegant, yet is used by good authors.

Be not found here ; hence with your little ones.

Shakspeare.

Does the sun receive a natural life ? The subject enjoys a civil one : that's but the matter, this the form. Hobbes.

These successes are more glorious when being benefit to the world, than such ruinous ones as are died in human blood. Granville.

He that will overlook the true reason of a thing which is but one, may easily find many false ones, error being infinite. Tillotson.

The following plain rules and directions, are not the less useful because they are plain ones.

Atterbury.

There are many whose waking thoughts are wholly employed on their sleeping ones.

Addison, Spect.

Arbitrary power tends to make a man a bad sovereign, who might possibly have been a good one, had he been invested with an authority limited by law.

This evil force which attends extraordinary rulers, hath been imputed to divers causes that need not be set down, than no obvious an one occurs, than when a great genius appears, the dances are all in conspiracy against him. Sayt.

13. One another, is a mode of speech very frequent ; as, they love one another ;
that is, one of them loves another ; the storm beats the trees against one another ; that is, one against another.

In democratical governments, was did commonly unite the minds of men ; when they had enemies abroad, they did not contend with one another at home. Deccum.

O'NEBERRY. n. s. [aconitum, Lat.] Wolf's-bane.

ONEEYED. adj. [one and eye.] Having only one eye.

A sign-post dauber wou'd disdain to paint
The one-eyed hero on his elephant. Dryden.

The mighty family
Of one-eyed brothers hasten to the shore. Addison.

ONEIROCRITICAL. adj. [oneirocritique, French; oneirocriticus, Gr.; it should therefore according to analogy be written oneirocritical and oneirocritic.] Interpretative of dreams.

If a man has no mind to pass by abruptly from his imagined to his real circumstances, he may employ himself in that new kind of observation which my oneirocritical correspondent has directed him to make. Addison, Spect.

ONEIROCRITICK. n. s. [oneirocriticus, Greek.] An interpreter of dreams.

Having surveyed all ranks and professions, I do not find in any quarter of the town an oneirocritic, or an interpreter of dreams. Addison, Spect.

ONEIROCRITICKS. n. s. pl. Interpretations of dreams.

A pretence as groundless and silly as the dreaming oneirocriticks of Artemidorus and Astrampychus, or the modern chymistry and divinations of gipsies. Bentley, Sermon.

ONEIROMANCY. n. s. [oneiro, and mantra, Greek.] Divination by dreams.

These rude observations were at last linked into an art, physical oneiromancy; in which physicians, from a consideration of the dreams, proceeded to a crisis of the disposition of the person. Smyser on Feud. (1665), p. 297.

O'NEMENT. n. s. [from one.] State of being one; union. Not in use.

Ye wretches gallants, I beseech your hearts,
That seek such discord 'twixt agreeing parts,
Which never can be set at onement more. By. Heil, Sat. iii. 7.

O'NESS. n. s. [from one.] Unity; the quality of being one.

Our God is one, or rather very oneness and more unity, having nothing but itself in itself, and not consisting, as all things do besides God, of many things. Haker.

The oneness of our Lord Jesus Christ, referring to the several hypostases, is the one eternal indivisible divine nature, and the eternity of the Son's generation, and his co-eternity, and his consubstantiality with the Father when he came down from Heaven and was incarnate. Hemmond.

ONERARY. adj. [onerarius, Lat. oneraire, Fr.] Fitted for carriage or burthens; comprising a burthen.

To O'NERATE. v. a. [onero, Latin.] To load; to burthen.

ONERATION. n. s. [from onerate.] The act of loading. Dict.

O'NEROUS. adj. [onerous, French; onerous, Latin.] Burthensome; oppressive.

Overcome and tormented with worldly cares, and onerous business. Burton, Anat. of Mel. p. 171.

A banished person, absent out of necessity, retains all things onerous to himself, as a punishment for his crime. Aplif.

O'NION. n. s. [oignon, French; unian, Su. Goth. unio, Latin. Perhaps all from the Celtic: wynwyn is the Welsh word.] A plant.

If the boy have not a woman's gift
To rain a shower of commanded tears,
An onion will do well. Shakespeare, Tem. of the Shrove.
I am an onion-eyed. Shakespeare, Ant. and Cleop.

This is ev'ry cook's opinion,
No savory dish without an onion;
But lest your kissing should be spoil'd,
Your onions must be thoroughly boil'd. Swift.

O'NLY. adj. [from one, only, or onelik; onelik, Saxon.]

1. Single; one and no more.
Of all whom fortune to my sword did bring,
This only man was worth the conquering. Dryden.

2. This need no other.
The only child of shadeful Saverlake. Dryden.
The logic now in use has long possessed the chair, as the only art taught in the schools for the direction of the mind in the study of the sciences. Locke.

3. This above all other: as, he is the only man for music.

Whose only joy was to relieve the needs
Of wretched souls. Spenser, F. G.
His only least-sore, and his only foe. Spenser, F. G.

4. Alone.
With the only twinkle of her eye
She could or save or spill. Spenser, F. G.

The only sound
Of leaves and fuming rills. Milton, P. L.

O'NLY. adv. [supposed by some to be an abbreviation of alonely. See ALONELY.]

1. Simply; singly; merely; barely.
I propose my thoughts only as conjectures. Burket.

The posterity of the wicked inherit the fruit of their father's vices; and that not only by a just judgement, but from the natural course of things. Milton.
All who deserve his love, he makes his own;
And to be lov'd himself, needs only to be known. Dryden.

The practice of virtue is attended not only with present quiet and satisfaction, but with comfortable hope of a future recompence. Nicom.

Nor must this contrition be exercised by us, only for grosser evils; but when we live the best. Wahr.

2. So and no otherwise.
Every imagination of the thoughts of his heart, was evil continually. Gen. vi. 5.

3. Singly without more, as, only begotten.

O'NOMANCY. n. s. [onoma and mantra.] Divination by a name.

Destinies were superstitiously, by onomancy, deciphered out of names, as though the names and natures of men were suitable, and fatal necessities concurred herein with voluntary motion. Comden.

ONOMANTICAL. adj. [onoma and mantic.] Predicting by names.

Theodotus, when curious to know the success of his war against the Romans, an onomantical or name-wizard Jew, would him to shut up a number of swine and give some of them Roman names, others Gothic names with several marks, and there to leave them. Comden.

O'NSET. n. s. [on and set.]

1. Attack; storm; assault; first brunt.
As well the soldier dieth, which standeth still, as he that gives the bravest onset. Sidney.

All breathless, weary, faint,
Him spying, with fresh onset he assail'd,
And kindling new his courage, seeming quiet,
Struck him so hugely, that through great constraint
He made him stoop. Spenser, F. G.

The shout
Of battle now began, and rushing sound
Of onset. Milton, P. L.

Sometimes it gains a point, and presently it finds itself baffled and beaten off; yet still it renews the onset, attacks the difficulty afresh; plants this reasoning and that argument, like so many intellectual batteries, till at length it forces a way into the obstinate enclosed truth. Bosch.

Without men and provisions it is impossible to secure conquests that are made in the first onset of an invasion. Addison.

Observe
The first impetuous onsets of his grief;
Use every artifice to keep him sedate. Philips.

2. Something added or set on by way of ornamental appendage. This sense, says Nicholson, is still retained in Northumberland, where onset means a tuft. Dr. Johnson. — The northern meaning is not disputed; but the word in the tragedy of Titus Andronicus, which Dr. Johnson cites as an example of that meaning, signifies simply a beginning; "an inchoation or onset," as Hakewill in his Apology for Providence illustrates it, p. 86. ed. 1630.

I will with deeds requite thy gentleness;
And for an onset, thus, to advance
Thy name and honourable family
Lavinia will I make my empress. Tu. Andronicus.

To O'NSET. v. a. [from the noun.] To set upon; to begin. Not used.

This for a while was hoisted against a reasonable price offered, but soon cooled again. Curren.

O'NSLAUGHT. n. s. [on and slay.] Sax. onslagan. See ANSLAUGHT, and SLAUGHTER.] Attack; storm; onset. Not in use.

They made a halt
To view the ground, and where 't assault;
Then call'd a council, which was best.
By siege or onslaught, to invest
The enemy; and 'twas agreed
By storm and onslaught to proceed. Hudders.

The several deeds, onslaughts, storms, and military appearances. Gayton on D. Quir. p. 19.

O'NSTEAD. n. s. [on and stet, locus, Sax.] A single farm-house. North. Grose.

Buildings on a farm; a stead near the house for cattle or stacks. See Brockett's N. C. Words.

ONTOLOGIST. n. s. [from ontology.] One who considers the affections of being in general; a metaphysician.

ONTOLOGY. n. s. [onta and logos.] The science of the affections of being in general; metaphysics.

The modes, accidents, and relations that belong to various beings, are copiously treated of in metaphysics, or more properly ontology. Watts, Logic.

O'NWARD. adv. [onward, Saxon.]

1. Forward; progressively.

My lord,
When you went onward on this ended action,
I look'd upon her with a soldier's eye. Shakspeare.

Seen was now at hand, and from his seat
The monster moving onward came as fast,
With horrid strides. Milton, P. L.

Him through the spicy forest onward came Adam discern'd, as in the door he sat
Of his cool tower. Milton, P. L.

Not one looks backward, onward will he go,
Yet ne'er looks forward farther than his nose. Page.

2. In a state of advanced progression.

You are already so far onward of your way, that you have forsaken the imitation of ordinary converse. Dryden.

3. Somewhat farther.

A little onward lead thy guiding hand
To these dark steps, a little farther on. Milton, S. A.

O'NWARD.* adj. [from the adv.]

1. Advanced; increased; improved.

Philoxenus came to see how onward the fruits were of his friend's labour. Sidney.

2. Conducting; leading forward to perfection.

Sincerity,
Thou first of virtues, let no mortal leave Thy onward path! — Hens, Trage, of Douglas.
In agonies of grief thou hast the hour,
When first they left Religion's onward way.
Glyn, Day of Judgement.

O'NWARDS.* adv. In progression.

Onwards, that such separation may be made of man and wife for bereavement or mischief, we need no other conviction than that peremptory and clear determination of our Saviour, which we have formerly insisted on.

By. Hist. Quers of Cons. D. 4. C. 2.

O'NYCHA. n. s. It is found in two different genera. The odorous snail or shell, and the stone onyx. The greatest part of commentators explain it by the onyx or odorous shell. The onyx is fished for in the Indies, where grows the spicardian, the food of this fish and what makes its shell so aromatic.

Calmel.

Take sweet spices, myrrour, and galbanum.

Er. xxx. 34.

O'NYX. n. s. [Græc.] The onyx is a semi-pellucid gem, of which there are several species, but the bluish white kind, with brown and white zones, is the true onyx legitim of the ancients.

Hill, Mat. Med.

Now are her rare endowments to be sold,
For glittering and by Ophir shown,
The blue-eyed sapphire, or rich onyx stone. Sandys.

The onyx is an accidental variety of the agate kind; it is of a dark horny colour, in which is a plate of a bluish white, and sometimes of red; when on one or both sides the white, there happens to be also a plate of a reddish or flesh colour, the jewellers call the stone a sardonyx.

Woodward on Fossils.

OOZE.* n. s. [either from caux, waters,

Fr. or pu, wetness, Saxon. Dr. Johnson. — Socrates refers to the Su. Goth. oz, the mouth of a river, kaell-oz, locus uliginosus; and to the German asche, flowing water; which Wachter pronounces a Celtic word. See ASCHE in Wachter.]

1. Soft mud; mire at the bottom of water; slime.

My son it's our he biddeth. Shaksp. Tempest.
Some carried up into their grounds the ooze or salt water mud, and found good profit thereby. Cervus.

Old father Thames rais'd up his reverend head,
Deep in his ooze he sought his scaly bed,
And shrunk his waters back into his urn. Dryden.

2. Soft flow; running. This seems to be the meaning in Prior.

From his first fountain and beginning ooz.
Down to the sea each brook and torrent flows. Prior.

3. The liquor of a tanner's vat. [See

Wachter in ASCHER.]
Before the bark of the oak is used, it is ground to powder, and the infusion of it in water is by the tanners termed ooze. Woodward on Fossils.

Woodward on Fossils.

To OOZE, v. n. [from the noun.] To flow by stealth; to run gently; to drain away.

When the contracted limbs were cramp'd, even then
A wretched humour swell'd and oozed again. Dryden.

The lily drinks
The latent rill, scarce oozing through the grass. Thomson.

O'OZE.* adj. [from ooze.] Miry; muddy; slimy.

His rustic crew with mighty poles
Would drive his oxen from their oozy stables,
And so pursue them down the rolling flood. King, The Fairhead.

The oozy places and holes, which, it must be supposed, the sea left behind it.

Lucas, Short Met. with the Deists.

From his oozy bed
Old father Thames advanc'd his reverend head. Pope.

To OPA'CATE. v. a. [opaco, Latin.] To shade; to cloud; to darken; to obscure.

The same corpules upon the unstopping of the glass did opacate that part of the air they moved in. Bogel.

OPACITY. n. s. [opacitè, Fr. opacitas, Latin.] Cloudiness; want of transparency.

Can any thing escape eyes in whose optics there is no opacity? Brown.

Had there not been any night, shadow, or opacity, we should never have had any determination of colour.

How much any body hath of colour, so much hath it of opacity, and by so much the more unfit it is to transmit the species. Ray on the Creation.

The least parts of almost all bodies are in some measure transparent; and the opacity of those bodies arises from the multitude of reflexions caused in their internal parts. Newton.

OPACOUS. adj. [opacus, Latin.] Dark; obscure; not transparent.

When he perceives that opacous bodies do not hinder the eye from judging light to have an equal diffusion through the whole place that it irradiates, he can have no difficulty to allow air, that is diaphanous, and more subtle far than they, and consequently, divisible into lesser atoms; and having lesser pores, gives less scope to our eyes to mix light. Dugby.

Upon the firm opacous globe
Of this round world, whose first convex divides
The luminous inferior orbs, intell'd
From chaos, and the inroad of darkness odd, Saturn alighted. Milton, P. L.

OPACOUNESS.* n. s. [from opacous.] The state of being opaque.

Mysterie, which (without these coverings) even the opacouness of the place were not obscure enough to conceal. Erasmus, B. iv. § 8.

O'PAL.* n. s. [opalus, Lat.] A gem of great beauty, of a milky hue, and remarkable for the changes of colour belonging to other gems, which it exhibits, as it is variously turned about.

Thy mind is a very opal. Shaksp. Tr. Night.

The empyreal heaven, extended wide
In circuit, undetermined square or round;
With opal towers, and battlements adorn'd
Of living opaline. Milton, P. L.
We have this stone from Germany, and is the same with the opal of the ancients. Woodward on Fossils.

OPA'QUE.* adj. [opacus, Lat. Written also opake.] Dark; not transparent; cloudy.

The night's nimble net,
That doth encompass every opake ball. Morr, Life of the Soul, lib. 2.

Shot upward still direct, whence no way round Shadow from body opake can fall. Milton, P. L.
These disappearing flat stars were actually extinguished and turned into more opaque and gross planet-like bodies. Chyren, Phil. Prim.

OPA'QUE.* n. s. Opacity.

Through this opaque nature, and of soul,
This double night. Young, Night Tr. 1.
Vivid green,
Warm browns, and black opake, the foreground bears conspicuous. Mason.

OPA'QUENESS.* n. s. [from opaque.] State of being opaque.

The earth's opaqueness, remedy to light.
Morr, Immortality of the Soul, l. ii. 31.

TO OPE. v. a. [open, Saxon; ope, Ice-
To O'PEN.] To launch; to, Gr. a hole.

Ope is used only in poetry, when one syllable is more convenient than two.]

1. To uncloset; to unlock; to put into such a state as that the inner parts may be seen or entered; the contrary to shut.

The world's mine opened,
Which I with sword will open. Shakspere, M. Wives of Windsor.

Before you fight, ope this letter. Shakspere, A. Lear.

They consent to work us harm and woe
To ope the gates, and so let in our foe. Fairfax.

If a man open a pit and not cover it, and an ox fall therein, the owner of the pit shall make it good. Ex. xxi. 23.

Let us pass through your land, and none shall do you any hurt; bowbait they would not open unto him. 1 Mac. v. 48.

Open thy mouth for the dumb in the cause of all such as are appointed to destruction. Prov. xxii. 8.

Adam, now ope thine eyes; and first behold
The effects which thy original birth wrought
In some spring from thence. Milton, P. L.

The draw-bridge at Amsterdam part in the middle, and a vessel, though under sail, may pass them without the help of any one on shore; for the mast-head, or break-water of the ship beating against the bridge in the middle, opens it. Brown.

Our fleet Apollo sends,
Where Tuscan Tyber rolls with rapid force,
And where Nereus opens his holy source. Dryden.

When first ope your doors, and passing by The sad ill-conceal'd opake meet your eye. Dryden.
My old wounds are open'd at this view.

And in my murderer's presence bleed aw. Dryden.

When the matter is made, the side must be opened to let it out. Arbuthnot on Aliments.

The wall of the cathedral church was opened by an earthquake, and shut again by a second. Addison on Italy.

4. To explain; to disclose.

Some things are written open by the sacred books of Scripture, some things by the glorious works of nature. Hosier.

Paul reasoned with them out of the Scriptures, opening and alleging, that Christ must needs have suffered, and risen again from the dead.

Acts, xlv. 3.

After the earl of Lincoln was slain, the king opened himself to some of his council, that he was sorry for the earl's death, because by him he might have known the bottom of his danger.

Bacon, Hen. VII.

Gramont, governor of Bayonne, took an exquisite notice of their persons and behaviour, and opened himself to some of his train, that he thought them to be gentlemen of much more worth than their habits betrayed.

Watson.

A friend who relates his success, talks himself into a new pleasure; and by opening his misfortunes, leaves part of them behind him.

Culture on Friendship.

5. To begin; to make the initial exhibition. You retained him only for the opening of your cause, and your main lawyer is yet behind.

Homar opens his poem with the utmost simplicity and modesty; he continually grows upon the reader.

Notes on the Odyssey.

To O'PEN. } v. n.

1. To unclose itself; not to remain shut; not to continue closed.

The hundred doors

In that little spot of ground that lies between those two great oceans of eternity, we are to exercise our thoughts, and lay open the treasures of the divine wisdom and goodness hid in this part of nature and providence.

Burnet.

Moral principles require reasoning and discourse to discover the certainty of their truths: they lie not open as natural characters engraven on the mind.

Locke.

6. Not restrained; not denied; not precluded.

If Demetrius and the craftsmen have a matter against any man, the law is open, and there are deputies: let them impeach one another.

Acts, xix. 38.

Not cloudy; not gloomy. Dr. Johnson.—The solitary example, which Dr. Johnson here brings from Bacon, shews that not frosty, or mild, is the meaning of the word; and such is the general acceptation of an open winter.

An open and warm winter portended a hot and dry summer.

Bacon, Nat. Hist.

Did you ever see so open a winter in England? We have not had two frosty days; but it pays it off in rain.

Swift, Lett.

7. Uncovered.

With open head, and foot all bare, His hair to up-brush, she gun to fare.

You will hear what plays were acted that week, which is the fustion song in the opera.

OPERABLE, adj. [from operator, Latin.] To be done; practicable. Not in use.

Being incapable of operative circumstances, or rightly to judge the practicality of affairs, they only gaze upon the visible success, and thereafter condemn or cry up the whole progression.

Brown, Vulg. Err.

OPERANT, adj. [operant, French.] Active; having power to produce any effect. A word not in use, though elegant.

Earth, yield me roots!

Who seeks for better of thee, sauce his palate
With thy most operant poison. Shakespeare, Titus.

I must leave thee, love, and shortly too;
My operant powers their functions leave to do.

Shakespeare.

To OPERATE, v. n. [operator, Latin; operer, Fr.] To act; to have agency; to produce effects: with or before the subject of operation.

The virtues of private persons operate but on a few; their sphere of action is narrow, and their influence is confined to it.

Bodies produce ideas in us manifestly by impulse, the only way which we can conceive bodies operate in.

It can operate on the guts and stomach, and thereby produce distinct ideas.

A plain convincing reason operates on the mind, both of a learned and ignorant hearer as long as they live.

Where causes operate freely, with a liberty of indifference to this or the contrary, the effect will be contingent, and the certain knowledge of it belongs only to God.

Watts.

OPERATION, n. s. [operatio, Latin; operation, French.]

1. Agency; production of effects; influence.

There are in some operations natural, rational, supernatural, some political, some finally ecclesiastical.

By all the operations of the orbs,
From whom we do exist, and cease to be,
Here I disclaim all my paternal care,

Knowledge of good and ill, shun to taste.

Milton, P. L.

If the operation of these salts be in convenient glasses promoted by warmth, the ascending streams may easily be caught and reduced into a penetrant spirit.

Boyle.

Speculative painting, without the assistance of manual operation, can never attain to perfection, but slothfully languishes; for it was not with his tongue that Apelles performed his noble works.

Bayle.

The pain and sickness caused by manna, are the effects of its operation on the stomach and guts by the size, motion, and figure of its insensable parts.

Locke.

2. Action; effect. This is often confounded with the former sense.

Repentance and renovation remain not in the strife, will, or purpose, but in the actual operation of good life.

Hammond.

Many medicinal drugs of rare operation.

Heglyn.

That false fruit

Far other operation first display'd,

Milton, P. L.

The offices appointed, and the powers exercised in the church, by their institution and operation are holy.

Pearson.

In this understanding piece of clock-work, his body as well as other senseless matter has colour, warmth, and softness. But these qualities are not subsistent in these bodies, but are operations of fancy begotten in something else.

Henley.

3. [In chirurgery.] The part of the art of healing which depends on the use of instruments.

4. The motions or employments of an army.

OPERATIVE, adj. [from operate.] Having the power of acting; having forcible agency; active; vigorous; efficacious.

To be over curious in searching how God's all-piercing and operative spirit distinguishing gave form to the matter of the universal, is a search like unto his, who, not contented with a known form, will presume to pass over the greatest rivers in all parts where he is ignorant of their depths.

Many of the nobility endeavoured to make themselves popular, by speaking in parliament against those things which were most grateful to his majesty; and he thought it least discountenance upon those persons would suppose that spirit within themselves, or make the poison of it less operative upon others.

Clarendon.

In actions of religion we should be zealous, active, and operative, so far as prudence will permit.

By. Taylor.

This circumstance of the promise must give life to all the rest, and make them operative toward the producing of good life.

Denby of Chr. Piet.

It holds in all operative principles, especially in morality, in which not to proceed, is certainly to go backward.

South.

The will is the conclusion of an operative syllogism.

Norris.

OPERATOR, n. s. [operator, French; from operate.] One that performs any act of the hand; one who produces any effect.

An imaginary operator opening the first with a great deal of nicety, upon a cursory view it appeared like the hand of another.

Addison, Spect.

To administer this dose, there cannot be fewer than fifty thousand operators, allowing one operator to every thirty.

Swift.

OPEROSITY, adj. [operosus, Latin.] Laborious; full of trouble and tediousness.

The square letters are less operose, more expedite and facile, than the Samaritan.

Shillingfleet, Orig. Soc. i. 6.

Such an explication is purely imaginary, and also very operose; they would be as hard put to it to get rid of this water, when the deluge was to cease, as they were at first to procure it.

Barnet, Theory.

Written language, as it is more operose, so it is more digested, and is permanent.

Holder.

Neatness, usefulness, and elegant simplicity, seemed to have taken place of operose grandeur and profusion of stupid ornaments.

Cowley, Pind. in Hydr. Conv. 2.

OPEROSNESS, n. s. [from operate.] State of being operose.

They are far more easy, and reach the main design in a less compass of words; and have not that operosness of synchronisms necessarily hanging on them as the other have for the clearing of the sense.

More on the Seven Churches, (1669.)

OPEROSITY, n. s. [from operate.] Operation; action.

There is a kind of operosity in sin, in regard whereof sinners are styled the workers of iniquity.

Sp. Hall, Sacred Thoughts, i. 65.

OPHIOPHAGOUS, adj. [ῥέφις and φαγέω.] Serpent-eating. Not used.

All snakes are not of such poisonous qualities as common opinion presumes; it is as comfortable from ophiophagous nations, and such as feed upon serpents.

Brown.

OPHTHES, n. s. A stone, resembling a serpent.

Ophtes has a dusky greenish ground, with spots of a lighter green, oblong, and usually very square.

Woodward.

OPHTHICUS, n. s. [ὀφθαλμικός, Greek, anglicanens, serpent-beater.] A constellation of the northern hemisphere.

Satan stood

Unfertilized, and like a comet burn'd,
That fires the length of Ophticus huge

In the arctic sky. Milton, P. L.

OPHTHALMICK, adj. [ophthalmique, Fr.; from ὀφθαλμός, Greek.] Relating to the eye.

OPHTHALMIC, n. s. [ophthalmie, Fr.; from ὀφθαλμός, Greek, the eye. Not content with this word, which is of considerable age in our language, many persons now affectively use ophthalmia.]

A disease of the eyes, being an inflammation in the coats, proceeding from arterious blood gotten out of the vessels and collected into those parts. Dict.

By reason of some particular detemper of the eyes, as exaltation, catula, ophthalmia.

Fernand on Lucr. Metaph. (1640.) p. 128.

The use of cool applications, externally, is most easy to the eye; but after all, there will sometimes ensue a troublesome ophthalmia.

Surgey, Surgery.

OPHTALMIA, n. s. [from ophtalm.] A medicine that causes sleep.

They chose atheism as an ophtalmia, to still those frightening apprehensions of hell, by inducing a dulness and lethargy of mind, rather than to make use of that native and salutary medicine, a hearty repentance.

Ready.

Thy thoughts and music change with every line;
No sameness of a prattling strain is thine,
Which with one unison of murmur flows,
Ophtalmia of inattention and repose.

Hart.

OPHTALMIA, adj. Soporiferous; somniferous; narcotic; causing sleep.

The particular ingredients of those magical ointments, are opium and superfinery. For anointing of the forehead and back bone, is used for procuring deep sleep.

Bacon.

All their shape

Spangled with eyes, more numerous than those
Of Argus, and more wakeful than to drowse,
Cham'd with Arcadian pipes, the pastoral reed
Of Hermes, or his quiet rood. Milton, P. L.
Lettuce, which has a milky juice with an anodyne or opiate quality solvent of the bile, is proper for melancholy. Arbushnot on Aliments.

O'PIFICATE. v. a. [opificium, Latin.] Workmanship; handiwork. Dict.

OPI'VER. n. s. [opifer, Latin.] One that performs any work; artist. A word not received.

Considering the infinite distance betwixt the poor mortal artist, and the almighty opifer.

OPI'NABLE. adj. [opinor, Latin.] Which may be thought. Dict.

Opinable matters, and disputable.
Confutation of N. Shotton, &c. (1546), sign. C. iii. h.
OPI'NATION. n. s. [opinor, Latin.] Opinion; notion.

OPI'NATIVE. adj. [opinor, Latin.] Stiff in a preconceived notion. We now say opinionative.

Speak truth: be not opinative; maintain no factions. Burton, Anat. of Mel. p. 365.

OPI'NATOR. n. s. [opinor, Latin.] One who holds an opinion; one fond of his own notion.

Fond opinators invest their beloved congregation with all the glorious privileges and titles, making angels of their own men. Gleanville, Sermon, p. 135.

Consider against what kind of opinators the reason above given is levelled.

Hale, Orig. of Mankind.

To OPI'NE. v. n. [opinor, Latin.] To think; to judge; to be of opinion.

For is an eagle, that farns and
And haunts by fits those whom it takes;
And they'll opine they feel the pain;
And blows they felt to-day, again. Hudibras.

In matters of mere speculation, it is not material to the welfare of government, or themselves, whether they opine right or wrong, and whether they be philosophers or no. South.

But I, who think once highly of my kind,
Opiate, that nature, as in duty bound,
Deep hid the shining mischief under ground. Pope.

OPI'NER. n. s. [from opine.] One who holds an opinion.

Weak and wilful opiners, but not just arbitrators.
By. Taylor, Arif. Handson, p. 157.

OPI'NING. n. s. [from opine.] Opinion; notion.

Very few examine the marrow and inside of things, but take them upon the credit of customary opinions. By. Taylor, Arif. Handson, p. 131.

OPI'NISTRE. adj. [opiniastre, French.]
OPI'NISTROUS. Fond of one's own opinion. Not in use. The substantives opiniastre and opiniastrie have likewise not been received.

What Dr. Johnson says under opiniastrie.

Men are so far in love with their own opiniastrie conceits, as that they cannot patiently endure opo-sition. Raleigh, Arts of Emp. ch. 14.

Next, in matters of death, the laws of England, whereof you may think to be an opiniastrie
subduer, and are bound to defend them, conceive it not enjoined in Scripture, when or for what cause they shall be put to death, as in adultery, theft, and the like. Milton, Calisto.

To OPI'NIATE. v. a. [opiniatrer, French.]
To maintain obstinately.

They did opiniate two principles, not distinct only, but contrary the one to the other.

Burton, Sermon.

OPI'NIATIVE. adj. [from opinion.]

1. Stiff in a preconceived notion.

If either the obstinacy of the pope's ambition, or the wilfulness or acrologism of any opiniastrie ministers should oppose against and impeach the unity of charity; then, the unity of authority to be interposed to assist it.

2. Imagined; not proved.

It is difficult to find out truth, because it is in such inconsiderable proportions scattered in a mass of opiniastrie uncertainties; like the silver in Hiero's crown of gold. Gleanville.

OPI'NIATIVENESS. n. s. [from opiniastrie.]
Inflexibility of opinion; obstinacy.

The first obstacle to good counsel is pertinacity or opiniastrie. Raleigh, Arts of Emp. ch. 14.

OPI'NIATOR. n. s. [opiniastre, French.] One fond of his own notion; inflexible; adherent to his own opinion.

What will not opiniators and self-believing men dispute of and make doubt of? Raleigh.

Essex left Lord Roberts governor; a man of a sour and surely nature, a great opiniator, and one who must be overcome before he would believe that he could be so. Clarendon.

For all his exact plot, down was be cast from all his greatness, and forced to end his days in a modest condition; as it is pity but all such political opiniators should. South.

OPI'NIATRE. adj. [French.] Obstinate; stubborn; inflexible.

Spare yourself, lest you bejude the good galloway, your own opiniastrie wit, and make the very conceit itself bluish with spurgalling.

Milton, Animate, Rem. Defence.
What in common life would denote a man rash, feel-hard, hair-brained, opinionist, created, is recommended in this scheme as the true method in speculation. Bentley, Phil. Jaja, s. 15.

Instead of an able man, you desire to have him an insignificant wrangler, opiniastrie in discourse, and priding himself in contradicting others. Locke.

OPI'NIATRE. n. s. One fond of his own notions; one stiff in his own opinions.

To be termed a opiniastrie simpleton, a clownish singularist, or non-conformist to ordinary usage, a stiff opiniastrie, are opprobrious names, which divert many persons from their duty.

Burton, vol. iii. s. 34.

OPI'NIATRETY. n. s. [opiniastretre, Fr.]

OPI'NIATRY. } Obstinacy; inflexibility; determination of mind; stubbornness.
This word, though it has been tried in different forms, is not yet received, nor is it wanted.

Least popular opiniastrie should arise, we will deliver the chief opinions. Brown, Vulg. Err.
The one sets the thoughts upon wit and false colours, and not upon truth; the other teaches fallacy, wrangling, and opiniastrie.

Locke on Education.
So much as we ourselves comprehend of truth and reason, so much we possess of real and true knowledge. The floating of other men's opinions in our brains, make us not one jot the more knowing, though they happen to be true: what in them was science, is in us but opiniastrie. Locke.
I can pass by opiniastrie and the busy meddling of those who thrust themselves into every thing.

Woodward, Lett.
I was extremely concerned at his opiniastrie in leaving me; but he shall not get rid so. Pope.

OPI'NIATION. n. s. [opinor, Fr. opinio,
Latin.]

1. Persuasion of the mind, without proof or certain knowledge.

Opinion is a light, vain, crude, and imperfect thing, settled in the imagination, but never arriving at the understanding, there to obtain the structure of reason. B. Johnson.

Opinion is, when the assent of the understanding is so far gained by evidence of probability, that it rather inclines to one persuasion than to another, yet not altogether without a mixture of incertainty or doubting. Hale.

Time wears out the fictions of opinion, and doth by degrees discover and unmask that fallacy of ungrounded persuasions; but confirms the dictates and sentiments of nature. Wifkins.

Blest be the prince who have thought
For pompous names, or wide dominion,
Since by their error we are taught,
That happiness is but opinion. Prior.

2. Sentiments; judgement; notion.

Where on such settled custom hath made it law, there it hath force only according to the strength of reason and circumstances joined with it, or as it shows the opinion and judgement of them that made it; but not at all as if it had any commanding power of obedience. Selden.

Can they make it out against the common sense and opinion of all mankind, that there is no such thing as a future state of misery for such as have lived ill here? South.

Charity itself commands us, where we know no ill, to think well of all; but friendship, that always goes a pitch higher, gives a man a peculiar right and claim to the good opinion of his friend.

South.
We may allow this to be his opinion concerning heirs, that where there are divers children the eldest son has the right to be heir.

Philosophers are of opinion, that infinite space is possessed by God's infinite omnipresence. Locke.
A story out of Boccalini sufficiently shews us the opinion, that judicious author entertained of the critics. Addison.

3. Favourable judgement.

In actions of arms small matters are of great moment, especially when they serve to raise an opinion of commanders. Hayward.

However I have an opinion of those things;
yet so much I conceive to be true, that strong imagination hath more force upon things living, than things merely inanimate. Bacon.

If a woman had an opinion of her own person and dress, she would ever be angry at those who are of the opinion with herself. Latin.

4. Reputation.

Thou hast redem'd thy lost opinion.
Shakespeare, Hen. IV. p. 1.

You have the opinion
Of a valiant gentleman, one that dares fight, and maintain your honour against odds.

Shirley, Generous.

To OPI'NIOS. v. a. [from the noun.] To opine; to think. A word out of use, and unworthy of revival.

The Stoicks opiniated the souls of wise men dwelt about the middle of their heads, derived about the earth; whereas the Epicureans held nothing after death. Brown.

That the soul and the angels are devoid of quantity and dimension, is generally opiniated.
Gleanville, Scrips.

OPI'NIOS. adj. Attached to particular opinions; conceited.

He may cast his upon a bold self-opiniated physician, worse than his distemper.

South, Sermon, i. 8b.

OPI'NIOSATE. adj. [from opinion.] Ob-OPI'NIOSATED. } stinate; inflexible in opinion.

Are you so simple as not to discern between the cooler of some few opiniastrie men, and the consequence of their opinions?

By. Bedell, Lett. to Mr. Wadsworth, (about 1690), p. 325.

People of clear heads are what the world calls opinionated. Shenstone.

OPINIONATELY.* adv. [from opinionate.] Obstinately; conceitedly; in one's own opinion.

Self-conceited people never agree well together; they are wilful in their brains, and reason cannot reconcile them; where others are only opinionately wise, hell is there; unless the other be a patient merely. Fotherham, Rec. i. 85.

OPINIONATIST.* n. s. [from opinionate.] One who is obstinate or conceited.

If we would hearken to the pernicious counsels of some such opinionatists.

Fenton, Sermon before the Univ. of Oxf. (1780), p. 11.

OPINIONATIVE. adj. [from opinion.] Fond of preconceived notions; stubborn.

Striking at the root of pedantry and opinionative assurance, would be no hindrance to the world's improvement. Glanville.

One would rather chuse a reader without art, than one ill-instructed with learning, but opinionative and without judgment.

Burnet, The. of the Earth.

OPINIONATIVELY. adv. [from opinionative.] Stubbornly.

OPINIONATIVENESS. n. s. [from opinionative.] Obstinate.

OPINIONIST.* n. s. [opinioniste, Fr. from opinion.] One fond of his own notions.

Every conceited opinionist sets up an infallible chair in his own brain. Glanville to Albius.

This was never called into question, all the conceited opinionist Justinian, among his other paradoxes, ventured to broach the contrary doctrine.

Dry. Bull. Works, i. 299.

OPIPAROUS. adj. [opiparus, Lat.] Sumptuous. Dict.

OPIPAROUSLY.* adv. [from opiparous.] Sumptuously; abundantly.

The compilers of them were not men meanly bred, or loosely seen in arts, but opiparously accomplished. Waterhouse, Apol. for Learn. (1655), p. 93.

OPITULAT'ION. n. s. [opitulation, Lat.] An aiding; a helping. Dict.

OPIUM.* n. s. [ῥῆμα, from ῥῆναι, Gr. juice.

Our old word was opie. "Narcoticks, and opie of Thebes fine." Chaucer.] A juice, partly of the resinous, partly of the gummy kind. It is brought to us in flat cakes or masses, very heavy and of a dense texture, not perfectly dry; its colour is a dark brownish yellow; its smell is of a dead faint kind; and its taste very bitter and very acid.

It is brought from Natolia, Egypt, and the East Indies, produced from the white garden poppy; with which the fields of Asia-Minor are in many places sown. When the heads grow to maturity, but are yet soft, green, and full of juice, incisions are made in them, and from every one of these a few drops flow of a milky juice, which soon hardens into a solid consistence. The finest opium proceeds from the first incisions. What we generally have is the mere crude juice, worked up with water, or honey sufficient to bring it into form. Externally applied it is emollient, relaxing, and discutient, and greatly promotes suppuration. A moderate dose of opium taken internally, is generally under a grain, yet custom will make people bear a dram, but in that case nature is vitiated. Its first effect is the making the patient cheerful; it removes melancholy, and dissipates the dread of danger; the Turks always take it when they are going to battle: it afterwards quiets the spirits, eases pain, and disposes to sleep. After the effect is over, the pain generally returns in a more violent manner; the spirits become lower than before, and the pulse languid. An immoderate dose of opium brings on drunkenness, cheerfulness, and loud laughter, at first, and, after many terrible symptoms, death itself. Those who have accustomed themselves to an immoderate use of opium, are apt to be faint, idle, and thoughtless; they lose their appetite, and grow below their time. Hill.

Sleep hath forsook and given me o'er To death's besmearing opium as my only cure.

Milton, Ec. 5.

The colour and taste of opium are, as well as its soporific or anodyne virtues, mere powers depending on its primary qualities, whereby it is fitted to produce different operations on different parts of our bodies. Locke.

OPIUM-TREE. n. s. [opulus, Lat.] A sort of tree; the witch-hazel. Ainsworth.

OPOBALSAMUM. n. s. [Latin.] Balm of Gilead.

OPODELODC.* n. s. [In medicine.] The name of a plaster; and also of a popular ointment.

OPOPONAX. n. s. [Latin.] A gum resin in small loose granules, and sometimes in large masses, of a strong disagreeable smell, and an acid and extremely bitter taste; brought to us from the East, and known to the Greeks; but we are entirely ignorant of the plant which produces this drug. Hill.

OPOSSUM.* n. s. An American animal.

Here is likewise that singular animal, called the opossum, which seems to be the wood-rat, mentioned by Charlevoix, in his history of Canada. Guthrie.

OPIPIDAN.* n. s. [oppidanus, Lat.] A townsman; an inhabitant of a town.

The oppidans, in the mean time, were not wanting to trouble us; and particularly the bailiffs. Wood, Acad. Univ. Gr. in 1538.

OPIPIDAN.* adj. Relating to a town.

Touching the temporal government of Rome, and oppidan affairs, there is a pretor, and some choice citizens, who sit on the capital. Howell, Let. i. 88.

TO OPIPIGNERATE. v. a. [opipignerare, Lat.] To pledge; to pawn. Not in use.

The duke of Guise Henry was the greatest usurer in France, for that he had turned all his estate into obligations; meaning that he had sold and opipignerated all his patrimony, to give large donations to other men. Bacon.

Ferdinando merchandised with France, for the restoring Roussillon and Perpignan, opipignerated to them. Bacon.

TO OPIPLATE.* v. a. [opiplo, Latin; opipiller, Fr.] To heap up obstruction.

Cockeram, and Sherwood.

OPIPLATION.* n. s. [opipilation, Fr. from opipilate.] Obstruction; matter heaped together.

Nothing is worse than to feed on many diaries, or to protract the time of meals longer than ordinary; from thence proceed our infirmities;—thence, saith Fernelius, come crudities, wind, opipulations. Durton, Anat. of Mel. p. 71.

The ingredients prescribed in their substance accuse the spirits, recite opipulations, and magnify the blood. Harvey.

OPIPLATIVE.* adj. [opipulative, Fr.] Obstructive. Sherwood.

OPIPLETUD. adj. [opipletus, Lat.] Filled; crowded.

TO OPIPONE.* v. a. [opipono, Lat.] To oppose. Not in use.

What can you not do Against lords spiritual or temporal, That shall oppose you? B. Jonson, Alchemist.

OPIPORENCY.* n. s. [opiporency, Lat.] The opening an academical disputation; the proposition of objections to a tenet: an exercise for a degree. See the second meaning of OPONENT.

OPIPORENT. adj. [opiporens, Lat.] Opposite; adverse.

Ever foundations of this earth were laid, It was opiporent to our search ordain'd, That joy, still sought, should never be attain'd. Prior.

OPIPORENT. n. s. [opiporens, Lat.] 1. Antagonist; adversary.

2. One who begins the dispute by raising objections to a tenet, correlative to the defendant or respondent.

Inasmuch as ye go about to destroy a thing which is in force, and to draw in that which hath not as yet been received, to impose on us that which we think not ourselves bound unto; that therefore ye are not to claim in any conference other than the plaintiff's or opiporent's part. Hobbes.

How becomingly does Philopoles exercise his office, and seasonably commit the opiporent with the respondent, like a long practiced moderator! Merr.

OPPORTUNE. adj. [opportunus, Fr. from oportuna, Lat.] Seasonable; convenient; fit; timely; well-timed; proper.

There was nothing to be added to this great king's felicity, being at the top of all worldly bliss, and the perpetual constancy of his prosper, our successes, but an opportune death to withdraw him from any future blot of fortune. Bacon.

Will I sit up in spite of fate, Nearer our ancient seat; perhaps in view Of those bright condones, whence with night's ring arms

And opportune excursion, we may chance Re-enter heav'n's. Milton, P. L.

Consider'd every creature, which of all Most opportune might create his wiles; and found The surper subtlest beast of all the field. Milton, P. L.

TO OPPORTUNE.* v. a. To suit. Not in use.

The precious opportunities us: some copies have nobis, but the most and best have nobis.

Dry. Clarke, Sermon. (1687), p. 485.

OPPORTUNELY. adv. [from opportune.] Seasonably; conveniently; with opportunity either of time or place.

He was resolved to chuse a war rather than to have Bretagne carried by France, being at issue so opportunely to annoy England either for coast or trade. Bacon, Hen. VII.

Against these there is a proper objection, that they offend uniformity; whereof I am therefore opportune induced to say somewhat.

Wotton, Archæologus.

The experiment does opportunistically supply the deficiency. Boyle.

OPPORTUNITY. n. s. [opportunité, Fr. opportunitas, Lat.] Fit time; fit place; time; convenience; suitability of circumstances to any end.

A wise man will make more opportunities than he finds. Men's behaviour should be like their apparel, not too strait, but free for exercise. Bacon.

Opportunity, like a sudden guest,
Hath swoll'd my colder thoughts into a tempest.—
Accummed opportunity!
That work't our thoughts into desires, desires
To resolutions; those being ripe and quicken'd, Thou giv'st them birth, and bring'st them forth
To action. Drakem.

Though their advice be good, their counsel wise,
Yet length still loses opportunities. Drakem.
I had an opportunity to see the clouds descend, and after it was past, to ascend again so high as to get over part of the mountain. Brown, Trav.
Neglect no opportunity of doing good, nor check thy desire of doing it, by a vain fear of what may happen. Atterbury.
All ports have taken an opportunity to give long descriptions of the night. Brown.

OPPOS'AL. n. s. [from oppose.] Opposition.

The castle gates opened, fearless of any further opposal. Sir T. Herbert, Trav. p. 81.

To OPPOSE. v. a. [opposer, French; oppo, oppo, Latin.]

1. To act against; to be adverse; to hinder; to resist.

There's no bottom, none
In my voluptuousness; and my desire
All continent impediments would o'berbear,
That did oppose my will. Shakespeare, Macbeth.

2. To put in opposition; to offer as an antagonist or rival.

If all men are not naturally equal, I am sure all slaves are; and then I may, without presumption, oppose my single opinion to his. Locke.

3. To place as an obstacle.

Since he stands obdurate,
And that no lawful means can carry me
Out of his envy's reach, I do oppose
My patience to his fury. Shakespeare, of Venice.
I through the seas pursued their evil'd race;
Engag'd the heavens, oppos'd the stormy main;
But billows roar'd and tempests rag'd in vain. Dryden.

4. To place in front; to place over against.

Her grace sat down
In a rich chair of state; opposing freely
The beauty of her person to the people. Shakespeare.

To OPPOSE. v. n.

1. To act adversely.

A servant, shill'd with remorse,
Oppos'd against the act, bending his sword
To his great master. Shakespeare, K. Lear.
He practised to dispatch such of the nobility as were like to oppose against his mischievous drift, and in such sort to encumber and weaken the rest, that they should be no impediments to him. Hayward.

2. To object in a disputation; to have the part of raising difficulties against a tenet supposed to be right.

OPPOS'LESS. adj. [from oppose.] Irresistible; not to be opposed.

I could bear it longer, and not fall
To quarrel with your great opposless wills. Shakespeare.

OPPOS'ER. n. s. [from oppose.] One that opposes; antagonist; enemy; rival.

Now the fair goddess Fortune
Fall deep in love with thee, and her great charms Mingled thy opposer's words; hold gentlemen!
Prosperity be thy page. Shakespeare, Coriol.
Brave with that have made essays worthy of immortality; yet by reason of curious and more popular opposers, have submitted to fate, and are almost lost in oblivion. Glanville.

I do not see how the ministers could have continued in their stations, if their opposers had agreed about the methods by which they should be raised. Swift.

A hardy modern chief,
A bold opposer of divine belief. Blackmore.

OPPOSITE. adj. [opposite, Fr. oppositus, Lat.]

1. Placed in front; facing each other.

To the other five,
Their planetary motions and aspects,
In settle, square, trine, and opposite,
Of needless efficacy. Milton, P. L.

2. Adverse; repugnant.

Nothing of a foreign nature, like the trifling novels, by which the reader is misled into another sort of pleasure, opposite to that which is designed in an epic poem. Dryden.

This is a prospect very uneasy to the lusts and passions, and opposite to the strongest desire of flesh and blood. Regis.

3. Contrary.

In this fallen state of man religion begins with repentance and conversion, the two opposite terms of which are God and sin. Tillotson.

Particles of speech have divers, and sometimes almost opposite significations. Locke.

OPPOSITE. n. s. Adversary; opponent; antagonist; enemy.

To the best and wisest, while they live, the world is continually a forward opposite, a curious observer of their defects and imperfections; their virtues it afterwards as much admires. Hobbes.
He is the most skillful, bloody, and fatal opposite that you could have found in Illyria. Shakespeare, Tw. Night.

The knight whom fate or happy chance
Shall grace his arms so far in equal fight,
From out the bars to force his opposite,
The prize of valour and of love shall gain. Dryden.

OPPOSITELY. adv. [from opposite.]

1. In such a situation as to face each other.

The lesser pair are joined edge to edge, but not oppositely with their points downward, but upward. Greene.

2. Adversely.

I oft have seen, when corn was ripe to mow,
And now in dry, and brittle straw did grow,
Winds from all quarters oppositely blow. Macy, Virg.

OPPOSITENESS. n. s. [from opposite.] The state of being opposite.

OPPOSITION. n. s. [opposition, Fr. opposition, Lat.]

1. Situation so as to front something opposed; standing over against.

2. Hostile resistance.

Virtue, which breaks through all opposition,
And all temptation can remove,
Most aches, and most is acceptable above. Milton, S. A.

He considers Lausus rescuing his father at the hazard of his own life, as an image of himself when he took Achilles on his shoulders, and bore him safe thro' the rage of the fire and the opposition of his enemies. Dryden, Defficiency.

3. Contrariety of affection.

They who never tried the experiment of a holy life, measure the laws of God not by their intrin-sical goodness, but by the reluctance and opposition which they find in their own hearts. Tillotson.

4. Contrariety of interest; contrariety of measures.

When the church is taken for the persons making profession of the christian faith, the catholicism is often added in opposition to heretics and schismatics. Perren.

5. Contrariety of meaning; diversity of meaning.

The parts of every true opposition do always both concern the same subject, and have reference to the same thing, such otherwise they are but in show opposites, not in truth. Hobbes.

The use of language and custom of speech, in all authors I have met with, has gone upon this rule, or maxim, that exclusive terms are always to be understood in opposition only to what they are opposed to, and not in opposition to what they are not opposed to. Waterland.

6. Inconsistency; contradiction.

Reason can never permit the mind to reject a greater evidence, to embrace what is less evident, nor allow it to entertain probability in opposition to knowledge and certainty. Locke.

7. The collective body of members of both houses of parliament who oppose the ministry, or the measures of government.

He has never omitted a fair occasion, with whatever detriment to his interest as a member of opposition, to assert the very same doctrines which appear in that book. Burke.

OPPOSITIVE. adj. [from opposite.] Capable of being put in opposition.

Here not without some oppositive comparison; not Moses, nor Elias, but This; Moses and Elias were servants; This, a son. Bp. Hall, Contempt, B. 4.

To OPPRESS. v. a. [oppressus, Lat.]

1. To crush by hardship or unreasonable severity.

Israel and Judah were oppressed together, and all that took them captives held them there, they refused to let them go. Jer. l. 33.
Also a mortal most oppress of those.
Whom fate has loaded with a weight of woes. Pope.

2. To overpower; to subdue.

We're not ourselves,
When nature, being oppress'd, commands the mind
To suffer with the body. Shakespeare, K. Lear.
In blasing blood of noon,
The sun oppress'd, is plung'd in thickest fog. Thomson.

OPPRE'SSION. n. s. [oppression, Fr. from oppress.]

1. The act of oppressing; cruelty; severity.

If thou seest the oppressions of the poor, marvell not at the matter, for he that is higher than the highest regardeth. Eccles. v. 6.

2. The state of being oppressed; misery.

Famine is in thy cheeks;
Need and oppression stare within thine eyes,
Contempt and beggary hang upon thy back. Shakespeare.
Cease, himself has work, and our oppression
Exceeds what we expected. Shakespeare, Ant. & Cleop.

3. Hardship; calamity.

We are all subject to the same accidents; and when we see any under particular oppression, we should look upon it as the common lot of human nature. Addison.

4. Dulness of spirits; lassitude of body.

Drowsiness, oppression, heaviness, and lassitude, are signs of a too plentiful meal. Arcturion on Aliments.

O P P R E S S I V E. adj. [from oppress.]

1. Cruel; inhuman; unjustly exactious or severe.

2. Heavy; overwhelming.

Alice, result thy friendly arms,
And help me to support that feeble frame,
That nodding totters with oppressive woe,
And sinks beneath its load. Rome, Jane Shore.
To use the soul of one oppressive weight,
This quilts an empire, that embroils a state. Pope.

O P P R E S S I V E L Y. * adv. [from oppressive.]

In an oppressive or severe manner.
Her taxes are more injudiciously and more oppressively imposed, more voraciously collected. Burke on the State of the Nation, (1769.)

O P P R E S S O R. n. s. [oppressor, Fr. from oppress.]

One who harasses others with unreasonable or unjust severity.
I from oppressors did the poor defend,
The fatherless, and such as had no friend. Sandys.
The cries of orphans, and th' oppressor's rage,
Had reach'd the stars. Dryden.
Power when employed to relieve the oppressed,
And to punish the oppressor, becomes a great blessing. Swift.

O P P R O B R I O U S. adj. [from opprobrium, Lat.]

1. Reproachful; disgraceful; causing infamy; scurrilous.

Himself pronounceth them blessed, that should for his name sake be subject to all kinds of ignominy and opprobrious malediction. Hooker.
Twy see themselves unjustly aspeared, and vindicate themselves in terms no less opprobrious than those by which they are attacked. Addams, Freshwater.

2. Blasted with infamy.

I will not here define
His unstaun'd verse with his opprobrious name. Danish.
Solomon he'd be fraud to build
His temple right against the temple of God,
On the opprobrious hill. Milton, P. L.

O P P R O B R I O U S L Y. adv. [from opprobrious.]

Reproachfully; scurrilously.

«Think you, this little grating York
Was not increased by his subtle mother,
To taunt and scorn you thus opprobriously?» Shakespeare, Rich. III.

O P P R O B R I O U S N E S S. n. s. [from opprobrious.]

Reproachfulness; scurrility.

O P P R O B R I U M. * n. s. [Latin.]

We had formerly the harsh English word opprobrie, which is in Sherwood's dictionary. Opprobrium has long been in use, though Dr. Johnson has overpassed it; and continues to be. Dr. Johnson himself too has used the word opprobriary.
Disgrace; infamy.

He there saith, among other opprobries put upon Luther, that he could not have committed a sin of higher nature.

Hayne's Life of Luther, (1644), p. 62.
Whoever presumes to give check to our insolence, is sure to be made the mark of our malice, and to be persecuted with all the reproach and opprobrium that the most invidious rancour can invent.

Sat. Scm. before the Lord Mary, (1683), Works, vol. 6, li. 37.

Patch was in old language a term of opprobry.
Dr. Johnson, Note on Shakspeare, M. Dream.

To O P P U G N. † v. a. [oppugnere, old Fr. oppugnere, Lat.] To oppose; to attack; to resist.

Not so subtle to invent false matters to oppugn the truth.

Martin, Murr. of Priests, (1554), sign. B. i. b.
For the ecclesiastical laws of this land we are led by a great reason to observe, and ye be by no necessity bound to oppugn them. Hooker.

This is to oppugn nature, and to make a strong body weak. Burton, Anat. of Mtd. p. 257.
They said the manner of their impeachment they could not but conceive did oppugn the rights of parliament. Clarendon.

If nothing can oppugn love,
And virtue envious ways can prove,
What cannot be confide to do
That brings both love and virtue too? Hudibras.
The ingredients reclude oppositions, muffle the blood, and oppugn purification. Harvey.

O P P U G N A N C Y. n. s. [from oppugn.]

Opposition.
Take that degree away, untune that string,
And hark what discord follows, each thing meets
In meet oppugnancy. Shakespeare, Trill and Cress.
O P P U G N A N T. * adj. [oppugnans, Latin.]
Opposing; resisting; repugnant.

It is directly oppugnant to the laws established.

This do belong — optatio, obtestatio, interrogatio.
Procham, Gard. of Eloquence, (1577), sign. P. iii.

O P T A T I V E. * adj. [optativus, Lat.]

1. Expressive of desire.
This optative infinity in the soul of man. W. Mountague, Dev. Ess. P. i. (1648), p. 196.

2. Belonging to that mood of a verb which expresses desire.
The verb undergoes in Greek a different formation to signify wishing, which is called the optative mood. Clarke.

O P T I C A L. adj. [opticus.]

Relating to the science of optics.

It seems not agreeable to what anatomists, and optical writers deliver, touching the relation of the two eyes to each other. Boyle.

O P T I C I A N. † n. s. [from optick.]

1. One skilled in optics.

How it is that, by means of our sight, we learn to judge of such distances, opticians have endeavoured to explain in several different ways. A. Smith on the External Sense.

2. One who makes or sells optical glasses.
Opticians have daily experience of the truth of these observations. Adam on Vision.

O P T I C A L. adj. [opticus, Gr.; optique, Fr.]

1. Visual; producing vision; subservient to vision.

May not the harmony and discord of colours arise from the proportion of the vibrations propagated through the fibres of the optick nerves into the brain, as the harmony and discord of sounds arise from the proportions of the vibrations of the air? Newton, Opt.

2. Relating to the science of vision.

Where our master handleth the contractions of pillars, we have an optick rule, that the higher they are, the less should be always their diminution aloft, because the eye itself doth contract all objects, according to the distance.

O P T I C K. n. s. An instrument of sight; an organ of sight.

Can any thing escape the perspicacity of the eyes which were before light, and in whose opticks there is no opacity? Brown.

Our corporeal eyes we find Dazzle the opticks of our mind. Desham.
You may neglect, or quench, or hate the flame,
Whose smoke too long obscur'd your rising name,
And quickly cold indifference will ensue,
When you love's joys through honour's optick view. Prior.

Why has not man a microscopical eye?
For this plain reason, man is not a fly.
Say what we use, were finer optics given,
T' inspect a mite, not comprehend the heaven? Pope.

O P T I C K S. n. s. pl. [ὀπτικαί.]

The science of the nature and laws of vision.

No spherical body of what brightness soever illuminates the whole sphere of another, although it illuminate something more than half of a least, according to the doctrine of optics.

Those who desire satisfaction must go to the admirable treatise of optics by Sir Isaac Newton. Brown, Vind. Err.

O P T I M A C Y. † n. s. [optimatus, Latin.]

Nobility; body of nobles; men of the highest rank.

The government of every city in time becomes corrupt; principality changeth into tyranny; the optimacy is made the government of the people; and the popular estate turns to licentious disorder. Rutger, Arts of Emp. ch. 36.

Sometimes an optimacy of a few, all prime, coequal in their power; and sometimes a democracy, or popular state, a whole Egypt full of locusts in one breast. Homestead, Works, li. 529.

In this high court of parliament there is a rare combination of power, a wholesome mixture between monarchy, optimacy, and democracy. Hovell.

O P T I M I S M. * n. s. [from optimus, Lat.]

The doctrine that every thing in nature is ordered for the best.

Voltaire has, in many parts of his works, besides his Candide and his Philosophical Dictionary, exerted the utmost efforts of his wit and argument to depreciate and destroy the doctrine of optimism, and the notion that «The eternal art endures good from ill.» Dr. Warton, Ess. on Pope.

O P T I M I S T. n. s. [from optimus, Lat.]

The state of being best.

O P T I O N. † n. s. [optio, Lat.]

1. Choice; election; power of choosing.

Transplantation must proceed from the option of the people, else it sounds like an exile; so the colonies must be raised by the leave of the king, and not by his command. Bacon.

He deserves to punish the contumacy finally, by assigning them their own options. Hammond.

Which of these two rewards we will receive, he hath left to our option. Smalridge.

2. Wish. Cockeram.

I shall conclude this epistle with a pathetic option, O that mercy were alive.

The Legend of St. Christ, (about 1750), p. 23.

3. A choice of preferment belonging to the patronage of suffragans, made by the archbishops of Canterbury and York, on the promotion of the person to a bishopric.

The archbishop of Canterbury hath a right, upon the promotion of every bishop in his grace's province, (and so has the archbishop of York, except with regard to the see of Durham,) to choose any one ecclesiastical preferment, prebend, or benefice, in the gift of such bishop, which is called the archbishop's option; which is even at the disposal of the executor of the archbishop, if the bishop that is promoted dies not die before the option be come vacant. Nelson, Life of Bp. Bull., p. 357.

OPTIONAL. adj. [from option.] Leaving somewhat to choice.

Original writs are either optional or peremptory. Blackstone.

OPULENCE. n. s. [opulence, Fr.; opulentia, Lat.] Rich; wealth; riches; affluence.

It must be a discovery of the infinite futilities that follow youth and opulence. Shakespeare, Tim. After eight years spent in outward splendour, and inward murmur that was not greater; after vast sums of money and great wealth gotten, he died unsatisfied. Clarendon.

He had been a person not only of great opulence, but authority. Atterbury.

There in full opulence a banker dwelt, Who all the joys and pangs of riches felt; His side-board glitter'd with imagin'd plate, And his proud fancy held a vast estate. Swift.

OPULENT. adj. [opulent, Fr.; opulentus, Lat.] Rich; wealthy; affluent.

He made him his ally, and provoked a mighty and opulent king by an offensive war in his quarrel. Bacon.

To begin with the supposed policy of gratifying only the rich and opulent. Does our wise man think, that the grandee whose he courts does not see through all the little plots of his courtship? South.

OPULENTLY. adv. [from opulent.] Richly; with splendour.

OR. conj. [or, Sax.]

1. A disjunctive particle, marking distribution, and sometimes opposition. Inquire what the ancients thought concerning this world, whether it was to perish or no; whether to be destroyed or to stand eternally? Burnet.

He my muse's bonnage should receive, If I could write, or Hylas could forgive. Garth.

By intense study, or application to business that requires little action, the digestion of foods will soon proceed more slowly, and with more uneasiness. Blackmore.

Every thing that can be divided by the mind into two or more ideas, is called complex. Watts, Logic.

2. It corresponds to either; he must either fall or fly.

At Venice you may go to any house either by land or water. Adams.

3. It sometimes, but rather inelegantly, stands for either.

For thy vast boundries are no numberless, That them or to conceal, or else to tell, Is equally impossible. Cowley.

4. Sometimes for whether, or whether it be.

Whatever draws me, Or sympathy, or some consensual force. Milton, P. L.

5. Or is sometimes redundant, but is then more properly omitted.

How great sweeter the sins of any unreformed person are, Christ died for him because he died for all; only he must reform and forsake his sins, or else he shall never receive benefit of his death. Hammond.

6. [Op, or spe, Sax.] Before. Or and ere were formerly indiscriminately used.

Then or ever, or ere, combined; a form not yet disused; though Dr. Johnson has pronounced it obsolete. The spirited lines from a modern poem, now cited, exhibit the application of it. Or we go to the declaration of this psalm, it shall be convenient to shew who did write this psalm. Bp. Fisher.

The dead man's knell Is there scarce ask'd for whom, and good men's lives

Expire before the flowers in their caps, Dying or ere they sicken. Shakespeare, Macbeth. Learn before thou speak, and use physic or ere thou be sick. Eccles. xviii. 19.

The shepherds on the lawn, Or ere the point of dawn, Sat simply chatting in a rustic row. Milton, Ode Nativ.

Awake, for shame! or ere thy nobler sense Sink in the abjectious pool of indolence! Must wilt be found alone on falsehood's side, Unknown to truth, to virtue unallied? Arise, nor scorn thy country's just alarms; Wield to her cause thy long-neglected arms. Poetry of the Anti-Jacobin.

OR. n. s. [French.] Gold. A term of heraldry.

The show'ry arch With listed colours gay, or, azure, gules, Delights and puzzles the beholders' eyes. Philips.

ORACH. n. s. [atriplex.] There are thirteen species; garden orach was cultivated as a culinary herb, and used as spinach, though it is not generally liked by the English, but still esteemed by the French. Miller.

ORACLE. n. s. [oracle, Fr.; oraculum, Lat.]

1. Something delivered by supernatural wisdom.

The main principle whereupon our belief of all things therein contained is founded, is, that the Scriptures are the oracles of God himself. Hucker.

2. The place where, or person of whom the determinations of heaven are enquired.

Why, by the verities on thee made good, May they not be my oracles as well, And set me up in hope? Shakespeare, Macbeth. God hath now sent his living oracle Into the world to teach his final will, And sends his spirit of truth henceforth to dwell In pious hearts, an inward oracle, To all truth requisite for men to know. Milton, P. R.

3. Any person or place where certain decisions are obtained.

These mighty nations shall require thy doom, The world's great oracle in times to come. Pope.

4. One famed for wisdom; one whose determinations are not to be disputed.

To ORACLE. v. n. [from the noun.] To utter oracles. A word not received. Dr. Johnson observes; citing only the passage from Milton. But Milton did not introduce this word into the language.

Hence so many corruptions of divine text, because men endeavour to make it speak their own sense; use it as their pleader, not counsellor: if it will speak for us, none so ready to be for us; but if it oracles contrary to our interest or humour, we will create an ambiguity, a double meaning where there is none; and make it speak our meaning, or conclude it defective. Whitlock, Memoirs of the Eng. (1654), p. 251.

No more shalt thou by oracles abuse The Gentiles. Milton, P. R.

ORACULAR. adj. [from oracle.]

ORACULOUS. adj. [from oracle.]

1. Uttering oracles; resembling oracles.

Corycian nymphs and hill-gods he adores, And Themselves then, oraculous, implores. Swinsford, Imit.

Thy counsel would be as the oracle of Urian and Thummin, those oraculous gems On Aaron's breast, or tongue of woe's old Infalible. Milton, P. R.

Here Charles contrives the ordering of his states, Here he resolves his neighbouring princes' fates; What nation shall have peace, where war be made, Determin'd it is in this oraculous shade. Waller.

They have something venerable in oraculous, in that undomg'd gravity and shortness in the expression. Pope.

The oraculous seer frequents the Pharian coast, Proteus a name tremendous o'er the main. Pope.

2. Positive; authoritative; magistral; dogmatical.

Though their general acknowledgements of the weakness of human understanding looks like cold and sceptical discouragements; yet the particular expressions of their sentiments are as oraculous as if they were omniscient. Gleason, Sermons.

3. Obscure; ambiguous; like the answers of ancient oracles.

As for equivocations, or oraculous sentences, they cannot build out long. Bacon, Ess. 6.

He spoke oraculous and is, He'd neither grant the question, nor deny. King.

ORACULARLY. adv. [from oraculous.]

ORACULOUSLY. adv. [from oraculous.]

1. In manner of an oracle.

The testimonies of antiquity, and such as pass oraculosity amongst us, were not always so exact as to examine the doctrine they delivered. Brown, Vulg. Err.

Hence rise the branching beard and vocal oak, Where Jove of old oraculosity spoke. Dryden.

2. Authoritatively; positively.

An awful judge delivering oraculosity the law. Burke, Speech on the Powers of Juris in Lords.

ORACULOUSNESS. n. s. [from oracular.]

The state of being oracular.

ORATION. n. s. [oratio, Fr.; oratio, Lat.] Prayer; verbal supplication; or oral worship; more frequently written orison, and accented on the first syllable by our oldest and best poets. Dyer has placed the accent on the second syllable of oraison; and so has Cotton on that of orison, for the sake of his rhyme. See ORISON. Temple uses the French form of the word before us.

They were commonly called the judgements of God, and performed with solemn orations, and other ceremonies. Temple, Intr. Hist. of Eng. (1695), p. 242.

Here, at dead of night,
The pilgrim oft, mid his oration, hears
Aghast the voice of time, strapping terrors,
Tumbling all precipitate down dabb'd.

Dyer, Reins of Rome.

O'RALY. adj. [oral, Fr.; os, oris, Lat.]
Delivered by mouth; not written.

Oral discourse, where the transient faults dying with the sound that gives them life, and so not subject to a strict review, more easily escapes observation.

Lodge on Education.

St. John was appealed to as the living oracle of the church; and as his oral testimony lasted the first century, many have observed, that by a particular providence several of our Saviour's disciples, and of the early converts, lived to a very great age, that they might personally convey the truth of the gospel to those times which were very remote.

Addison.

O'RALLY. adv. [from oral.]
1. By mouth; without writing.

Oral tradition were incompetent without written monuments to derive to us the original laws of a kingdom, as they are complex, not orally traducible to so great a distance of ages.

Hall, Common Law.

2. In the mouth.

The priest did sacrifice, and orally devour it whole.

Bp. Hall, Epist. D. I. E. 5.

That which is externally delivered in the sacrament, and orally received by the communicant.

Abp. Usher, Answer to the Jesuit Malone, p. 92.

O' RANGEY. n. s. [Orange, Fr. The aurum malum, or golden apple of the ancients; low Lat. aurantium, an orange. The leaves have two lobes, or appendages at their base like ears, and cut in form of a heart; the fruit is round and depressed, and of a yellow colour when ripe, in which it differs from the citron and lemon. The species are eight.

Miller.

The notary came aboard, holding in his hand a fruit like an orange, but of colour between orange-tawny and scarlet, which cost a most excellent colour, and is used for a preservative against infection.

Bacon, New Atlantis.

The ideas of orange colour and azure, produced in the mind by the same infusion of liguor niphriticum, are no less distinct ideas than that of the same colours taken from two different bodies.

Locke.

Fine oranges, sauce for your veal,
Are charming when squeezed in a pot of brown ale.

Swift.

The punick granate op'd its rose-like flowers;
The orange breath'd its aromatic powers.

O' RANGERY. n. s. [orangerie, Fr.] Plantation of oranges.

A kitchen garden is a more pleasant sight than the finest orangerie, or artificial green house.

Spectator.

O' RANGEMUSK. n. s. A species of pear.

O' RANGEWIFE. n. s. [orange and wife.] A woman who sells oranges.

You wear out a good wholesome forenoon in bearing a case between an orangerie and a fustet seller.

Swift.

O' RANGETAWNY. n. s. [Orange and tawny.] A colour so called.

Holding in his hand a fruit of that country, like an orange, but of colour between orange-tawny and scarlet.

Bacon, New Atlantis.

Barons, or knights of Nolesdale, are commonly distinguished from others by a ribbon of orange-tawny.

Hygyn.

O' RANGETAWNY. adj. Of a colour resembling an orange; nearly red.

Ussurers should have orange-tawny bonnets, because they do Judaize.

Bacon, Ess. 41.

I will discharge it in your straw-coloured beard, your orange-tawny beard.

Shakespeare, Mid. N. Dream.

Great is my patience to forbear thee thus, — Uncivil, orange-tawny-coated clerk!

B. Jonson, Tale of a Tub.

ORATION. n. s. [oration, Fr. oratio, Lat.] A speech made according to the laws of rhetoric; a harangue; a declamation.

There shall I try,

In my oration, how the people take
The cruel issue of these bloody riots.

Shakespeare, Jul. Cæs.

This gives life and spirit to every thing that is spoken, awakens the duller spirits, and adds a singular grace and excellency both to the person and his oration.

Watson.

TO ORATION. v. n. [from the noun.] To make a speech; to harangue. Not in use.

They gave answers with great sufficiency touching all difficulties concerning their own law, and had marvellous promptitude both for oratoring and giving judgement.

Donne, Hist. of the Sept. p. 80.

O' RATOR. n. s. [orateur, French; orator, Lat.]

1. A public speaker; a man of eloquence.

Poor queue and son! your labour is but lost;
For Warwick is a subtle orator.

Shakespeare, Hen. VI.

As when of old some orator renown'd,
In Athens or free Rome, where eloquence

Flourish'd, since mute! to some great cause address'd,

Stood in himself collected; while each part,
Motion, each act, won audience.

Milton, P. L.

It would be altogether vain and improper in matters belonging to an orator to pretend to strict demonstration.

The constant design of both these orators in all their speeches, was to drive some one particular point.

Swift.

I have listened to an orator of this species, without being able to understand one single sentence.

Swift.

Both orators so much renown'd,
In their own depths of eloquence were drown'd.

Dryden.

2. A petitioner. This sense is used in addresses to chancery.

ORATORICAL. adj. [from orator.] Rhetorical; befitting an orator.

He that hath written the tales of Nereus, cardinal Barrocin's oratorical patron.

Favour, Antiq. Tr. over Novels, (1619.) p. 339.

Running out of words, and the weakness of those men's arguments.

Clarke, Lett. to Dr. Stilling, p. 50.

Where he speaks in an oratorical, affecting, or persuasive way, let this be explained by other places where he treats of the same theme in a doctrinal way.

Watson.

ORATORIAL. adj. [oratorius, Latin.]
ORATORIOUS. adj. Rhetorical; befitting an orator.

What error is so rotten and putrid, which some oratorical varnish hath not sought to colour over with shews of truth and piety?

Bp. Taylor, Artif. Handman, p. 29.

The oratorical part of these gentlemen seldom vouchsafe to mention fewer than fifteen hundred or two thousand people, to be maintained in this hospital, without troubling their heads about the fund.

Swift, on Maintaining the Poor.

14

He [Dr. Barstow] endeavoured, at the command of the king, to introduce a more graceful and oratorical manner of delivering the public sermons at St. Mary's.

Watson, Life of Barstow, p. 88.

ORATORIALLY. adv. [from the adj.]
ORATORIOUSLY. adv. In a rhetorical manner.

Not do they oppose things of this nature argumentatively, so much as oratoriously.

Bp. Taylor, Artif. Handman, p. 115.

ORATORIO. n. s. [Italian.] A kind of sacred drama, the subject of it being generally taken from the Scriptures, set to music.

Sorry I am to accuse the greatest English composer Purcell, and the best adopted one Handel, of being the cause of this innovation, (the mixture of the violin with the organ,) the former by adding violin accompaniments to some of his anthems and services; the latter by erecting an organ on the play-house stage, with a view undoubtedly to draw more notice to his dignified form as by its solemn tones, that semi-dramatic species of composition the oratorio from a genuine opera.

Mason on Church Mus. p. 73.

O' RATORY. n. s. [oratoria, Lat.]
1. Eloquence; rhetorical expression.

Each pasture stored with sheep feeding with sober security, while the pretty lambs with bleating oratory craved the dam's comfort.

Sullivan.

When a world of men
Could not prevail with all their oratory,
Yet hath a woman's kindness over-rul'd.

When my oratory grew too red,
I bid them that did love the country's good,
Cry, God save Richard.

Shakespeare, Rich. III.

Sighs now breath'd!

Unutterable, which the spirit of prayer
Inspir'd, and wing'd for heav'n with speedier flight
Than loudly to oratory.

By this kind of oratory, and profusion to declaim their own locutions and wishes, purely for peace and unity, they prevailed over those who were still surprised.

Clarendon.

Hammond's subjects were such as had greatest influence on practice, which he treat with most affectionate tenderness, making tears part of his oratory.

Fell.

The former, who had to deal with a people of much more politeness, learning, and wit, had the greatest weight of his oratory upon the strength of his arguments.

Swift.

Come harmless characters, that no one hit,
Come Henry's oratory, Osborn's wit.

Pope.

2. Exercise of eloquence.

The Romanist held oratory upon the feet of the Anabaptist, among which there were six armed with rostra, with which the consul Menenius adorned the public place of oratory.

Arminius.

3. [Oratoire, French.] At first it signified a closet; then, a private place, allotted for prayer alone; and also, a place for public worship.

They should first remove all company from them; and in a secret oratory, or privacy chamber, themselves assemble all the powers of their wits to remember these seven articles.

Sir T. Elyot, Gov. fol. 85.

They began to erect to themselves oratories, not in any sumptuous or stately mansion, which neither was possible by reason of the poor estate of the church, and had been perilous in regard of the world's eye towards them.

Hobbes.

Do not omit thy prayers for want of a good oratory or place to pray in; nor thy duty for want of temporal encouragements.

Bp. Taylor, Guide to Devotion.

Christians had oratories, or houses of Christian worship.

Mede on Churches, p. 36.

Within these oratories might you see
Rich carvings, portraits, and imagery.

Dryden, Pol. and Arcid.

O'RATRIS.* n. s. [oratrix, Latin, from

O'RATRIX.* orator. Cockeran gives the English oratrix.] A female orator.

I see love's oratrix pleads tediously to thee.

Waller, Milton's England, (1602; ch. 9.)

I fight not with my tongue; this is my oratrix.

Trag. of Solomon and Perseus, (1599.)

ORB. n. s. [orbe, Fr. orbis, Latin.]

1. Sphere; orbicular body.

A mighty collection of water inclosed in the bowels of the earth, constitutes an huge orb in the interior or central parts; upon the surface of which orb of water the terrestrial strata are expanded. Woodward, Nat. Hist.

2. Circular body.

They with a storm of darts to distance drive
The Trojan sphere; who held at bay far,
On his Vulcanian orb sustain'd the war. Dryden.

3. Mundane sphere; celestial body; light of heaven.

In the floor of heaven

There's not the smallest orb which thou beholdest,
But in his motion like an angel wings,
Shall quivering to the young-eyed cherubims.

Shakspeare.

4. Wheel; any rolling body.

The orbs

Of his fierce chariot roll'd as with the sound
Of torrent floods. Milton, P. L.

5. Circle; line drawn round.

Does the son learn action from the father? Yet all his activity is but in the epicycle of a family;

whereas a subject's motion is in a larger orb.

Holby.

6. Circle described by any of the mundane spheres.

Astronomers, to solve the phenomenon, framed to their conceit eccentrics and epicycles, and a wonderful engine of orbs, though no such things were. Bacon.

With smiling aspect you serenely move
In your fifth orb, and rule the realm of love.

Dryden.

7. Period; revolution of time.

Self-born, self-raised

By our own quickening power, when fatal course
Had circled his full orb, the birth mature
Of this our nation heaven. Milton, P. L.

8. Sphere of action.

Will you again unkint

This churlish knot of all-aborred war,
And move in that obedient orb again,
Where you did give a fair and natural light?

Shakspeare.

9. It is applied by Milton to the eye, as being luminous and spherical.

A drop serene hath quench'd thy orb,

Or dim suffusion veild'd. Milton, P. L.

To Orm.* v. a. [from the noun.] To round; to form into a circle.

Truth and Justice then

Will down return to men,
Or'd in a rainbow, and like glories wearing.

Milton, Ed. Nat.

Our happiness may orb itself into a thousand vagaries of glory and delight, and with a kind of eccentricity equate (be it as it were) an invariable planet of joy and felicity.

A golden axle did the work uphold, Gold was the beam, the wheels were orb'd of gold. Addison.

ORBAT'ION.* n. s. [orbatio, Latin.] Privation of parents or children; any privation; poverty. Cockeran.

ORBED.* adj. [from orb.] Round; circular; orbicular. See TO ROUND.

VOL. II.

All those sayings will I overwear,
And all those swearings keep as true in soul,
As doth that orbed continent the fire,
That severs day from night.

Shakspeare, Tw. Night.

Let each

Fit well his helm, gripe fast his orb'd shield.

Milton, P. L.

O'RBECK.* adj. [orbiculus, Lat.] Circular;
spherical.

How the body of this orbic frame

From tender infancy so big became.

Bacon, Pan or Nature.

ORBI'CLAR.* adj. [orbiculaire, Fr. orbiculatus, Lat.]

1. Spherical.

He shall mortally by the three divide

Of all things, parted by the empyreal bounds,
His quadrature from thy orbicular world.

Milton, P. L.

2. Circular; approaching to circularity.

The form of their bottom is not the same; for whereas before it was of so orbicular make, they now look as if they were pressed.

Addison, Guardian.

By a circle I understand not here a perfect geometrical circle, but an orbicular figure, whose length is equal to its breadth, and which as to sense may seem circular. Newton.

ORBI'CLARLY.* adv. [from orbicular.]
Spherically; circularly.

ORBI'CLARNESS.* n. s. [from orbicular.]

The state of being orbicular.

ORBI'CLATED.* adj. [orbiculatus, Latin.]
Moulded into an orb.

ORBI'CLATION.* n. s. [orbiculatus, Lat.]
State of being moulded into an orb or circle.

It might have been more significantly called orbiculation, seeing this circumfession makes not only a circle, but fills a sphere.

More, Song of the Soul, Int. Gen. p. 424.

O'RBIT.* n. s. [orbite, Fr. orbita, Lat.]

1. The line described by the revolution of a planet.

Suppose more suns in proper orbits roll'd,
Dimin'd the snows, and chas'd the polar cold.

Blackmore.

Suppose the earth placed nearer to the sun, and revolve for instance in the orbit of Mercury;
there the whole ocean would even boil with extremity of heat, and be all exhaled into vapours;
all plants and animals would be scorched. Reaumur.

2. A small orb. Not proper.

Attend, and you discern it in the fair

Conduct and finger, or reclaim a hair;

Or roll the lucid orbit of an eye;

Or in full joy elaborate a sigh. Young.

O'RBITUDE.* n. s. [orbitudo, and orbitas, O'RBITY.* Latin. The former of these words occurs in Cockeran's vocabulary; the latter is noticed by Dr.

Johnson, with the name of Bacon following an imperfect definition, but without any example.] Loss or want of parents or children; loss of husband or wife; any privation.

Old age and orbity were those two things that emboldened him. By. Hall, Balm of Gilead.

She's in orbity.

At once receiver, and the legacy.

Considering the frequent mortality in friends and relations, in such a term of time, he may pass away diverse years in sorrow and black habit, and leave none to mourn for himself; orbity may be his inheritance. Brown, Chr. Mor. iii. 22.

O'RY.* adj. [from orb.] Resembling an
orb. Not used.

It smote Atreides orbic target; but rumne not withed the brasse. Chapman.

When, now afraid
The world was with the orb, and orbic hours Had gone the round again, through herbs and flowers. Chapman.

ORC.* n. s. [orca, Lat. scya.] A sea-fish;
a species of whale.

Orca, that for their lord the ocean wooes.

Drayton, Polyd. B. 2.

Proteus' herds, and Neptune's orca.

B. Jonson, Masques.

An island salt and bare,

The haunt of seals and orcs, and sea-weeds clang.

Milton, P. L.

O'RGHAL.* n. s. A stone from which a blue colour is made. Ainsworth.

O'RGHASET.* n. s. An herb. Ainsworth.

O'RGHARD.* n. s. [either hortyard or wortyard, says Skinner; ortgheib, Sax.
Junius, and Dr. Johnson. — Hortyard, or ortyard, seems to be the true word;

ortgard, Goth. jurtgard, Icel. It signified formerly a garden in general;

urt, Goth. an herb, and gard, a hedge;
hortus, Lat. Milton writes the word,
orchard; probably from the Greek ὄρχαρος.
See HORTYARD.] A garden of fruit-trees.

Planting of orchards is very profitable, as well as pleasurable. Bacon, Advice to Filibers.

They overcome their riches, not by making

Baths, orchards, fish-pools. B. Jonson.

His paragon-house from an inconvenient ruin he had rendered a fair and pleasant dwelling, with the conveniences of gardens and orchards.

Fell.

Her private orchards, wall'd on ev'ry side

To lawless sylvan all access deny'd. Pope.

O'RCHARDING.* n. s. Cultivation of orchards.

All land is not fit for orcharding.

Trunch grounds for orcharding.

H. Ed. Hort. Oct.

O'RCHARDIST.* n. s. One who cultivates orchards.

However expert the orchardist may be, much will depend on soil. Town. Adelp. Soc. xiii. 24.

O'RCHESTRE.* n. s. [French; ὀρχήστρα, ORCHESTRA.* from ὀρχήσθαι, to dance; the Grecian orchestra being the places in which dances were publicly performed; and orchestra (which form of the word is not noticed by Dr. Johnson) was at first used by us in this sense. Sir John Davies published, in 1595, a poem on the antiquity and excellency of dancing, entitled Orchestra.
A place for public exhibition; the place where the musicians are set at a public show; the band of musicians.

Praise bid orchestra, and the skipping art.

Marston, Sat. iii. 11.

Devotion, when lukewarm, is undercut;
But when it glows, its heat is struck to heaven;
To human hearts her golden harp are strong;
High heaven's orchestra chants Amen to man.

Young, Night Th. 4.

He very precipitately made his retreat out of one of the doors under the orchestra.

Shelton, l. 143.

The different degrees of precision, with which the music of the orchestra can accommodate itself to each of these diversities, most depend upon the taste, the sensibility, the fancy, and imagination of the composer. Id. Smith on the Inst. Art. P. II.

6 A

 When the orchestra interrupts, as it frequently does, either the recitative or the air, it is in order either to enforce the effect of what had gone before, or to put the mind in the mood which fits it for hearing what is to come after.

Id. Smith on the Inst. Art. P. II.
O'ACHIS. * n. s. A plant, of which several sorts grow wild in England. The flowers of some are thought to resemble flies.

I have saw a great many of the small red and yellow tulip, — and many beautiful kinds of the orchis, some representing bees and flies so naturally as to deceive at first sight.

Switzerland, Trav. through Spain, L. 29.
ORN. † n. s. An edge or sharpness; as in ordelm, ordbright, &c. and in the Icelandic tongue, ord signifies a spear or dart.

Gilson.
Ord. in old English, signified beginning; whence probably the proverbial phrase odds [ords] and ends, for scraps or remnants, and perhaps ords for waste provision. Dr. Johnson. — Ord is certainly our old word for beginning; and Chaucer uses ord and end. See Lye also in the Saxon Op. Opb. But ords have no connection whatever with ord. See ORDS.

To ORDAIN. v. a. Ordino, Lat. ordonare, Fr.

1. To appoint; to decree.
 Know the cause why musick was ordain'd;
 Was it not to refresh the mind of man
 After his toils, or his usual pain? Shakspeare.
 Jacobus ordinavit a font. 1 Kings, xii. 32.
 As many as were ordained to eternal life believed. Acts, xiii. 48.

He commanded us to testify that it was which was ordained of God to be the Judge of quick and dead. Acts, x. 42.

To sooth oppress'd and dumb with grief,
 The gods ordain this kind relief,
 That musick should in sounds convey What dying lovers dare not say. Walker.

The fatal test.
 The scene of death, and place ordain'd for punishment. Dryden.

My reason tends to what thy eyes ordain;
 For I was born to love, and thou to reign. Milner.

2. To establish; to settle; to institute.

Milnes.
Ordain'd our laws, whose use the sword of Caesar Hath too much mangled. Shakspeare, Cyvil.
 I will ordain a place for Israel. 1 Chron. xvii. 9.
 God, from Sinai descending, will himself
 In thunder, lightning, and loud trumpet's sound,
Ordain them laws. Milton, P. L.

Some laws ordain'd, and some attend the choice
 Of holy senators, and elect by voice. Dryden.

3. To set in an office.
 All signified unto you by a man, who is ordained over the affairs, shall be utterly destroyed. Ezek., xiii. 6.

4. To invest with ministerial function, or sacerdotal power.

Meletus was ordained by Arian bishops, and yet his ordination was never questioned. Stillington.

ORDAIN'ABLE. * adj. [from ordain.] That may be appointed.

The nature of man is ordainable to life. Ep. Hall, Rom. p. 377.

ORDAIN'ER. * n. s. [from ordain.]

1. He who ordains, or decrees.

The performance of whose laws must needs bring great commendation to the author and ordainer of them. Burton, vol. 1. S. 5.

2. He who invests with ministerial function, or sacerdotal power.

The ordainer pronounceth by name, when he signeth him. Such a man is consecrated from being presbyter to be a bishop, &c.

Ep. Beid., Life and Lett. p. 478.

ORDEAL. † n. s. [Opbal, Sax. ordalium, low Lat. ordalio, Fr. Dr. Johnson.] Serenius deduces the word from the Goth. ordala, dirimere litem, ordala, judicare; from ur, ex, and dela, dividere, judicare. See also Kilian, Teut. Diet. in V. OORDEEL. † A trial by fire or water, by which the person accused appealed to heaven, by walking blindfold over hot bars of iron; or being thrown, I suppose, into the water, whence the vulgar trial of witches.

Their ordinal laws they used in doubtful cases, when clear proofs wanted. Halswell on Presidence.

In the time of king John, the purgation per ignem at aquam, or the trial by ordinal compound; but it added with this king. Hals.

ORDER. * n. s. [Ordo, Lat. ordre, Fr.]

1. Method; regular disposition.

To know the true state of Solomon's house, I will keep this order; I will set forth the end of our foundation, the instruments for our works, the several employments assigned, and the ordinances we observe. Bozou, New Alliance.

As St. Paul was full of the doctrine of the gospel; so let lay all clear and in order, open to his view. Locke.

2. Established process.
 The moderator, when either of the disputants breaks the rules, may interpose to keep them to order. Watts.

3. Proper state.
 Any of the faculties wanting, or out of order, produce suitable defects in men's understandings. Locke.

4. Regularity; settled mode.
 This order with her sorrow she accords,
 Which orderless all form of order breaks. Daniel.

Kings are the fathers of their country, but unless they keep their own estates, they are much fathers as order sons maintain, which is against the order of nature. Dumant.

5. Mandate; precept; command.
 Give order to my servants, that they take
 No note of our being absent. Shakspeare, Merch. of Ven.

If the lords of the council issued out any order against them, or if the king sent a proclamation for their repair to their houses, presently some nobleman published a protestation against those orders and proclamations. Clarendon.

Upon this new fright, an order was made by both houses for disarming all the papists in England; upon which, and the like orders, though seldom any thing was after done, yet it served to keep up the apprehensions in the people of dangers and designs, and to disincite them from any reverence or affection to the queen. Clarendon.

When Christians became a distinct body, courts were set up by the order of the apostles themselves, to minister judicial process. Kettworth.

I received an order under your hand for a thousand pounds in words at length. Trotter.

6. Rule; regulation.
 The church hath authority to establish that for an order at one time, which at another time it may abolish, and in both do well. Hodder.

7. Regular government.
 The right, their number, and the sudden act,
 Would dash all order, and protect their fact. Daniel.

As there is no church, where there is no order, no ministry; so where the same order and ministry is, there is the same church. Pearson.

8. A society of dignified persons distinguished by marks of honour.

Elves.
 The several chairs of order look you scour,
 With juice of balm and ev'ry precious flow'r.

Shakspeare.
 Princes many times make themselves desirous, and set their hearts upon toys; sometimes upon a building; sometimes upon erecting of an order. Bacon.

She left immortal trophies of her fame,
 And to the noblest order gave the name. Dryden.

By shining marks, distinguish'd they appear,
 And various orders various enigmas bear. Greenwell.

9. A rank, or class.

The king commanded the high priest and the priests of the second order, to bring forth out of the temple all the vendors. 2 Kings, xlii. 4.

The Almighty saying,
 From his transcendent seat the saints among,
 To those bright orders utter'd thus his voice. Milton, P. L.

Like use you make of the equivocal word order, which is of order, or office, or dominion, or nature; and you artificially blend and confound all together. Wetland.

10. A religious fraternity.
 Find a lawless brother out,
 One of our order to associate us,
 Here visiting the sick. Shakspeare, Rom. and Jul.

11. [In the plural.] Hierarchical state.

If the faults of men in orders are only to be judged among themselves, they are all to some sort parties. Locke.

Having in his youth made a good progress in learning, that he might dedicate himself more fully to religion, he entered into holy orders, and in a few years became renowned for his piety of life. Addison, Spect.

When Urbanus first entered into holy orders, he had laughter in his temper, a great contempt and disregard for all foolish and unseemly people; but he has passed away this spirit. Law.

12. Means to an end.

Virgins most remember, that the virginity of the body is only excellent in order to the purity of the soul; for in the same degree that virgins live more spiritually than other persons, in the same degree is their virginity a good order to living. Ep. Taylor, Rule of Living Holy.

We should behave reverently towards the Divine Majesty, and justly towards men; and in order to the better discharge of these duties, we should govern ourselves in the use of sensible delights with temperance. Tilston.

The best knowledge is that which is of greatest use in order to our eternal happiness. Tilston.

What we see is in order only to what we do not see; and both these states must be joined together. Atterbury.

One man pursues power in order to wealth, and another wealth in order to power, which law is the safer way, and generally followed. Swift.

13. Measures; care.

It were meet you should take some order for the soldiers, which are now first to be discharged and disposed of some way; which may otherwise grow to as great inconvenience as all this that you have got us from. Spencer, on Ireland.

Provide me soldiers.
 Whilst I take order for mine own affairs. Shakspeare.

The money promised us the king, he took no order for, albeit Somers required it. S. King, iv. 27.

If any of the family be distressed, order is taken for their relief and competent means to live. Bacon.

14. [In architecture.] A system of the several members, ornaments, and proportions of columns and pilasters; or it is a regular arrangement of the projecting parts of a building, especially those of a column: so as to form one beautiful whole: or order is a certain rule for the proportions of columns, and for the figures which some of the parts ought to have, on the account of the proportions that are given them. There are five orders of columns: three of which are Greek, viz. the Doric, Ionic, and Corinthian; and two Italian, viz. the Tuscan and Composite. The whole is composed of two parts at least, the column and the entablature, and of four parts at the most; where there is a pedestal under the columns, and one acroter or little pedestal on the top of the entablature. The column has three parts; the base, the shaft, and the capital; which parts are all different in the several orders.

In the Tuscan order, any height being given, divide it into ten parts and three quarters, called diameters. By diameters is meant the thickness of the shaft at the bottom, the pedestal having two; the column with base and capital, seven; and the entablature one and three quarters.

In the Doric order, the whole height being given, is divided into twelve diameters or parts, and one third; the pedestal having two and one third, the column eight, and the entablature two.

In the Ionic order, the whole height is divided into thirteen diameters and a half; the pedestal having two and two thirds, the column nine, and the entablature one and four fifths.

In the Corinthian order, the whole height is divided into fourteen diameters and a half; the pedestal having three, the column nine and a half, and the entablature two.

In the Composite order, the whole height is divided into fifteen diameters and one third; the pedestal having three and one third, the column ten, and the entablature two.

In a colonnade or range of pillars, the intercolumniation or space between columns in the Tuscan order, is four diameters. In the Doric order, two and three quarters; in the Ionic order, two and a quarter; in the Corinthian order, two; and in the Composite order, one and a half.

Builder's Dict.

Balfour, by an orderly and well-governed march, passed in the king's quarters without any considerable loss, to a place of safety. Clarendon.

4. By God with established method.

As for the orders established, with the law of nature, of God, and man do all favour that which is in being, till orderly judgement of decision be given against it, it is but justice to exact obedience of you. Hooker.

A clergy reformed from popery in such a manner, as happily to preserve the mean between the two extremes, in doctrine, worship, and government, perfected this reformation by quiet and orderly methods, free from those confusions and tumults that elsewhere attended it. Atterbury.

- ORDERLY*. adv. [from order.] Methodically; according to order; regularly; according to rule.

All parts of knowledge have been thought by wise men to be then most orderly delivered and procured, when they are drawn to such first original. Hooker.

Ask him his name, and orderly proceed To swear him. Shakspeare, Rich. III.

Make it orderly and well, According to the fashion of the time. Shakspeare.

It is walled with brick and stone, intermixed orderly. Scudry.

1 How should those active particles, justified by the occurrence of other bodies, whereby there is an infinite store, so orderly keep their evils without any alteration of site? Glanville.

In the body, when the principal parts, the heart and liver, do their offices, and all the inferior smaller vessels act orderly and duly, there arises a sweet enjoyment upon the whole, which we call health. South, Serm.

ORDINABLE.* n. s. [from ordinable.]

Capability of being appointed.

Our obedience to God ought to be such, as that it may have, though not a merit of condignity to deserve everlasting bliss, (that being, as I have shown you, utterly impossible,) yet an ordinability, as a great doctor of our church expressed it, that is, a necessity, fitness, and due disposition toward the obtaining it. Bp. Barlow, Works, i. 367.

ORDINABLE.† adj. [ordino, Lat.] That may be appointed.

All the ways of economy God hath used toward a rational creature, to reduce mankind to that course of living which is most perfectly agreeable to our nature, and by the mercy of God ordinable to eternal bliss. Hammond.

If we look upon ourselves as men, we are free agents, and therefore capable of doing good or evil, and consequently ordinable unto reward or punishment. Pearson on the Creed, Art. 11.

ORDINAL. adj. [ordinal, French; ordinalis, Latin.] Noting order; as, second, third.

The moon's age is thus found: add to the space the day of the month and ordinal number of that month from March inclusive, because the spect begins at March, and the sum of those, cutting away thirty or twenty-nine, as often as it ariseth, is the age of the moon. Halder.

ORDINAL.† n. s. [ordinal, old French; ordinalis, Latin.] A ritual; a book containing orders.

As provost principal

To teach them their ordinal. Silex, Poet, p. 230.

ORDINANCE. n. s. [ordonnance, French.]

1. Law; rule; prescript.

It searcheth to plant any sound ordinance, or reduce them to a civil government; since all their ill customs are permitted unto them. Spenser on Ireland.

The true succession of each royal house, By God's fair ordinance coupled together! Shakspeare.

2. Observance commanded.

One ordinance ought not to exclude the other, much less to dispargue the other, and least of all to undervalue that which is the most eminent. Bp. Taylor.

3. Appointment.

Things created to shew bare heads, When one but of tiny ordinance stood up, To speak of peace or war. Shakspeare, Coriol.

4. A canon. It is now generally written for distinction ordinance; its derivation is not certain; perhaps when the word canon was first introduced, it was mistaken for canon, and so not improperly translated ordinance. It is commonly used in a collective sense for more canons than one.

Caves and wondrous vaultages of France, Shall chide your trespass and return your mock, In second account to his ordinance. Shakspeare, Hen. V.

ORDINANT.* adj. [ordinans, Latin.] Ordaining; decreeing. Not in use.

6 A 2

Why, even in that was heaven ordinant.

ORDINARILY. adv. [from ordinary.] Hamlet.

1. According to established rules; according to settled method.

We are not to look that the church should change her public laws and ordinances, made according to that which is judged ordinarily, and commonly fitted for the whole, although if chance that for some particular men the same be found inconvenient. Hooker.

Springs and rivers do not derive the water which they ordinarily refund from rain.

Woodward, Nat. Hist.

2. Commonly; usually.

The instances of human ignorance were not only clear ones, but such as are not so ordinarily suspected. Glenville.

Prayer ought to be more than ordinarily fervent and vigorous before the sacrament. South.

ORDINARY. adj. [ordinarius, Lat.]

1. Established; methodical; regular.

Though in arbitrary governments there may be a body of laws observed in the ordinary forms of justice, they are not sufficient to secure any rights to the people; because they may be dispensed with. Addison, Freeholder.

The standing ordinary means of conviction falling to influence them, it is not to be expected that any extraordinary means should be able to do it. Atterbury.

Through the want of a sincere intention of pleasing God in all our actions, we fall into such irregularities of life, as by the ordinary means of grace we should have power to avoid. Law.

2. Common; usual.

Yet did the only utter her doubt to her daughters, thinking, since the worst was past, she would attend a further occasion, lest over much haste might seem to proceed of the ordinary mistake between sisters in law. Sidney.

It is sufficient that Moses have the ordinary credit of an historian given him. Tillemont.

This designation of the person our author is more than ordinary obliged to take care of, because he hath made the conveyance, as well as the power itself, sacred. Locke.

There is nothing more ordinary than children's receiving into their minds propositions from their parents; which being fastened by degrees, are at last, whether true or false, riveted there. Locke.

Method is not less requisite in ordinary conversation than in writing. Locke.

3. Mean; of low rank.

Life of Sir T. Pope, by Warton, p. 349.

O'RGAL.† n. s. Lees of wine.

O'RGAN.† n. s. [oŕgan, Fr. organo.]

1. Natural instrument; as the tongue is the organ of speech, the lungs of respiration.

When he shall hear she died upon his words,

The ever lovely organ of her life

Shall come apperill'd in more precious habite,

Than when she liv'd indeed. Shakespeare,

For a man and organ, by which this operative virtue might be continued, God appointed the light to be united, and gave it also motion and heat. Balgeh.

The aptness of birds is not so much in the conformity of the organs of speech, as in their attention. Bacon.

Wit and will

Can judge and choose without the body's aid;

Tho' on such objects they are working still,

As through the body's organs are convey'd. Darwin.

2. An instrument of musick consisting of pipes filled with wind, and of stops, touched by the hand. [Orgue, Fr.
"instrument de musique fort ancien." Roquefort. "Navarr saith, that the use of organs was not received in Thomas Aquinas's time; who was born in the year 1221. But Bale and Mantuan attribute the bringing in of organs to the pope Vitalian. Then it must be about the year 660. But to make short, the organ is not of the westero, but the eastern invention. Aymon saith, that the first organ they had in France was made more Gracorum, — after the year 813. — But Marianus Scotus, Martin
Polonus, Platina, the Annals of France, Aventine, and the Pontifical itself, all agree, that the first organ which was seen in the west, was sent over into France to king Pepin from the Greek emperor Constantine Copronymus, about the year 766. Res adhuc Ger-manis et Gallis incognita, saith Aventine, instrumentum musicae maximum; organum
appellatur; cunctis et alio plumbo compactum est, simul et foliis ibiatur, et maxum pedumque digitis pulsatur.
Annal. Boiorum, lib. 3. fol. 300. And so we have the antiquity of organs in the west. But in the east they cannot be less ancient than the Nicene council itself, as appeareth by the emperor Julian's epigram upon the instrument.

Elc' O'PGANON. Ἀδελφὸν ἱερὸν, &c. Gregory's Posthuma, or Learned Tracts, 1650, p. 49.]

A hand of vast extension, and a prodigious number of fingers playing upon all the organ pipes in the world, and making every one sound a particular note. Keil.

While in more lengthen'd notes, and slow
The deep, majestic, solemn organs blow. Pope.

To O'RGAN.* v. a. [from the noun.] To form organically. Not in use.

Would'st thou be treated with in the ineffable dieth of heaven? Alas! fond creature, thou art elemented and organised for other apprehensions, for a lower commerce of perception.

Mannyngham, Disc. (1681), p. 89.

O'RGANICAL.† adj. [organique, Fr. orga-
no.] anicus, Lat.]

1. Consisting of various parts co-operating with each other.

He rounds the air, and breaks the hymnick notes

In birds, heav'n's choristers, organick throats;

Which, if they did not die, might seem to be

A tenth rank in the heavenly hierarchy. Danae.

He with serpent tongue

Organick, or impulse of vocal air,

His fraudulent temptation thus began. Milton, P. L.

The organical structure of human bodies, whereby they live and move, and are vitally informed by the soul, is the workmanship of a most wise, powerful, and beneficent being. Boswell.

2. Instrumental; acting as instruments of nature or art, to a certain end.

Read with them those organick arts which enable men to discourse and write perspicuously, elegantly, and according to the fitted style of lofty, mean, or lowly. Milton on Education.

3. Respecting organs.

She could not produce a monster of any thing that hath more vital and organical parts than a rock of marble.

They who want the sense of discipline, or bearing, are by consequence deprived of speech, not by any immediate organical indisposition, but for want of discipline. Holder.

O'RGANICALLY.† adv. [from organical.]

By means of organs or instruments; by organical disposition of parts.

All stones, metals, and minerals, are real vegetables; that is, grow organically from seeds, as well as plants. Locke.

O'RGANICALNESS.† n. s. [from organical.]
State of being organical.

O'RGANISM.† n. s. [from organ.] Organical structure.

How admirable is the natural structure or organism of bodies! Greer, Cursus. Sat.

O'RGANIST.† n. s. [organiste, Fr. from organ.] One who plays on the organ.

An organist serves that office in a public choir.

ORGANIZATION.† n. s. [from organize.] Construction in which the parts are so disposed as to be subservient to each other.

Every man's senses differ as much from others in their figure, colour, site, and infinite other peculiarities in the organization, as any one man's can from itself, through divers accidental variations. Glenville, Serapian.

That being then one plant, which has such an organization of parts in one coherent body, partaking of one common life, it continues to be the same plant, though that life be communicated to new particles of matter, in a like continued organization. Locke.

To O'RGANIZE. v. a. [organiser, Fr. from organ.] To construct so as that one part co-operates with another; to form organically.

As the soul doth organize the body, and give unto every member that substance, quantity, and shape, which nature seeth most expedient, so the inward grace of sacraments may teach what serveth best for their outward form. Hooker.

A genial and cherishing heat so acts upon the fit and obsequious matter, whereat it was harboured, as to organize and fashion that disposed matter according to the exigencies of its own nature. Boyle.

Those nobler faculties in the mind, matter organized could never produce. Ray on the Creation.

The identity of the same man consists in a participation of the same continued life, by constantly succeeding particles in succession vitally united to the same organized body. Locke.

O'RGANLOFT.† n. s. [organ and loft.] The loft where the organ stands.

Five young ladies, who are of no small fame for their great severity of manners, — would go no where with their lovers but to an organloft in a church, where they had a cold treat and some few opera songs. Tulzer, No. 61.

O'RGANPIPE.† n. s. [organ and pipe.] The pipe of a musical organ.

The thunder.

That deep and dreadful organpipe, pronounced
The name of Prosper. Shakespeare, Tempest.

O'RGANYT.† n. s. [organe, Saxon; organ- um, Lat.] An herb. Ainsworth.

Organic heath scale.

Gerarde's Herbal, (1597), p. 542.

O'RGASM.† n. s. [orgasme, Fr. orgasme.]
Sudden vehemence.

This rupture of the lungs, and consequent splitting of blood, usually arises from an orgasme, or immediate motion of the blood. Blackmore.

By means of the curious judgment and calculation of the auditory nerves, the organs of the spirit should be allayed, and perturbations of the mind quieted. Darwin.

O'RGEXT.† n. s. [French.] A liquor extracted from barley and sweet almonds. Mason.

O'RGES.† n. s. A sea-fish, called likewise organizing. Both seem a corruption of the orkenying, as being taken on the Orkeny coast. Ainsworth.

O'RGIES.† n. s. [orgies, Fr. orgia, Lat.
orgia, Gr. from orgy, rage.] Mad rites of Bacchus; frantick revels. I find this word used in the singular.

It would have resembled an orgy to Bacchus.

Sir T. Herbert, Trans. p. 118.

These are orgies

Solemn to the shining rites

Of the fairie prince and knights,

While the moon their orgies lights. J. Johnson.

She feign'd nocturnal orgies; left my bed,

And, mix'd it with Trojan dances, the dances led.

Dryden.

O'RGILLOUS.† adj. [orgueilleux, Fr. Dr.
Johnson.—The modern editors of Shakspeare print this word orgulous, and Mr.
Steevens has shewn that it is a very ancient word for proud or didaful. The Saxons used orgelle in the same manner.] Proud; haughty. Not in use.

From Isles of Greece

The princes against their hated blood chafed,
Have to the port of Athens sent their ships.

Shakespeare, Hen. V. Prolog.

O'RICHALCUM. † n. s. [orichalcum, Lat. from the Gr. ὀρυζα, a mountain, and χαλκός, brass. Our word is sometimes improperly written aurichalc, as if it were connected with aurum, gold.] Brass.

Not Bilbo steel, nor brass from Corinth fits,
Nor costly orichalc from strange Phœnicia,
But such as could best Phœbus' arrows ward,
And the halting darts of heaven beating hard.

Spenser, Maids of Pen.

A massy load of orichalc is placed upon a chariot with eight wheels richly gilded.

Sir T. Herbert, Trav. p. 348.

O'RIEL. * } n. s. [oriel, old Fr. "porche," O'RIOLE. * } allée, galerie.] Lacombe:
oriodum, low Latin. Du Cange says, that he knows not the origin of this word.] A little waste room next the hall, where particular persons dine. Such is the description by Coles, Dict. 1685. And the sense of oriodum is much the same in Du Cange. It was a sort of recess. In our ancient vocabulary, the Prompt. Parvulorum, oriel is translated into the Latin cancellus, interdicta. This may serve to explain "the oriel window," which is sometimes found in modern publications.

Oriel, oriodum : — we may justly presume that Oriel or Oryal college, in Oxford, took name from such room, or portico, or cloister.

Cowell, in V. Oryel.

O'RIENTY. * n. s. [from orient.] Brightness of colour; strength of colour.

In that they [angels] are sinless, their created power is in its pristine vigour and orienty, immaculate.

Waterhouse on Fortunate, p. 221.

Black and thorny plum tree is of the deepest orienty.
Dryden, B. iii. ch. 4. § 12.

O'RIENT. adj. [orient, Lat.]

1. Rising as the sun.

Moon that now meet'st the orient sun, now fly'st
With the fix'd stars.
Milton, P. L.
When fair morn orient in heaven appear'd.
Milton, P. L.

2. Eastern; oriental.

Bright; shining; glittering; gaudy; sparkling.

The liquid drops of tears that you have shed,
Shall come again transform'd to orient pearl;
Advancing their gain with interest,
Oblivious double gain of happiness. Shakespeare.

There do breed yearly an insupportable company of gnats, whose property is to fly into the eye of the lion, as being a bright and orient thing.

About on the World.

We have spoken of the cause of orient colours in birds; which is by the fineness of the strainer.
Bacon, Nat. Hist.

Morning light

More orient is in your western cloud, that draws O'er the blue firmament a radiant shine.

Milton, P. L.

In thick shelter of black shades imbower'd,
[He] offers to each weary traveller
His orient liquor in a crystal glass,
To quench the drouth of Phœbus. Milton, Comus.

The chiefs about their necks the scutcheon wore,
With orient pearls and jewels powder'd o'er.

Dryden.

O'RIENT. † n. s. [orient, Fr.] The east; the part where the sun first appears.

Such schemes as these were usual to the nations of the orient.

Méte, Paraphr. of St. Peter, [1642,] p. 22.
The greatest and best built city throughout the orient.

Sir T. Herbert, Trav. p. 159.
The star of love, or the sun, makes all the orient love.
Warren, Hist. E. p. iii. 351.

O'RIENTAL. adj. [oriental, Fr.] Eastern; placed in the east; proceeding from the east.

Your ships went as well to the pillars of Hercules, as to Perquin upon the oriental seas, as far as to the borders of the east Tartary.

Newton, New Atlantic.
Some ascribing hereto the generation of gold, conceive the bodies to receive some appropriate influence from the sun's ascendent and oriental radiations.
Brown.

O'RIENTAL. n. s. An inhabitant of the eastern parts of the world.

They have been of that great use to following ages, as to be imitated by the Arabians and other orientals.
Greav.

O'RIENTALISM. † n. s. [from oriental.] An idiom of the eastern languages; an eastern mode of speech.

Dragons are a sure mark of orientalism.
Farson, Hist. E. p. vol. i. Diss. i. sign. c.

Scholars unacquainted with Hebrew will receive pleasure and instruction from a literal version of orientalism immediately presented to their eyes, without the trouble of referring to a servile Latin translation.

Abp. Newcome, Ess. on the Transl. of the Bib. p. 285.

O'RIENTALIST. * n. s. [from oriental.] An inhabitant of the eastern parts of the world.

According to the received notion of the orientalists.
Diblioth. Jidd. i. 51.

Who can tell how far the orientalists were wont to adorn their parasites? Peters on Job, p. 123.

O'RIENTALITY. * n. s. [from oriental.] State of being oriental.

His revolution being regular, it had no efficacy peculiar from his orientality, but equally discomfited his beams.

O'RIFICE. * n. s. [orifice, Fr. orificium, Lat.] Any opening or perforation.

The prince of Orange, in his first hurt by the Spanish boy, could find no means to staunch the blood, but was fain to have the orifice of the wound stopped by men's thumbs, succeeding one another for the space of two days.
Bacon.

Their mouths
With hideous orifice grapp'd on us wide, Portending hollow truce.
Milton, P. L.

Æna was bored through the top with a monstrous orifice.
Adisson, Guardians.

Blow-blotting, Hippocrates said, should be done with broad lancets or swords, in order to make a large orifice by stabbing or pertusion.

Arbuthnot on Cæsa.

O'RIFLAMME. † n. s. [old Fr. oriflamme; probably a corruption of auriflamme, Lat. or flamme d'or, Fr. in like manner as orientalism is corrupted.] A golden standard.
Aeneasworth.

Yet holy Lewis with his Frenchmen strook
Into the Pagans such deep flames, that they,
At his illustrious oriflamme look,
Upon his victories gave willing way.

Bonomet, Psyche, (1651,] p. 277.
O'RIGAN. n. s. [origan, Fr. origanum, Lat.] Wild marjoram.

I chanc'd to see her in her proper hue,
Bathing herself in origan and thyme.

Spenser, F. Q.

O'RIGIN. } n. s. [origen, Fr. origo,
ORIGINAL. } Lat.]

1. Beginning; first existence.

The sacred historian only treats of the origin of terrestrial animals.

Beatty, Sermon.
2. Fountain; source; that which gives being or existence.

Nature, which contains its origin,
Cannot be border'd 't certain in itself.

Shakespeare, A. Lear.
If any station upon earth be honourable, their was; and their posterity therefore have no reason to blush at the memory of such an original.

Atterbury.

Some philosophers have placed the original of power in administration, either of surpassing form, great valour, or superior understanding. Downham.

Original of beings! pow'r I divine!
Since that I live and that I think, is thine. Prior.

These great orbs,

Primitive founts, and origins of light. Prior.

3. First copy; archetype; that from which any thing is transcribed or translated. In this sense origin is not used.

Compare this translation with the original, the three first stanzas are rendered almost word for word, not only with the same elegance, but with the same turn of expression. Adisson.

External material things, as the objects of sensation; and the operations of our minds within, as the objects of reflection; are the originals from whence all our ideas take their beginnings.

Locke.

4. Derivation; descent.

They, like the seed from which they sprang, accurst
Against the gods immortal hatred nurs'd;
An impious, arrogant, and cruel brood,
Expressing their original from blood. Dryden.

O'RIGINAL. adj. [origined, Fr. originalis, Lat.] Primitive; pristine; first.
The original question was, whether God hath furnished the giving any worship to himself by an image? Stillfleet.

Had Adam obeyed God, his original perfection, the knowledge and ability God at first gave him, would still have continued. Waller, Prop. for Death.

You still, fair mother, in your offspring track
The stock of beauty destin'd for the race;
Kind nature, forming them, the pattern took
From heav'n's first work, and Eve's original look.

Prior.

O'RIGINALITY. * n. s. [from original.] Quality or state of being original.

Henry also hangs the celebrated Madonna del Pece of Raphael, one of the most valuable pictures in the world. I do not know how Amicci came to doubt of its originality.
Seisembury, Trav. through Spain, i. 43.

The owners really believed those pictures to be original, and among the best of the respective masters, to whom they were attributed; and it would have been the highest affront to have expressed a doubt of their originality. Gough.

O'RIGINALLY. adv. [from original.]

1. Primarily; with regard to the first cause; from the beginning.

A vast great difference between a king that holdeth his crown by a willing act of estates, and one that holdeth it originally by the law of nature and descent of blood. Bacon.

As God is originally holy in himself, so he might communicate his sanctity to the sons of men, whom he intended to bring into the fruition of himself. Peacock.

A present blessing upon our firsts, is neither originally due from God's justice, nor becomes due so from great veracity. Smalridge, Sermon.

2. At first.
The metallic and mineral matter found in the perpendicular intervals of the strata, was originally, and at the time of the deluge, lodged in the bodies of those strata. Woodward.

3. As the first author.

For what originally others writ,
May be so well disguise'd, and so improv'd,
That with some justice it may pass for ours.

Rostomum.

ORIGINALESS. n. s. [from original.] The quality or state of being original.

ORIGINARY. adj. [originaire, French, from origin.]

1. Productive; causing existence.

The production of animals in the ordinary way, requires a certain degree of warmth, which proceeds from the sun's influence. Chygn, Phil. Prin.

2. Primitive; that which was the first state.

Remember I am built of clay, and must resolve to my original dust. Sonnet on Job.

To ORIGINATE v. d. [from origin.] To bring into existence.

The holy story originates skill and knowledge of arts from God.

Waterhouse, Apol. for Lerna, (1653), p. 9.

To ORIGINATE v. n. To take existence. I consider the adverb — as originating in the principles of the sermon.

Burke on the Fr. Revolution.

ORIGINATION. n. s. [originatio, Lat. from originate.]

1. The act or mode of bringing into existence; first production.

The tradition of the origination of mankind seems to be universal; but the particular methods of that origination excogitated by the heathen, were particular. His error is propagated by animal parents, to wit, butterflies, after the common origination of all caterpillars.

Ray.

Descartes first introduced the fancy of making a world, and deducing the origination of the universe from mechanical principles. Kul.

2. Descent from a primitive.

The Greek word used by the apostles to express the church, signifies, a calling forth, if we look upon the origination. Pearson.

ORION. n. s. [Latin.] One of the constellations of the southern hemisphere.

When with fierce winds Orion arm'd

ORISON. n. s. [orison, old French; oraison, modern; oratio, Lat. See ORAISON.]

When written oraison, the accent is proper on the second syllable; not so, when written orison. Cotton, for the sake of the rhyme, in a burlesque couplet among the following examples, has indeed forced the accent upon the second syllable of orison. The word is usually found in the plural number. Dyer uses oraison in the singular.] A prayer; a supplication.

Nymph, is thy orison
Be all my sins remember'd. Shakspeare, Hamlet.
Alas! your too much love and care of me
Are heavy orisons 'gainst this poor wretch.

Shakspeare.

He went into St. Paul's church, where he had orisons and To Desim sung. Bacon, Hen. VII.

My wakeful lay shall knock
At the oriental gates, and duly mock
The early lark's whistling orisons, to be
As southern at the day's maturity. Crook.

His daily orisons attract our ears. Sonnet on Job.
Lowly they bow'd, adoring, and began Their orisons, each morning duly paid.

Milton, P. L.

So went he on with his orisons,

Which, if you mark them well, were wise ones.

Cotton.

The midnight clock attests my fervent prayers,
The rising sun my orisons declares. Harte.

OR-K.F. n. s. A sea-fish. See ORC.

ORLOP. n. s. [overloop, Dutch.] The middle deck. Skinner.

A small ship of the king's, called the Pensie, was assailed by the Lyon, a principal ship of Scotland; wherein the Pensie so applied her shot, that the Lyon's orlop was broken, her sails and tackling torn; and lastly, she was boarded and taken. Hayward.

ORNAMENT. n. s. [ornamentum, Latin; ornement, French.]

1. Embellishment; decoration.

So may the outward shows be least themselves;
The world is still deceiv'd with ornament. Shakspeare.

2. Something that embellishes.

Ivory, wrought in ornaments to deck the cheeks of boys. Clayman.

The Trojan chief to me has sent

Their crown, and every regal ornament. Dryden.
No circumstances of life can place a man so far below the notice of the world, but that his virtues or vices will render him, in some degree, an ornament or disgrace to his profession. Rogers.

3. Honour; that which confers dignity.

They are abused and injured, and betrayed from their only perfection, whenever they are taught, that any thing is an ornament in them, that is not an ornament in the wisest amongst mankind. Leav.
The persons of different qualities in both sexes are indeed allowed their different ornaments; but these are by no means costly, being rather assigned as marks of distinction than to make a figure.

Addison on Italy.

To ORNAMENT v. g. [from the noun. Dr. Johnson notices ornamented (without any example) as an adjective, which he thinks a word of late introduction, and not very elegant. Warburton, a little before the Dictionary of Dr. Johnson was published, appears to have employed it; and Shenstone had used it long before.] To embellish; to bedeck; to adorn.

Why droops my Damon, whilst he roves
Through ornamented fields and groves?

Shenstone, Prog. of Taste, P. 4.

Those august towers of St. James's, which, though neither seemly nor sublime, yet ornament the place where the balances are preserved, which weigh out liberty and property to the nations all abroad. Warburton in Hurd, Lett. 60.

The font, remaining in its old situation near the chief entrance, is large and well ornamented. Warton, Hist. of Kildington, p. 4.

ORNAMENTAL. adj. [from ornament.]

Serving to decoration; giving embellishment.

Some think it most ornaments to wear their bracelets on their wrists, others about their ankles. Brown.

If the kind be capable of more perfection, though rather in the ornamental parts of it than the essential, what rules of morality or respect have I broken in naming the defects, that they may hereafter be amended?

Dryden.
Even the heathen have esteemed this variety not only ornamental to the earth, but a proof of the wisdom of the Creator. Woodward, Nat. Hist.

If no advancement of knowledge can be had from universities, the time there spent is lost; every ornamental part of education is better taught elsewhere. Swift on Religion.

ORNAMENTALLY. adv. [from ornamental.]

In such a manner as may confer embellishment.

ORNATE. adj. [ornatus, Latin. This is an old word in our language; of which Milton seems to have been fond. It is in Huloet's Dictionary.] Bedecked; decorated; fine.

Not in rude and old language, but in polished and ornate terms.

Prof. in the Isle of England, Cotton, (1490.)
Men — ornate with virtue and wisdom.

Sir T. Elyot, Gen. fol. 12. b.

A graceful and ornate rhetoric, taught out of the rule of Plato. Milton on Education.

What thing of art or land,
Femle of sex it seems,
That so bedeck'd, ornate, and gay,
Comes this way sailing? Milton, S. A.

To ORNATE v. g. [ornare, Latin.] To adorn; to garnish. Huloet.

This is the exposition of the noble philosopher; which I have written, principally to the intent to ornate our language with using words in their proper signification. Sir T. Elyot, Gov. fol. 300.

ORNATELY. adv. [from ornate.] Finely; with decoration; with embellishment.

With proper captations of benevolence
Ornately polished after your facility.

Scillon, Fenns, p. 35.

To utter the mind aptly, distinctly, and ornately, is a gift given to very few.

Sherry, Figures of Grammar, and Rhet. (1555), fol. ii. b.
ORNATENESS. n. s. [from ornate.] Finery; state of being embellished.

ORNATURE. n. s. [ornature, old French; from ornatus, Latin.] Decoration.

His noble purpose was this: to save precious monuments of ancient virtues, which is a most worthy work; and so to bring them from darkness to a lively light, to the notable fame and ornature of this land.

Ben Jonson, New Year's Gift, (1549.)
A mushroom for all your other ornatures.

B. Jonson, Poetaster.

ORNI'SCOPIST. n. s. [lyric and scopist.] One who examines the flight of birds in order to foretell futurity.

ORNITHOLOGIST. n. s. [ornithologiste, French; from ornithology.] One who understands the nature of birds; a describer of birds.

Soon after Mr. Adanson's Voyage to Senegal, Mr. Collinson first in the philosophical transactions, and after him, the most eminent ornithologists in Europe, seem to have considered this traveller's having caught four European swallows, on the 6th of October, not far from the African coast, as a decisive proof that the common swallows, when they disappear in Europe, make for Africa during the winter, and return again to us in the spring.

Barrington, Ess. 4.

ORNITHOLOGY. n. s. [lyric and lyric.] A discourse on birds.

ORPHAN. n. s. [orphan; orphelin, Fr.] A child who has lost father or mother, or both.

Poor orphans in the wide world scattered,
As budding branch rent from the native tree,
And thrown forth until it be withered:
Such is the state of man. Spenser.

Who can be bound by any solemn vow
To reverse the opinion of his patrimony.

To wrong the widow from her custom'd right,
And have no other reason for his wrong,
But that he was bound by a solemn oath? Shakspeare.

Sad widow, by thee rifled, weep in vain,
And rail'st thyself of thy rapacious kind.

The sea with spoils his angry bullets strow,
Widows and orphan making as they go. Waller.

Play, with a parent's mind,
This helps orphan whom thou leav'st behind.

Dryden.
Collections were made for the relief of the poor,
whether widows or orphans.

O'RHIAN. adj. [orphanin, French.] Bereft of parents.

This king, left orphan both of father and mother, found his estate, when he came to age, so disjoined even in the noblest and strongest kinds of government, that the name of a king was grown odious.

Sedley.
O'RHANAGE. † n. s. [orphanage, Fr.;
O'RHANISM. † from orphan.] State of an orphan.

Sherrwood.
O'RHIANEO. \ part. adj.* [from orphan.] Bereft of parents or friends.

So wro't Lorenzo fair Clarissa's fate;
Who gave that angel boy, on whom he doted,
And died to give him, orphan'd in his birth.

Young, Night Th. 5.
For this orphaned world the Holy Spirit made the like charitable provision. Warburton, Sermon, 90.

O'RPIMENT. † n. s. [orpimentum, Lat.;
orpiment, orpin, French.]

Orpiment is a compound of sulphur and arsenic. It is lamellar in one direction, and of a yellow colour. See
Journal of Science, No. 20, p. 287.

For the golden colour, it may be made by some small mixture of orpiment, such as they use to brass in the yellow alloy; it will easily recover that which the iron loathes.

Bacon.
O'RHIA'XOTROPION. n. s. [ῥηξια; and ὁρῶν.]
An hospital for orphans.

O'RIXE. n. s. [orpin, French; telephon, Latin.] Liver or rose root, anacampseras, Telephon, or Rhodia raris.
A plant.

Miller.
Cool violets, and orpin growing still;
Embalmed balm, and cheerful galingale.

Spreyer.
O'RRERY. n. s. An instrument which by many complicated movements represents the revolutions of the heavenly bodies.
It was first made by Mr. Rowley, a mathematician born at Litchfield, and so named from his patron the earl of Orrery; by one or other of this family almost every art has been encouraged or improved.

O'RRIS. n. s. [orris, Latin.] A plant and flower.

Miller.
The nature of the orris root is almost singular;
for roots that are in any degree sweet, it is but the same sweetness with the wood or leaf; but the orris is not sweet in the leaf; neither is the flower any thing so sweet as the root.

Bacon.
O'RRIS. † n. s. [old French.] A sort of gold or silver lace. Dr. Johnson.—If such a word as orris, in this sense, exists, (which I doubt,) it can only be a corruption of orfrays. See O'RFRAIS.

ORT. \ n. s.* [See O'RTS.] A fragment.
It is some poor fragment, some slender art of his remainder.

Shakespeare, Timon.
ORTHODOX. † adj. [ὀρθός and δόξα;
ORTHODOXAL. † orthodox, French.]

Sound in opinion and doctrine; not he-retical. Orthodoxal is not new used.

Be you persuaded and settled in the true protestant religion professed by the church of England; which is as sound and orthodox in the doctrine thereof, as any Christian church in the world.

Bacon.
An uniform profession of one and the same orthodoxal verity, which was once given to the saints in the holy apostles' days.

White.

Eternal bliss is not immediately supererected on the most orthodox beliefs; but as our Saviour saith, If ye know these things, happy are ye if ye do them; the doing must be first supererected on the knowing or believing, before any happiness can be built on it.

Hammond.
Origen and the two Clemens's, their works were originally orthodox, but had been afterwards corrupted, and interpolated by heretics in some parts of them.

Waterland.
ORTHODOXY. adv. [from orthodox.]
With soundness of opinion.

The doctrine of the church of England, expressed in the thirty-nine articles, is so soundly and so orthodoxly settled, as cannot be questioned without extreme danger to the honour of our Religion.

ORTHODOXIES. \ n. s.* [from orthodox.]
State of being orthodox.

I proceed now to the second thing implied in being faithful; and that is purity, and orthodoxi-ness of doctrine.

Aldingcleck, Sermon, p. 17.
ORTHODOXY. n. s. [ὀρθόδοξία; orthodoxie, French; from orthodox.] Soundness in opinion and doctrine.

Basil himself tears full and clear testimony to Gregory's orthodoxy.

Waterland.
He do not attempt explaining the mysteries of the christian religion; since Providence intended there should be mysteries, it cannot be agreeable to piety, orthodoxy, or good sense, to go about it.

Swift.

ORTHODROMICKS. n. s. pl. [from ὀρθός and δρόμος.]
The art of sailing in the arc of some great circle, which is the shortest or straightest distance between any two points on the surface of the globe.

Harrie.
ORTHODROMY. n. s. [ὀρθός and δρόμος; orthodromie, French.] Sailing in a straight course.

ORTHOPHY. \ n. s.* [ὀρθός, right, and φύσις, a word, Greek.] The art of pronouncing words properly.

Of orthography, or orthography, treating of the letters and their pronunciation.

Greenwood, Ess. on Eng. Gram. (2d ed. 1722.) p. 225.
As it has been frequently represented to me, that the unusual, though proper, expression of Eloquence of orthography in the original title of this work, has prevented many from comprehending its real intention, I have consented to the printing of a new title-page.

Nares, Gen. Rules for the Pron. of the Eng. Lang. (1795.) Adv.

ORTHOGON. n. s. [ὀρθός and γωνία.] A rectangled figure.

The square will make you ready for all manner of computations; your cylinder for vaulted turrets and round buildings; your orthogon and pyramid for sharp steeples.

Pechom.
ORTHOGONAL. † adj. [orthogonon, French;
from orthogon.] Rectangular.

Finding the squares of an orthogonal triangle's side.

Selden, Pref. in Drayton's Polybliton.
ORTHOGRAPHER. n. s. [ὀρθός and γράφω.]
One who spells according to the rules of grammar.

He was wont to speak plain, like an honest man and a soldier; and now he is turn'd orthographer, his words are just so many strange dishes.

Shelton.
ORTHOGRAFICAL. adj. [from orthography.]

1. Rightly spelled.
2. Relating to the spelling.

I received from him the following letter, which,

after having rectified some little orthographical
mistakes, I shall make a present of to the public.

Addison, Spect.
3. Delineated according to the elevation, not the ground-plot.

In the orthographical schemes there should be a true delineation and the just dimensions of each face, and of what belongs to it.

Morimer, Husb.
ORTHOGRAPHICALLY. adv. [from ortho-graphical.]

1. According to the rules of spelling.
2. According to the elevation.

ORTHOGRAPHY. n. s. [ὀρθός and γράφω;
orthographie, French.]

1. The part of grammar which teaches how words should be spelled.

This would reader languages much more easy to be learned, as to reading and pronouncing, and especially as to the writing them, which now as they stand we find to be troublesome, and it is no small part of grammar which treats of orthography and right pronunciation.

Hulder.
2. The art or practice of spelling.

In London they clip their words after one manner, about the corner, another in the city, and a third in the suburbs; all which reduced to writing, would entirely confound orthography.

Swift.
3. The elevation of a building delineated.

You have the orthography or upright of this ground-plot, and the explanation with a scale of feet and inches.

Mason.
ORTHOLOGY. \ n. s.* [ὀρθός, right, and λόγος, a word.] Right description of things.

The natural, and as it were the homogeneous, parts of grammar be two; orthology, and orthography; in both which parts of it, God hath had a special hand; as even by the heathen themselves is acknowledged; in the first of them, orthology; in teaching men the right imposition of names; in the second of them, orthography; in teaching them
the rare invention of letters.

Fischer, Aethem. (1692.) p. 346.

ORTHOPNEA. n. s. [ὀρθόπνοια; orthopnée, French.] A disorder of the lungs, in which respiration can be performed only in an upright posture.

Latin.] Relating to the rising of any planet or star.

O'RTOLAN. n. s. [French.] A small bird accounted very delicious.

Not ordians nor goldfinches.
Covely.

O'RTS. † n. s. seldom with a singular. [This word is derived by Skinner from ort, German, the fourth part of any thing; by
Mr. Lye more reasonably from ort, Irish, a fragment. In Anglo-Saxon, ort signifies the beginning; whence in some provinces odds and ends, for ords and ends, signify remnants, scattered pieces, refuse; from ort thus used probably came ort. Dr. Johnson.—Orts is, throughout all England, one of the most common words in our language; which has adopted nothing from the Irish, though we use two or three of their words, as Irish. Orts is merely the past participle of the Anglo-Saxon werþetan, turpare, vilefacere, deturpare. Ort, ort, means (any thing, something,) made vile or worthless. Mr. H. Tooke, Div. of Furley, ii. 528.] Refuse; things left or thrown away.

He must be taught, and train'd, and bid go forth;

If persons of circumspect piety have been overtaken, what security can there be for our wretched security? Gen. of the Tongue.

It might proceed from the activity of transcribers, who, to dispatch their work the sooner, used to write all numbers in cyphers. Addis. Spect.

OSCITANT. adj. [oscitans, Lat.]

1. Yawning; unusually sleepy.

2. Sleepy; sluggish.

His legal justice cannot be so fickle and so variable, sometimes like a devouring fire, and by and by, by convenient in the embers, or, if it may so say, extinct and supine. Milton, Dict. and Disc. of Div. ii. 3.

Our oscillant lady piety gave vacancy for them, and they will now lend some back again. Deacy of Chr. Piety.

OSCITANTLY. adv. [from oscitant.] Carelessly.

Which those drowsy nodders over the letter of the Scripture have very extensively collected. Merr. Conf. Coll. Dedic.

OSCITATION. n. s. [oscito, Lat.] The act of yawning.

OS. n. s. [os, Lat.] A small bone.

I shall defer considering this subject at large, till I come to my treatise of osculum, laughter, and ridicule. Tutor, No. 63.

O'SIER. n. s. [osier, Fr. viter.] A tree of the willow kind, growing by the water, of which the twigs are used for basket-work.

The rank of osiers, by the murmuring stream, Left on your right hand, brings you to the place. Shakspeare.

Ere the sun advance his burning eye, I must fill up this osier cage of ours With bawful weeds and precious-juiced weeds. Shakspeare.

Care comes crown'd with osier, segs and weeds. Drayton.

Bring them for food sweet boughs and osiers cut, Nor all the winter long thy hay-rick cut. May, Virgil.

Like her no nymph can willing osiers bend, In basket-works, which painted streaks commend. Dryden.

Along the marshes spread, We made the osier fringed bank our bed. Pope.

O'SMUND. n. s. A plant. It is sometimes used in medicine. It grows upon bogs in divers parts of England. Miller.

O'SNABURG. n. s. pl. White and brown coarse linens imported from Osnaburg in Germany. A cloth resembling them is manufactured in Angou in Scotland. See Dr. Jamieson's Scot. Dict.

O'SPRAY. n. s. [corrupted from ossifraga, Lat. Dr. Johnson. — Serenius derives it from the Goth. os, the mouth of a river, and prey.] A large, blackish hawk, with a long neck and blue legs. Its prey is fish, and it is sometimes seen hovering over the Tweed. Lambe, Notes to the Battle of Flodden. Sir T. Hamner calls it the sea-eagle; of which it is reported, that when he hovers in the air, all the fish in the water turn up their bellies, and lie still for him to seize which he pleases; a marvel which our old poetry has repeatedly noticed. But Mr. Harris has observed, from Pennant, that the ospray is a different bird from the sea-eagle, though its prey is the same.

I think he'll be to Rome, As is the ospray to the fish, who takes it By surreptitious nature. Shakspeare, Coriol.

Among the fowls shall not be eaten the eagle, the osifrage, and the ospray. Lee, xi. 18.

TO OSS. v. n. To offer; to try; to essay; to set about any thing. It is thus used in Westmoreland, Lancashire, and Cheshire, and perhaps throughout the north. The origin of it I cannot find.

O'SSELET. n. s. [French.] A little hard substance arising on the inside of a horse's knee, among the small bones; it grows out of a gummy substance which fastens those bones together. Farrier's Dict.

O'SSEOUS. adj. [osseus, Lat.] Bony; resembling a bone.

To pursue the anæsthetic and solid part of goodness, which gives stability and rectitude to all the rest. Brown, Chr. Mor. iii. 1.

A medullary, and consequently osseous, substance. Bibbott. Bibl. i. 157.

O'SSICLE. n. s. [ossiculum, Lat.] A small bone.

There are three very little bones in the ear, upon whose right constitution depends the due tension of the tympanum; and if the action of one little muscle, which serves to draw one of those ossicles first to the tympanum, be lost or abated, the tension of that membrane ceasing, sound is hindered from coming into the ear. Holder on Speech.

OSSI'FICK. adj. [ossa and facio, Lat.] Having the power of making bones, or changing carneous or membranous to bony substance, &c.

If the caries be superficial, and the bone firm, you may by medicaments consume the molature in the caries, dry the bone, and dispose it, by virtue of its ossific faculty, to thrust out callus, and make separation of its caries. Wierman.

OSSIFICATION. n. s. [from ossify.] Change of carneous, membranous, or cartilaginous, into bony substance.

Ossifications or indurations of the artery, appear so constantly in the beginnings of aneurisms, that it is not easy to judge whether they are the cause or the effect of them. Sharp.

O'SSIFRAGE. n. s. [ossifraga, Latin; ossifrage, Fr.] A kind of eagle, whose flesh is forbid under the name of gryphon. The ossifraga, or ospray, is thus called, because it breaks the bones of animals in order to come at the marrow.

It is said to dig up bodies in churchyards, and eat what it finds in bones, which has been the occasion that the Latins call it avis bustaria. Calmet. See, however, OSPRAY.

Among the fowls shall not be eaten the eagle, the ossifrage, and the ospray. Lee, xi. 18.

TO O'SPRAY. v. a. [ossa and facio.] To change to bone.

The dilated cysts every where in the neighbourhood of the cyst is generally ossified. Sharp, Surgery.

OSSI'VOROUS. adj. [ossa and voro.] Devouring bones.

The bone of the gullet is not in all creatures alike answerable to the body or stomach; as in the fox, which feeds on bones, and swallows whole, or with little chewing; and next in a dog and other ossi-vorous quadrupeds, it is very large. Derham, Phys. Theat.

O'SSUARY. n. s. [ossuarium, Lat.] A charnel house; a place where the bones of dead people are kept.

Notable lamps, with vessels of oils and aromatic liquors, attended noble anæsthetics. Sir T. Brown on Urn-Burial, (1686.)

OST. n. s. A kiln, where hops or malt OST. n. s. are dried. See OST.

OSTENSIBLE. adj. [ostendo, Lat.]

1. That is proper or intended to be shewn.

I take this opportunity of expressing my surprise, that this ostensible comment of the dumb beast should not regularly appear in the tragedies of Shakspeare. Warton, Hist. E. P. li. 961.

2. Colourable; plausible.

He had, as dictator, an ostensible right to the custody and command of this; and under pretext of this ostensible, he by force of arms seized it. Forcell on Antip. p. 114.

OSTENSIVE. adj. [ostentif, Fr. ostendo, Lat.] Showing; betokening.

OSTENT. n. s. [ostentum, Lat.]

1. Appearance; a way; manner; mien.

1. All the ornaments of civility.

Like one well studied in a sad ostent, To please his grandam. Shaks. Merch. of Ven.

6 B

2. Show; token. These senses are peculiar to Shakespeare.

Be merry, and employ your chiefest thoughts
To courtship, and such fair objects of love
As shall conveniently become you there. Shaksp.

3. A portent; a prodigy; any thing ominous.

To stirre our seales up, that admir'd, whereof a fact is cleare

Of all our sacrifice, so fearful an omen
Should be the issue. Chapman.

Latinus, frighted with this dire omen,
For counsel to his father Faunus went;
And sought the shades renown'd for prophecy,
Which near Albans's volcanic fountains lie. Dryden.

- To OSTENTATE.* v. a. [ostento, Lat.]
To make an ambitious display of; to display boastfully.

It cannot avoid the brand of arrogance, as well as hypocrisy, to challenge and ostentate that beauty or handsomeness of complexion as ours, which indeed is none of ours by any genuine right or property. Ips. Taylor, Arif. Handom. p. 96.

Who is so open-hearted and simple, but they either conceal their defects, or ostentate their sufficiencies, short or beyond when either of them really are? Ips. Taylor, Arif. Handom. p. 169.

So far I must needs ostentate my reading, as to assure you, that I have viewed with my own eyes, and transcribed from all the originals, whatever I have set down. Fleetwood, Chron. Preliminary.

- OSTENTATIOUS. n. s. [ostentatio, Fr. ostenta- tio, Lat.]

1. Outward show; appearance.

If these shows be not outward, which of you But is four Volcians? —
— March on, my fellows;

Make good this ostentation, and you shall Divide in all with us. Shakspere, Coriol.

You are come
A market-maid to Rome, and have presented
The ostentation of our love. Shakspere.

2. Ambitious display; boast; vain show.
This is the usual sense.

If all these secret springs of detraction fall, yet a vain ostentation of wit sets a man on attacking an established name, and sacrificing it to the mirth and laughter of those about him. Addison, Spect.

He knew that good and bountiful minds were sometimes inclined to ostentation, and ready to correct it with pretence of inciting others by their example, and therefore checks this vanity: Take heed, says he, that you do not your aims before men, to be seen. Attorney.

With all her lustre, nor, her lover warm;
Then out of ostentation, hides her charms. Young.

The great end of the art is to strike the imagination.
The painter is therefore to make no ostentation of the means by which this is done; the spectator is only to feel the result in his own view. Reynolds.

3. A show; a spectacle. Not in use.

The king would have me present the princes with some delightful ostentation, show, pageant, antick, or firework. Shakspere, Love's Lab. Lost.

- OSTENTATIOUS. adj. [ostento, Lat.] Boastful; vain; fond of show; fond to expose to view.

Your modesty is so far from being ostentatious of the good you do, that it blushes even to have it known; and therefore I must leave you to the satisfaction of your own conscience, which, though a silent panegyric, is yet the best of all. Dryden.

They let Ulysses into his disposition, and he seems to be ignorant, credulous, and ostentatious.
Broomie on the Odyssey.

- OSTENTATIOUSLY. adv. [from ostenta- tious.] Vainly; boastfully.

- OSTENTATIOUSNESS. n. s. [from ostenta- tious.] Vanity; boastfulness.

- OSTENTATOR.* n. s. [ostentator, Fr. os- tento, Lat.] A boaster; a vain setter to show. Sherwood.

- OSTENTOUS.* adj. [from ostento, Lat. See OSTENT.] Fond of show; fond to expose to view.

Sometimes we ought to be thankful for an enemy. He gives us occasion to show the world our parts and piety, which else, perhaps, in our dark graves would sleep and moulder with us quite unknown; or could not otherwise well be seen without the vanity of a slight and an odious mile. Folham, Res. ii. 53.

Such rude and imperfect draughts being far better in their esteem, than such as are adorned with more pomp, and ostentatious circumstances.
Evelyn, Fumens. Pref.

- OSTEOCOLLA. n. s. [ὀστέον and κόλλα;
osteo, Fr.] Osteocolla is frequent in Germany, and has long been famous for bringing on a callus in fractured bones.
Hill, Mat. Med.

Osteocolla is a spar, generally coarse, covered with earthy or stony matter, precipitated by water, and encrusted upon sticks, stones, and other like bodies. Woodward.

- OSTEOCOPE. n. s. [ὀστέον and σῆμα; osteo- cope, French.] Pains in the bones, or rather in the nerves and membranes that encompass them. Dict.

- OSTEOLOGER.* n. s. [from osteology.]
A describer of the bones.

Osteologers have very well observed, that the parts appertaining to the bones, which stand out at a distance from the bodies, are either the adu-lar or osseous parts. Smith on Old Age, p. 176.

- OSTEOLOGY. n. s. [ὀστέον and λογία; osteo- logy, Fr.] A description of the bones.

Richard Farlow, well known for his acuteness in dissection of dead bodies, and his great skill in osteology, has now laid by that practice. Taiter.

- OSTIARY.* n. s. [ostium, Lat.]

1. The opening at which a river disembogues itself.

It is received that the Nilus hath seven ostiaries, that is by seven channels disburtheneth itself into the sea. Brown.

2. Formerly an ecclesiastical officer. [osti- arius, Lat. from ostium.]

The office of the ostiary was to open and shut the church doors, to look to the decent keeping of the church, and the holy ornaments laid up in the vestrie. Worcer.

- OSTLER. n. s. [ostler, Fr.] The man who takes care of horses at an inn.

The smith, the ostler, and the boot-catcher, ought to partake. Swift, Direct. to the Green.

- OSTLERY. n. s. [ostelerie, French.] The place belonging to the ostler.

- OSTMEN.* n. s. pl. [from eastmen, as coming from a country east of Ireland.

Ottomani, low Latin. V. Du Cange.]
Danish settlers in Ireland.

Anlave was chief of the Ottomen in that island, and styled king of Dublin. Lt. Ligiellum.

- OSTRACISM. n. s. [ὀστρακισμός; ostraci- cism, Fr.] A manner of passing sentence, in which the note of acquittal or condemnation was marked upon a shell which the voter threw into a vessel.

Banishment; public censure.

Virtue in courtiers' hearts
Suffers an ostracism, and departs;

Profit, ease, fitness, piety, bid it go,
But whither, only knowing you, I know. Donne.

Publick envy is as an ostracism, that eclipseth men when they grow too great; and therefore is it a bribe to keep them within bounds. Beacon, Es.
Hypocrits by suffering did traduce
The ostracism, and sham'd it out of use. Claudian.

This man, upon a slight and false accusation of favouring arbitrary power, was banished by ostracism; which in English would signify, that they voted he should be removed from their presence and council for ever. Swift.

- OSTRACITES. n. s. Ostracites expresses the common oyster in its fossil state.

Hill, Mat. Med.

- To OSTRACISE.* v. a. [from ostracism.]
To banish; to expel.

Therefore the democratick stars did rise.
And all that worth from hence did ostracise.
And. Marvel, Lachrym. Mus. (1650.)

- OSTRICH. n. s. [austruche, French; struthio, Latin.] Ostrich is ranged among birds.

It is very large, its wings very short,
and the neck about four or five spans.
The feathers of its wings are in great esteem, and are used as an ornament for hats, beds, canopies: they are stained of several colours, and made into pretty tufts. They are hunted by way of course, for they never fly; but use their wings to assist them in running more swiftly. The ostrich swallows bits of iron or brass, in the same manner as other birds will swallow small stones or gravel, to assist in digesting or comminuting their food. It lays its eggs upon the ground, hides them under the sand, and the sun hatches them. Calmet.

I'll make thee eat iron like an ostrich, and swallow my sword like a great pin, ere thou and I part. Shakspere.

Greatest thou the goodly wings unto the pe-cock? or wings and feathers unto the ostrich? Job, xxiii. 19.

The Scots knights errant fight, and fight to eat, Their ostrich stomachs make their swords their meat. Claudian.

Modern ostriches are divided into meek larks,
in comparison with those of the ancients. Arbuthnot.

- OTACOUS'TICK.* n. s. [ὠτα and σῆμα;
otacous'tick, Fr.] Otacus'tick, French.]

An instrument to facilitate hearing.

Not vouchsafing to see or hear any thing but by perspectives and otacus'ticks. Hemmond, Works, iv. 933.

In a here, which is very quick of hearing, it is supplied with a bony tube; which, as natural otacus'tick, is so directed backward, as to receive the smallest and most distant sound that comes behind her. Grav. Cornal.

Using some otacus'tick, and placing the mouth of it towards the sound. Smith on Old Age, p. 146.

- OTHER.* pron. [anther, Goth. osep, Sax.
other, Alem. autre, French; ἄλλος, ἄλλος, Greek.]

1. Not the same; not this; different. In this sense it seems an adjective, yet in the plural, when the substantive is suppressed, it has, contrarily to the nature of adjectives, a plural termination: as,
of last week three days were fair, the others rainy.

Of good actions some are better than other some. Hook.

— Will it not be received
That they have done it? —
— Who dares receive it other? Shaksp. K. Lear.

The dismayed matrons and maidens, some in their houses, other some in the churches, with floods of tears and lamentable cries, poured forth their prayers to the Almighty, craving his help in that their hard distress. Kneller.

He that will not give just occasion to think, that all government in the world is the product only of force and violence, and that men live together by no other rules than that of beasts, where the strongest carries; and so lay a foundation for perpetual disorder and mischief, tumult, sedition, and rebellion; things that the followers of that hypothesis so loudly cry out against, must of necessity find out another state of government. Locke.

No leaves shall ever be made other than leaves for years not exceeding thirty-one, in possession, and not to reversion or remainder. Swift.

2. Not I, or he, but some one else: in this sense it is a substantive, and has a genitive and plural.

Were I king,
I should cut off the nobles for their lands;
Desire his jewels and this other's house. Shakespeare.

Physicians are some of them so conformable to the humour of the patient, as they press not the cure of the disease; and some other are so regular in proceeding according to art, as they respect out the condition of the patient. Bacon.

The confusion arises, when the one will put their sickle into the other's harvest. Leadb.

Never allow yourselves to be idle, whilst others are in want of any thing that your hands can make for them. Law.

The king had all he crav'd, or could compel.
And all was done — let others judge how well. David.

3. Not the one, not this, but the contrary.

There is that contrivance worth in goodness, that will cannot but like and desire it; and on the other side, that odious deformity in vice, that it never offers itself to the affections of mankind, but under the disguise of the other. South.

4. Correlative to each.
In loveliness of mind let each esteem other better than themselves. Phil. ii. 3.

Scotland and thou didst seek in other lives,
Nor would'st thou her, nor could she thee survive. Dryden.

5. Something besides.
The learning of Latin being nothing but the learning of words, just as much other real knowledge with it as you can. Locke on Education.

6. The next.
Thy air,
Thou other gold-bound brow, is like the first;
A third is like the former. Shakespeare, Macbeth.

7. The third part.
Bind my hair up, as 'twas yesterday?
No, nor the other day. R. Jonson.

8. It is sometimes put elliptically for other thing; something different.
I can expect no other from those that judge by single sights and rash measures, than to be thought fond or insensate. Glanville.

O'THERGATES. adv. [other and gate, for way.] In another manner.
If thy Toby had not been in drink, he would have tickled you *other*gate than he did. Shakespeare, Tw. Night.

O'THERGISE. adj. [other and guise. This is often pronounced and sometimes written otherguise.] Of another kind. It is a common expression in several parts of England; and in Cheshire forms part of the following proverb: "I have otherguise fish to fry than snigs [eels] without butter;" i. e. my time is better employed, I have something better to do than what you propose.

O'THERWHERE. adv. [other and where.] In other places.

As Jews they had access to the temple and synagogue, but as Christians they were of necessity forced otherwhere to assemble themselves. Hosker.

His godlike acts, and his temptations fierce,
And former sufferings, otherwhere are found. Milton.

O'THERWHILE. † adj. [other and while.] O'THERWHILES. } At other times.

Some adventures shall follow; and otherwhiles, now one discommodities, now another shall appear. Homilies, Sermon on Matrimony.

Sometimes he shaves, — otherwhiles he cauterizes, he scarifies, less blood. Milton, Reas. of Ch. Gov. B. 2.

Sometimes he was taken forth — to be set in the pillory, otherwhile in the stocks. Sir G. Buch, Hist. of Rich. III. p. 93.

O'THERWISE. adv. [other and wise.]

1. In a different manner.
They only plead, that whatever God reveals, as necessary for all Christian men to do and believe, the same we ought to embrace, whether we have received it by writing or otherwise, which no man denies. Hosker.

The whole church hath not tied the parts unto one and the same thing, they being therein left to each their own choice, may either do as others do, or else otherwise, without any breach of duty at all. Hosker.

The evidences for such things are not so infallible, but that there is a possibility, that the things may be otherwise. Wittins.

In these good things, what all others should practice, we should scarce know to practise otherwise. Symon.

Thy father was a worthy prince,
And merited, alas! a better fate;
But heaven thought otherwise. Addison, Cato.

2. By other causes.
Sir John Norris failed in the attempts of Lisbon, and returned with the loss, by sickness and otherwise, of eight thousand men. Relaph.

3. In other respects.
It is said truly, that the best men otherwise, are not always the best to regard of society. Hosker.

Men seldom consider God any otherwise than in relation to themselves, and therefore want some extraordinary benefits to excite their attention and engage their love. Hosker.

O'TTER. n. s. [otter, Saxon; intra, Latin.] An amphibious animal that preys upon fish.

The toes of the otter's hinder feet, for the better swimming, are joined together with a membrane, as in the beaver; from which he differs principally in his teeth, which are canin; and in his tail, which is felin, or a long taper; so that he may not be unfitly called putorius aquaticus, or the water pole-cat. He makes himself burrows on the water side, as a beaver; is sometimes tamed and taught, by nimbly surrounding the fishes, to drive them into the net. Grew.

At the lower end of the hall is a large otter's skin stuffed with hay. Addison, Spect.

Would you preserve a numerous finny race?
Let your fierce dogs the ravenous otter chase;
The amphibious monster ranges all the shores,
Darts through the waves, and every haunt ex- plores. Gay.

O'VAL. adj. [ovale, Fr. ovum, an egg.] Oblong; resembling the longitudinal section of an egg.

The mouth is low and narrow, but, after having entered pretty far in the grotto, opens itself on both sides in an oval figure of an hundred yards. Addison on Italy.

Mercurius, nearest to the central sun,
Does in an oval orbit, circling run;
But rarely is the object of our sight,
In solar glory sunk. Blackmore.

O'VAL. n. s.
A triangle is that which has three angles, or an oval is that which has the shape of an egg. Watts, Logic.

O'VA'RIOUS. adj. [from ovum.] Consisting of eggs.

He to the rocks
Dire clinging gubbers his voracious food. Thomson.

O'VARY. n. s. [ovaire, Fr. ovarium, Lat.] The part of the body in which impregnation is performed.

The ovary or part where the white involveth it, is to the second region of the matrix, which is somewhat long and inverted. Brown, Vulg. Err.

O'VATE. adj. [ovatus, Lat.] Of an oval figure; marked ovally.

Two rows on each side of the belly consist of larger scales, acute and imbricate. Russell, Acc. of Indian Serpents, p. 7.

O'VATION. † n. s. [ovation, Fr. ovatio, Lat.] A lesser triumph among the Romans allowed to those commanders who had won a victory without much bloodshed, or defeated some less formidable enemy. Dict.

His ovation being the prime of his strength; his noise and report of his victories being the only means to persuade the reader that he hath obtained them. Hammond, Works, ii. 167.

Question was allow'd
For conquest purchas'd without blood. Hudibras, ii. ii.

Rest not in an ovation, but a triumph over thy passions. Brown, Chr. Mor. i. 2.

O'UBAT. } n. s. [cruca pilosa.] A sort of caterpillar; an insect. Dict.

OUCH. † n. s. [musca, nuda, lo Latin, fibula; whence perhaps ouch, or houch, and so ouch. Tyrrhuit.] An ornament of gold or jewels; a carcanet; the collet in which precious stones are set.

Dr. Johnson has cited an example from Bacon, in which the word is oes, not ouch. See O.

A Persian snipe on her head
She wore, with crowns and ouches garnished. Spranger, F. Q. ii. li. 13.

Thou shalt make them to be set in ouches of gold. Ezek. xxxvii. 11.

OUCH of a bear. The blow given by a bear's tusk. Ainsworth.

O'YEN. † n. s. [aufn, Goth. ofn, Icel. ojen, Sax. "Aphah (Heb.) signifieth to bake, and to sear, and to dress meat: oven seemeth to be derived of this word." Leigh, Crit. Sacra. 1650. p. 15.] An arched cavity heated with fire to bake bread.

He loudly bray'd, that like was never
And from his head devouring oven vent
A flake of fire, that flashing in his beard,
Him all smot d. Spranger.

Here's yet to the world heretofore, the kneading, the making of the cake, the heat of the oven, and the baking. Shakespeare.

Bats have been found in ovens and other hollow close places, matted upon another; and there- fore a 2

- fore it is likely that they sleep in the winter, and eat nothing. Bacon.
- O'vna hath a double signification in the names of places, according to the different situations of them. If the place be upon or near a river, it comes from the Saxon ovepa, a brink or bank; but if there is in the neighbourhood another of the same name, distinguished by the addition of nether, then over is from the Gothick ufar, above. Gibson's Camden.
- OVER. prep. [ufar, Gothick; ovep, Sax.]
1. Above; with respect to excellence or dignity.
How happy some, o'er other some can be!
Through Athens I am thought as fair as she. Shakespeare.
Young Pallas shone conspicuous o'er the rest;
Gilded his arms, embroider'd was his vest. Dryden.
High, over all, was your great conduct shewn,
You sought our safety, but forgot your own. Dryden.
The commentary which attends this poem will have an advantage over most commentaries, that it is not made upon conjectures. Pepr.
It will afford food enough for a divine to enlarge on, by shewing the advantages which the Christian world has over the heathen. Swift.
  2. Above, with regard to rule or authority. Opposed to under.
The church has over her bishops, able to silence the factious, no less by their preaching than by their authority.
Captain, yourself are the fittest to live and reign over, but next and immediately under the people. Dryden.
  3. Above in place. Opposed to below.
He was more than over shoes in love. Shakespeare.
The street should see as she walked over head. Shakespeare.
Thrice happy is that humble pair,
Beneath the level of all care;
Over whose heads those arrows fly,
Of sad distrust and jealousy. Wallis.
  4. Across; from side to side: as, he leaped over the brook.
Come o'er the brook, Bessy, to me.
She darts not come over to thee. Shakespeare.
Certain lakes and pits, such as that of Arrenon, poison birds which fly over them. Bacon, Nat. Hist.
The geese fly o'er the barn, the bees in arms Drive headlong from their waxen cells in swarms. Dryden.
  5. Through, diffusively.
All the world over, those that received not the commands of Christ, and his doctrines of purity and perseverance, were signally destroyed. Hammond.
  6. Upon.
Wise governors have as great a watch over famines, as they have of the actions and designs. Bacon.
Angelick quires
Sung heavenly anthems of his victory
Over temptation and the tempter proud. Milton, P. R.
  7. Before. This is only used in over night.
On their intended journey to proceed,
And over night whatso there did need. Spenser, Nidd. Tale.
  8. It is in all senses written by contraction o'er.
- O'VER. adv.
1. Above the top.
Give, and it shall be given unto you; good measures, pressed down, and shaken together, and running over, shall men give. St. Luke, vi. 38.

2. More than a quantity assigned.
Even here likewise the laws of nature and reason be of necessary use; yet somewhat over and beyond them is necessary, namely human and positive law. Hooker.
When they had mete it, he that gathered much had nothing over, and he that gathered little had no lack. Ex. xvi. 18.
The ordinary soldiers having all their pay, and a month's pay over, were sent into their countries. Heywood.
The eastern people determined their digit by the breadth of barley-corns, six making a digit, and twenty-four a hand's breadth; a small matter over or under. Arbuthnot.
3. From side to side.
The fan of an Indian king, made of the feathers of a paracock's tail, composed into a round form, bound altogether with a circular rim, shew a foot over. Green.
4. From one to another.
This golden cluster the herald delivereth to the Tiran, who delivereth it over to that one that he has chosen. Bacon.
5. From a country beyond the sea.
It hath a white berry, but it is not brought over with the coral. Bacon, Nat. Hist.
They brought new customs and new wices o'er;
Taught us more arts than honest men require. Philips.
6. On the surface.
The first came out red all over, like an hairy garment. Gretna.
7. Past. This is rather the sense of an adjective.
Soliman pining upon the matter, the heat of his fury being something over, suffered himself to be interested. Kneller.
Meditate upon the effects of anger; and the best time to do this, is to look back upon anger when the fit is over. Bacon.
To what the garden choicest bears
To sit and taste, till this meridian heat
Be over, and the sun more cool decline. Milton.
The act of stealing was soon over, and cannot be undone, and for it the sinner is only answerable to God or his vicegerent.
Rp. Taylor, Rule of Living Holy.
He will, as soon as his first surprise is over, begin to wonder how such a favour came to be bestowed on him. Attewbury.
There youths and nymphs in consort gay,
Shall hail the rising, close the parting day;
With me, alas! wait me those joys are o'er,
For me the vernal garlands bloom no more. Page.
8. Throughout; completely.
Well,
Have you read o'er the letters I sent you? Shakespeare.
Let them argue over all the topics of divine goodness and human weakness, yet how trifling must be their plea! South, Sermon.
With repetition; another time.
He o'er and o'er divides him,
'Twixt his unkindness and his kindness. Shakespeare.
Sitting or standing still confid' to roar,
In the same verse, the same rules o'er and o'er.
Longing they look, and gazing at the sight,
Devour o'er and o'er with vast delight. Dryden.
Those, my Hector, art thyself alone,
My parents, brothers, and my love in one:
O kill not all my kindred o'er again,
Nor tempt the dangers of the dusky plain;
But in this tower, for our defence, remain. Dryden.
When children forget, or do an action awkwardly, make them do it over and over again, till they are perfect.
If this miracle of Christ's rising from the dead be not sufficient to convince a resolute libertine, neither would the rising of one now from the - dead be sufficient for that purpose; since it would only be the doing that over again which hath been done already. Attewbury.

The most learned will never find occasion to act over again what is fabled of Alexander the Great, that when he had conquered the eastern world, he wept for want of more worlds to conquer. Watts.
He cramm'd his pockets with the precious store,
And every night review'd it o'er and o'er. Harte.
10. Extraordinary; in a great degree.
The word symbol should not seem to be over difficult. Maher.
  11. OVER and above. Besides; beyond what was first supposed or immediately intended.
Moses took the redemption money of them that were over and above. Numb. iii. 49.
He gathered a great mass of treasure, and gained over and above the good will and esteem of all people whosoever he came. L'Esperance.
  12. OVER against. Opposite; regarding in front.
In Titicums is a church with windows only from above. It repoveth the voice thirteen times, if you stand by the close end of the wall, over against the door. Bacon.
I visit his picture, and place myself over against it whole hours together. Addison, Spectator.
Over against that church stands a large hospital, erected by a shoemaker. Addison on Italy.
  13. To give over. To cease from.
These when they praise, the world believes no more,
Than when they promise to give scribbling o'er. Page.
  14. To give over. To attempt to help no longer; as, his physicians have given him over; his friends, who advised him, have given him over.
  15. In composition it has a great variety of significations; it is arbitrarily prefixed to nouns, adjectives, or other parts of speech in a sense equivalent to more than enough; too much.
By many of these trains hath sought to win me into his power; and modest wisdom plucks me From overcredulous haste. Shakespeare, Macbeth.
St. Hierom reported, that he saw a satyr; but the truth hereof I will not readily impinge, or *over*bidly affirm.
Those *over*easy spirits, whose labour is their only reward, find a shadow and chase the wind. Decay of Chr. Piety.
If the ferment of the breast be vigorous, an overfermentation in the part produces a phlegmon. Wicram.
A gangrene doth arise in phlegmons, through the unreasonable application of *over*cold medicaments. Wicram.
Poets, like lovers, should be bold and dare,
They spoil their business with an *over*care;
And he who servilely creeps after excellence,
Is safe, but ne'er will reach an excellence. Dryden.
Wretched man *o'er*cheats
His cramm'd desires with more than nature needs. Dryden.
Bending o'er the cup, the tears she shed,
Scorn'd by the posture in discharge her blood.
*O'er*kill'd before. Dryden.
As they are likely to *over*fulfill their own case, their flattery is hardest to be discovered: for who would imagine himself guilty of putting tricks upon himself? Collier.
He has afforded us only the twilight of probability; suitable to that state of mediocrity he has placed us in here; wherein, to check our *over*confidence and presumption, we might, by every day's experience, be made sensible of our shortightedness. Locke.

This part of grammar has been much neglected, so some others overdiligently cultivated. It is easy for men to write one after another, of cases and genders. Locke.

It is as ill way of establishing this truth, and silencing atheists, to take a man's having that idea of God to his mind, for the only proof of a deity; and out of an overfondness of that darling invention, cashier all other arguments. Locke.

A grown person surfeited with honey, no sooner hears the name of it, but his fancy immediately carries sickness and qualms to his stomach: had this happened to him by an overdose of honey, when a child, all the same effects would have followed, but the cause would have been mistaken, and the antipathy counted natural. Watts.

Take care you overburn not the turf; it is only to be burnt so as may make it break. Mortimer. Don't overfascinate the spirit, lest the mind be seized with a lethargy, and thereby nauseate and grow tired of a particular subject. Watts.

The memory of the learner should not be too much crowded with a tumultuous heap of ideas; one idea affects another. An overgreedy grasp does not retain the largest handful. Watts.

OVER.* adj. Upper. So overleather is upper leather. See OVERLEATHER.

Her over lippe wiped sea no clem.

To that her cuppe was so ferving one a hatching
Of grease, when she drooken had her draught. Chaucer, C. T. Prod.

For these my hands from this my face shall rip,
Even with this knife, my nose and over lip. Mr. For Mag. p. 237.

TO OVER.* v. a. To get over; to get through: an elliptical expression in the north: as, I am afraid he'll not over it, i. e. will not recover from his illness. Pegee.

TO OVERABOUND.* v. n. [over and abound.]
To abound more than enough.

Both inhibit
Fitting congenial juice, so rich the soil,
So much does fruitful moisture overabound. Philips.

The learned, never overabounding in transitory coin, should not be disconcerted. Pope, Lett.

TO OVERACT.* v. a. [over and act.]
To act more than enough.

Prices courts may overact their reverence, and make themselves laughed at by their foolishness and extravagant relative worship. Shillingfleet.

Good mee often blenish the reputation of their piety, by overacting some things in religion; by an indolent seal about things whereby religion is not concerned. Tillotson.

He overacted his part; his passions, when once let loose, were too impetuous to be managed. Atterbury.

TO OVERACT.* v. n. To act more than is requisite.

You overact, when you should underdo;

A little call yourself again, and think. B. Jonson.

There while they acted and overacted, among other young scholars, I was a spectator; they thought themselves gallant men, and I thought them fools; they made sport, and I laughed. Milton, Apol. for Smectymnarus.

TO OVERAGITATE.* v. a. [over and agitate.]
To discuss or controvert too much.

What is fit to be determined in a business so overagitated, I shall abstain in these propositions. Dr. Hall, Cases of Consc. D. 3. C. 7.

TO OVERARCH.* v. a. [over and arch.]
To cover with an arch.

Where high Ithaca overlooks the floods,
Brown with overarching shades and pendent woods. Pope.

TO OVERAWE.* v. a. [over and awe.]
To keep in awe by superior influence.

The king was present in person to overlook the magistrates, and to overawe these subjects with the terror of his sword. Smyser on Ireland.

Her graceful innocence, her every air
Of gesture, or least action, overaw'd
His malice. Milnes, P. L.

I could be content to be your chief tormentor, ever paying you mock reverence, and sounding to your ears the empty title which inspired you with presumption, and overaw'd my daughter to comply. Addison, Guardian.

A thousand fears Still overawe when she appears. Greenville.

TO OVERBALANCE.* v. a. To weigh down; to preponderate.

Not doubting but by the weight of reason I should counterpoise the overbalancing of my factions. King Charles.

The hundred thousand pounds per annum, whereby we overbalance them in trade, must be paid us in money. Locke.

When these important considerations are set before a national being, acknowledging the truth of every article, should a large single possibility be of weight enough to overbalance them? Rogers.

OVERBALANCE.* n. s. [over and balance.]
Something more than equivalent.

Our exported commodities would, by the return, overbalance the treasure of this kingdom above what it can ever be by other means, than a mighty overbalance of our exported to our imported commodities. Temple.

The mind should be kept in a perfect indifference, not looting to either side, any further than the overbalance of probability gives it the turn of emot and belief. Locke.

OVERBATTE.* adj. [Of this word I know not the derivation; batten is to grow fat, and to battle, is at Oxford to feed on trust. Dr. Johnson.—The explanation and etymology may be referred to the verb battle, and to the adjective battled; which see, in the present dictionary.]
Too fruitful; exuberant.

In the church of God sometimes it cometh to pass, as in overbattled grounds; the fertile disposition thereof is good, yet because it excoedeth due proportion, it brings about sterility, through too much rankness, things less profitable, whereby that which principally it should yield, either prevented in place or defrauded of nourishment, faileth. Hobbes.

TO OVERBEAR.* v. a. [over and bear.]
To repress; to subdue; to whelm; to bear down.

What more savage than man, if he see himself able by fraud to over-reach, or by power to over-bear the laws? Hooker.

My desire
All counterfeit impediments would overbear,
That did oppose my will. Shakespeare, Mebeth.

The comon over-weening of his list,
Esteem not the date with more impetuous haste
Than young Laertes, in a riotous head,
Overbears your officers. Shakespeare.

Our counsel, it pleas'd thy highness
To overbear. Shakespeare, A. John.

Glo'riest, thou shalt well perceive,
That now in birth or for authority,
The bishop will be overborne by thee. Shakespeare.

The Turkish commanders, with all their forces, assailed the city, thrusting their men into the breaches by ladders, as if they would, with very multitudes, have discouraged or overborn the Christians. Knox.

The point of reputation, when news first came of the battle lost, did overbear the reason of war. Bacon.

Yet fortune, valour, all is overborn,
By numbers; as the long resisting bank
By the impetuous torrent. Denham.

A body may as well be overborn by the violence of a shallow, rapid stream, as swallowed up in the gulph of ungodly wealth. L'Estrange.

Crowding on the last the first impulse;
Till overborn with weight the Cyprians fell. Dryden.

The judgement, if swayed by the overbearing of passion, and stored with tedious opinions, instead of clearly conceived truths, will be erroneous. Glanville, Scopia.

Take care that the memory of the learner be not too much crowded with a tumultuous heap of too numerous multitude of documents at one time. Watts.

The honour or lowness of an object may overbear the pleasure which results from its greatness, novelty, or beauty. Addison, Spect.

TO OVERBEND.* v. a. [over and bend.]
To stretch too intensely.

Consumptions, upon intemperance and licentiousness; madness, upon misapplying or overbending our natural faculties; proceed from ourselves. Donne, Devot. p. 290.

TO OVERBID.* v. a. [over and bid.]
To offer more than equivalent.

You have overbid all my past sufferings.

And all my future too. Dryden, Jason. Friar.

TO OVERBLOW.* v. n. [over and blow.]
To be past its violence.

Led with delight, they thus beguile the way,
Until the blustering storm is overblown. Smyser.
All those tempests being overblown, three long after arose a new storm which overran all Spain. Smyser.

This acute fit of fear is overblown,
As easy task it is to win our own. Shakespeare, Rich. II.

Sea's wind with secret joy, Dryden, Virg.

When storms are overblown.

TO OVERBLOW.* v. a. [over and blow.]
To drive away as clouds before the wind.

Some angel that beholds her there,
Instruct us to record what she was here;
And when this cloud of sorrow's overblown,
Through the wide world we'll make her graces known. Waller.

OVERBOARD. adv. [over and board. See BOARD.]
Off the ship; out of the ship.

The great assembly met again; and now he that was the cause of the tempest being thrown overboard, there were hopes a calm should ensue. Huxell.

A merchant having a vessel richly freighted at sea to a storm, there is but one certain way to save it, which is, by throwing its rich lading overboard. South.

The trembling dotard to the deck he drew,
And hoisted up and overboard he threw;
This done, he seized the helm. Dryden.

He obtained liberty to give them only one song before he leaped overboard, which he did, and then plunged into the sea. L'Estrange.

Though great ships were commonly had on board, they had a superior force in a sea engagement: the shock of them being sometimes so violent, that it would throw the crew on the upper deck of lesser ships overboard. Arbutnot.

TO OVERBOW.* v. a. [over and bow.]
To throw over.

Strange shades overbow the valleys deep. Cole, Ode 4.

OVERBUILD.* part. adj. [over and build.]
Built over.

On either side
Disrupted Chaos overbuilt exclaim'd. Milton, P. L.

To OVERBURLE. v. a. [over and bulk.] To oppress by bulk.

The feeding pride,
To rank Achilles, must or now be cropt,
Or shedding, breed a nursery of like evils,
To overbulk us all. Shakespeare, Troil. and Cress.

To OVERBURTHEN. v. a. [over and burthen.] To load with too great weight.

If she were not cloyed with his company, and that she thought not the earth overburdened with him, she would cool his fiery grief. Shakespeare, Silvery.

To OVERBUY. v. a. [over and buy.] To buy too dear.

He overbought it upon the false pretence of an appendant commodity.

Bp. Hall, Cases of Conscience, D. i. C. 5.
He, when want requires, is only wise,
Who slight not foreign aids, not overbuy;
But on our native strength, in time of need, relies. Dryden.

To OVERCANOPY. v. a. [over and canopy.] To cover as with a canopy.

A bank —
Quite overcanopied with luscious woodbine. Shakespeare, Midw. N. Dream.

Where'er the rude and moss-grown beech Overcanopies the glade. Gray.

To OVERCARRY. v. a. [over and carry.] To hurry too far: to be urged to any thing violent or dangerous.

He was the king's uncle, but yet of no capacity to succeed; by reason whereof his natural affection and duty was less easy to be overcarried by ambition. Heyward.

To OVERCAST. v. a. part. overcast. [over and cast.]

1. To cloud; to darken; to cover with gloom.

As they pass,
The day with clouds was sudden overcast. Spenser.
Hie, Robin, overcast the night;
The starry welkin in cover thou anon,
With drooping fogs, as black as Achuron. Shakespeare.

Our days of age are sad and overcast, in which we find that of all our vain passions, and affections past, the sorrow only abideth. Raleigh, Hist. of the World.

I of fumes and humid vapours made,
No cloud in so serene a mansion find,
To overcast her ever shining mind. Waller.

Those clouds that overcast our morn shall fly,
Dispell'd to farthest corners of the sky. Dryden.
The dawn is overcast, the morning lours,
And heavily in clouds brings on the day. Adams.

2. To cover. This sense is hardly retained but by needle-women, who call that which is encircled with a thread, overcast.

When malice would work that which is evil, and in working add the suspicion of an evil intent, the colour wherewith it overcasts itself is always a fair and plausible pretence of seeking to further that which is good. Hosier.

Their arms abroad with gray morn overcast,
And their green leaves trembling with every blast. Spenser.

3. To raise too high in computation. The king in his account of peace and calms, did much overcast his fortunes, which proved full of broken seas, tides, and tempests. Bacon, Hist. VII.

To OVERCHARGE. v. a. [over and charge.]

1. To oppress; to cloy; to surcharge.

On air we feed in every instant, and on meats but at times; and yet the heavy load of abundance, wherewith we oppress and overcharge nature, maketh her to sink unawares in the mid-way. Raleigh, Hist. of the World.

A man may as well expect to grow stronger by always eating, as wiser by always reading. Too much overcharges nature, and turns more into disease than nourishment. Collier.

2. To load; to crowd too much.

Our language is overcharged with consonants. Pope.

3. To burthen.

He whispers to his pillow,
The secrets of his overcharged soul. Shakespeare.

Here's Glo'ster, a foe to citizens,
Overcharging your free purses with large fines. Shakespeare.

5. To fill too full.

Her heart is but overcharg'd; she will recover. Shakespeare.

The fumes of passion do as really intoxicate, and confound the judging and discerning faculty, as the fumes of drink discompose and stupefy the brain of a man overcharged with it. Smith.

If they would make distinct abstract ideas of all the varieties in human actions, the number must be infinite, and the memory overcharged to little purpose. Locke.

The action of the Iliad and Æneid, in themselves exceeding short, are so beautifully extended by the invention of episodes, that they make up an agreeable story sufficient to employ the memory without overcharging it. Adams, Spec.

6. To load with too great a charge.

They were
As cannons overcharg'd with double cracker. Shakespeare.

Like guns overcharg'd, he breaks, misses, or recoils. Locke.

To OVERCLIMB. v. a. [over and climb.] To climb over.

The fatal gins thus overclimb our walls,
Stuff with arm'd men. Ld. Surrey, Tr. of Virg. Æn. 4.

The childhood of the cheerful morn
Is almost gone a youth, and overclimb
Yonder gilt eastern hills. Brewer, Com. of Lingua.

To OVERCLOUD. v. a. [over and cloud.] To cover with clouds.

The labour of wicked men is to turn blessing itself into a curse, to overcloud joy with sorrow at least, if not desolation. Alph. Laud, Serm. p. 84.

The silver empress of the night,
Overclouded, glimmers in a fainter light. Tickell.

To OVERCLOY. v. a. [over and cloy.] To fill beyond satiety.

A seam of Britons and base lucky peasants,
Whom their overcloyed country vomits forth
To desperate adventures and destruction. Shelley.

To OVERCOME. v. a. pret. I overcame part. pass. overcome; anciently overcome, as in Spenser. [overcomen, Dutch.]

1. To subdue; to conquer; to vanquish.

Their, overcomen, were deprived
Of their proud beauty, and the one moiety Transform'd to fish, for their lethal surqudry. Spenser.

This wretched woman, overcome
Of anguish, rather than of crime, hath been.

Of whom a man is overcome, of the same is he brought in bondage. 2 Pet. ii. 13.

Fire by thicker air overcome,
And downward forc'd in earth's capacious womb,
Alters its particles; is fire no more. Prior.

2. To surmount.

Misrads is a constant relief to poor people in their misfortunes and accidents; there are sometimes little misfortunes that happen to them, of which themselves they could never be able to overcome. Law.

3. To overflow; to surge.

The unflow'd of glory
Yearly overcomes the granaries with stores. Philips.

4. To come over upon; to invade suddenly. Not in use.

Can such things be,
And overcome us like a summer's cloud,
Without our special wonder? Shakespeare, Macbeth.

To OVERCOME. v. n. To gain the superiority.

That thou mightest be justified in thy sayings,
and mightest overcome when thou art judged. Rom. iii. 4.

OVERCOMER. † n. s. [from the verb.] He who overcomes.

Great rewards and rich gifts were appointed for the overcomer. Powell, Hist. of Wales, (1584.) p. 237.

Thou know'st how much
We do overcount thee. Shakespeare, Ant. & Cleop.

To OVERCOVER. v. a. [over and cover.] To cover completely.

Shut me nightly in a charnel-house,
Overcover of quite with dead men's rattling bones,
With reeky shanks and yellow chapless skulls. Shakespeare.

To OVERCROW. v. a. [over and crow.] To crow as in triumph. Spenser has also written overcraw, for the sake of the rhyme.

So spake this bold breasted with great disdain:
Little him answer'd the oak again,
But yielded, with shame and grief adaw'd,
That of a weed he was overcrown'd. Spenser, Shep. Cal. Feb.

A base varlet, that being but of late grown out of the dunghill, legitimizeth now to overcrow so high mountains, and make himself the great protector of all outlaws. Spenser.

Shall I, the embassadors of gods and men, —
Be overcrow'd, and breathe without revenge? Brewer, Com. of Lingua.

To OVERDATE. v. a. [over and date.] To reckon or date beyond the proper period.

Had he redeemed his overdated minority from a papulage under bishops, he would much less have mistrusted his parliament. Milton, Econoclast. ch. 11.

TO OVEREAT.* v. a. [over and eat.]

1. To superintend. My love hath lasted from mine infancy, And still increased, as I grew myself : When did Pereda pasture in the streets, But her Erasmus overeat'd her sports ? When didst thou, with thy sampler, in the sun, Sit sewing with thy ferys, but I was by, Marking thy lily hand's dexterity ?

Trag. of Solomon and Pereda, (1599.)

2. TO OBSERVE : to remark. I am doubtful of your modesties, Lost overseeing of his odd behaviour, You break into some merry passion. Shakespeare.

TO OVEREMPTY.* v. a. [over and empty.] To make too empty.

The women would be loth to come behind the fashion in new-fangledness of the manner, if not in continence of the matter, which might overempty their husbands' purses.

Cervantes.

OVERFALL.* n. s. [over and fall.] Cataract. Tonsils added, that those which dwell near those falls of water, are deaf from their infirmity, like those that dwell near the overflow of Nilus.

Raleigh, Hist. of the World.

TO OVERFLOW.* v. a. [over and flow.]

To cover as with water. The sown is fill'd with slaughter, and overfloweth, With a red deluge, their increasing moats. Dryden. TO OVERFLOW.* v. n. [over and flow.]

1. To be fuller than the brim can hold. While our strong walls secure us from the foe, Ere yet with blood our ditches overflow. Dryden. Had I the same consciousness that I saw Noah's flood, as that I saw the overflowing of the Thames last winter, I could not doubt, that I who saw the Thames overflowed, and viewed the flood at the general deluge, was the same self. Locke.

2. To exuberate; to abound. A very ungrateful return to the Author of all we enjoy, but such as an overflowing plenty too much inclines me to make. Rogers.

TO OVERFLOW.* v. a. The participle overflowing is, among the examples, used, we see, by such excellent writers as Swift and Bentley; yet flow is not the participle of flow, but of fly.

1. To fill beyond the brim. Suppose thyself as great a sadon as ever did load thy spirit, wouldst thou not be it cheerfully if thou wert sure that some excellent fortune would relieve and recompense thee so as to overflow all thy hopes ?

By Taylor.

New milk that all the winter never fails, And all the summer overflows the pails. Dryden.

2. To deluge; to drown; to overrun; to overpower.

The Scythians, at such time as the northern nations overflowed all Christendom, came down to the sea-coast. Spenser.

Clanlus overflow'd th' unhappy coast. Dryden. Not the Nile and the Niger make yearly inundations in our days, as they have formerly done ? and are not the countries so overflowing, still situate between the tropicks ?

Bentley.

Sixteen hundred and odd years after the earth was made, it was overflowed and destroyed in a deluge of water that overflowed the face of the whole earth, from pole to pole, and from east to west.

Burnet.

Thus oft by mariners are shewn, Earl Godwin's castles overflow. Swift. OVERFLOW.* n. s. Inundation; more than fulness; such a quantity as runs over; exuberance.

Did he break out into tears ? —

In great measure. —

— A kind overflow of kindness. Shakespeare. Where there are great overflows in the sea, the drowning of them in winter maketh the summer following more fruitful; for that it keepeth the ground warm. Bacon, Nat. Hist.

It requires pains to find the coherence of abstract writings; so that it is not to be wondered, that St. Paul's epistles have, with many, passed for disjointed pious discourses, full of warmth and zeal and overflows of light, rather than for calm, strong, coherent reasoning all through. Locke.

After every overflow of the Nile there was not always a tempestuous. Aristotle on Confusion. The expression may be ascribed to an overflow of gratitude in the general disposition of Ulysses. Browne.

OVERFLOWING.* n. s. [from overflow.] Exuberance; copiousness.

With ruder terms; such as my wit affords,
And overjoy of heart doth minister. Shakespeare, Hen. VI.

TO OVERLA'BOUR. v. a. [over and labour.]
To take too much pains on any thing; to harass with toil.

She without noise will over-see
His children and his family;
And order all things till he come,
Sweaty and overburden'd, home. Dryden.

TO OVERLA'DE. v. a. [over and laide.]
To overburthen.

Thus to throng and overlade a soul
With love, and then to have a room for fear,
What is it but to rear

Our passions and our hopes on high,
That thence they may decay
The noblest way how to despair and die? Suckling.

OVERLA'RGED. adj. [over and large.] Larger than enough.

Our attainments cannot be overlarged, and yet we manage a narrow fortune very unskillfully. Cadell.

TO OVERLA'SH. v. n. [over and lash.]
To exaggerate. Dr. Johnson calls over-lashingly a mean word, not aware that Barrow had used overlash.

We are not over-lashingly every hyperbolic flash or flourish occurring in the fathers; it being well known that they, in their encomiastic speeches, as orators are wont, following the heat and gaiety of fancy, do sometimes overlash.

Barrow, on the Pope's Supr. iv. § 2.

OVERLA'SHINGLY. adv. [over and lash.]
With exaggeration. A mean word, now obsolete.

Although I be far from their opinion who write too over-lashingly, that the Arabian tongue is in use in two-thirds part of the inhabited world, yet I find that it extendeth where the religion of Mahomet is professed. Breuerod.

TO OVERLAY. v. a. [over and lay.]
1. To oppress by too much weight or power.

Some commons are barren, the nature is such, And some overlaid the commons too much. Tassier.

Not only that mercy which keeps from being overlaid and over-weighed, but every speech saved from being touched with grievous injuries. Hosker.

When any country is overlaid by the multitude which live upon it, there is a natural necessity compelling it to disburthen itself, and lay the load upon the other. Baldig.

We praise the things we hear with much more willingness than those we see; because we envy the present, and reverence the past; thinking ourselves instructed by the one, and overlaid by the other. B. Jonson.

Good laws had been antiquated by the course of time, or overlaid by the corruption of manners. King Charles.

Our sins have overlaid our hopes. King Charles.

The strong Euterpius came in Arcite's aid,
And Palamon with odds was overlaid. Dryden.

2. To smother with too much or too close covering.

The new-born babes by nurses overlaid. Dryden.

3. To smother; to crush; to overwhelm.

They quickly stifled and overlaid those infant principles of piety and virtue, sown by God in their hearts; so that they brought a voluntary darkness and stupidity upon their minds. South, Sermon.

The gods have made your noble mind for me,
And her inspired soul for Ptolemy;
A heavy load of earth without desire,
A heap of ashes that o'erleaps your fire. Dryden.

The stars, no longer overlaid with weight,
Exert their heads from underneath the mass,
And upward shoot. Dryden.

Some of the passions of a child with devotion, which seldom dies; though it may seem extinguished for a while, it breaks out as soon as misfortunes have brought the man to himself. The fire may be covered and overlaid, but cannot be entirely quenched and smothered. Addison, Iphig.

In preaching, no men succeed better than those who trust to the fund of their own reason, advanced but not overlaid by commerce with books. South.

4. To cloud; to overcast.

Phœbus' golden face it did attainst,
As when a cloud his beams doth overlay. Spenser.

Some habit, that too much overleavens
The form of plausible manners. Shakespeare, Hamlet.

OVERLIGHT. n. s. [over and light.] Too strong light.

An overlight maketh the eyes dark, inasmuch as perpetual looking against the sun would cause blindness. Bacon.

TO OVERLIVE. v. a. [over and live.] To live longer than another; to survive; to outlive.

Murderous, who shew'd a mind not to overlive Pyrrhus, prevailed. Sidney.

He concludes in hearty prayers,
That your attempts may overlive the hazard
And fearful meeting of their opposite. Shakespeare.
They overlived that envy, and had their pardons afterwards. Hayward.

TO OVERLIVE. v. n. To live too long.

Why do I overlive?
Why am I mock'd with death, and lengthen'd out
To deathless pain? Milton, P. L.

OVERLIVE. n. s. [from overlive.] Survivor; that which lives longest.

A peace was concluded, to continue for both the kings' lives, and the overlive of them. Bacon, Hen. VII.

TO OVERLOAD. v. a. [over and load.] To burthen with too much.

The memory of youth is charg'd and overload- ed, and all they leave, never jargon. Felton.
Men overload with a large estate
May still their treasure in a nice conceit;
The rich may be polite, but, oh! 'tis said,
To say you're curious, when we swear you're mad. Young.

OVERLOAD. adj. [over and long.] Too long.

I have transgressed the laws of syntax, in making my periods and parentheses overlong. [Boyle.]

TO OVERLOOK. v. a. [over and look.] 1. To view from a higher place.

The pila overlook'd the town, and drew the sight,
Surpris'd at once with reverence and delight. Dryden.

I will do it with the same respect to him, as if he were alive, and overlooking my paper while I write. Dryden.

2. To view fully; to peruse.
Would I had overlook'd the letter. Shakespeare.

3. To superintend; to over-see.
He was present in person to overlook the magistrates, and to oversee those subjects with the terror of his sword. Spenser.

In the greater out-purishes many of the poor parishioners through neglect, period, for want of some higher eye to overlook them. Grout.

4. To review.
The time and care that are required,
To overlook and file, and polish well,
Fright poets from that necessary toil. Boscomen.

5. To pass by indulgently.
This part of good-nature, which consists in the pardoning and overlooking of faults, is to be exercised only in doing ourselves justice in the ordinary commerce of life. Addison.

In vain do we hope that God will overlook such high contradiction of sinners, and pardon offences committed against the plain convictions of conscience. Rogers.

6. To neglect; to slight.
Of the two relations, Christ overlooked the moore, and denominated them solely from the more honourable. South.

To overlook the entertainment before him, and language for that which lies out of the way, is stupid and servile. Culver.

The suffrage of our poet laureat should not be overlooked. Addison.

Religious fear, when produced by just apprehensions of a divine power, naturally overlooks all human greatness that stands in competition with it, and extinguishes every other terror. Addison.

The happiest of mankind, overlooking those solid blessings which they already have, set their hearts upon somewhat they want. Atterbury.

They overlook truth in the judgments they pass on adversity and prosperity. The temptations that attend the former they can easily see, and dread at a distance; but they have no apprehensions of the dangerous consequences of the latter. Atterbury.

OVERLOOKER.† n. s. [over and look.] The original word signifies an overlooker, or one who stands higher than his fellows and overlooks them. Watts.

The Holy Ghost hath made you overseers, and watchmen over the flock of Christ.
Bp. of Chichester, Two Serms. (1576), E. 6.

God then is present, and his angel seeth there;
O wicked and damnd man, if thou contemnest such overlookers! Watson, Chr. Manual, (1576), I. i. b.

OVERLOOK. n. s. The same with orlop.
In extremity we carry our ordnance better than we were wont, because our nether overlooks are raised commonly from the water; to wit, between the lower part of the port and the sea. Raleigh.

TO OVERLOVE. * v. a. [over and love.]
To prize or value too much.

I cannot so overlove this issue of my own brain,
as to hold it worthy of your majesty's judicious eyes. Bp. Hall, Dedication.

OVERLINESS. * n. s. [from overly.] Carelessness; superficialness.

We lament the overliness of preaching; many ministers embracing themselves and their message by trite and impertinent discourses, without method. Waterhouse, Apol. for Leaven. (1655), p. 221.

OVERLY. * adj. [overplus, Saxon, negligently. This is also a Scottish adjective; and Dr. Jamieson, noticing it, observes that overly must have been formerly used in English, as Sommer mentions it in rendering the Saxon word. I will satisfy him, that it was a very common word; though Dr. Johnson has wholly overpassed it.] Careless; negligent;

inattentive; slight.

The courteous citizen made me to his feast,
With hollow words, and overly request. Bp. Hall, Sat. lib. 3.

Not fearing the frowns of that overly host, she thrusts herself into Simon's house to find Jesus. Bp. Hall, Contempt. B. 37.

TO OVERMASTER. v. a. [over and master.]
To subdue; to govern.

For your desire to know what is between us,
Overmaster it as you may. Shakespeare, Hamlet.
So sleeps a pilot, whose poor bark is preat
With many a merciless overmaster'ing wave. Cowley.

They are overmastered with a score of drunkards, the only solldery left about them, or else comply with all the rapines and violences. Milton on Education.

TO OVERMATCH. v. a. [over and match.]
To be too powerful; to conquer; to oppress by superior force.

I have seen a swan
With bootless labour swim against the tide,
And spend her strength with overmatching waves. Shakespeare.

Sir William Lucy, with me,
Set from our overmatch'd forces forth for aid. Shakespeare.

Assist, lest I, who erst Thought none my equal, now be overmatch'd. Milton, P. R.

How great soever our curiosity be, our excess is greater, and does not only overmatch, but sur-plant it. Decay of Chr. Folly.

He from that length of time dire urchens drew,
Of English overmatch'd, and Dutch too strong,
Who never fought three days but to pursue. Dryden.

It moves our wonder, that a foreign guest
Should overmatch the most, and match the best. Dryden.

OVERMATCH. n. s. [over and match.] One of superior powers; one not to be overcome.

Spain is no overmatch for England, by that which beareth all men; that is, experience, and reason. Bacon.

Eva was his overmatch, who self-deceiv'd
And rash, before-hand had no better weigh'd
The strength he was to cope with or his own. Milton, P. R.

In a little time there will scarce be a woman of quality in Great Britain, who would not be an overmatch for an Irish priest. Addison, Freeholder.

TO OVERMEASURE. * v. a. [over and measure.] To measure or estimate too largely.

An argument, fit for great and mighty princes to have in their hand, to the end, that neither by overmeasuring their forces they lose themselves in vain enterprises; nor, on the other side, by undervaluing them, descend to fearful and pusillanimous councils. Bacon, Ess. 29.

OVERMEASURE. n. s. [over and measure.]
Something given over the due measure.
To OVERMIX. v. a. [over and mix.]
To mix with too much.

Those things these parts o'er-ride, no joys shall know,
Or little pleasure overmix with woe. Crook.

O'VERMOST. adj. [over and most.] Highest;
over the rest in authority. Ainsworth.

OVERMICKLE.* adj. [over and mickle; Saxon, omeclicel.] Overmuch; a common word in the north of England.

OVERMODEST.* adj. [over and modest.]
Too bashful; too reserved.

It is the courtier's rule, that overmodest suitors seldom speed. Hales, Rem. p. 143.

OVERMUCH. adj. [over and much.]
Too much; more than enough.

It was the custom of those former ages, in their overmuch gratitude, to advance the first authors of any useful discovery among the number of their gaols. Milton.

An overmuch use of salt, besides that it occasions thirst and overmuch drinking, has other ill effects.
Locke.

OVERMUCH. adv. In too great a degree.
The fault which we find in them is, that they overmuch abridge the church of her power in those things. Whereupon they re-charge us, as if in these things we gave the church a liberty which hath no limits or bounds. Hosker.

Perhaps
I also erred, in overmuch admiring
What seem'd in thee so perfect, that I thought
No evil durst attempt thee. Milton, P. L.
Deject not thus overmuch thyself,
Who hast of sorrow thy full load besides. Milton, S. A.

OVERMUCH. n. s. More than enough.
By attributing overmuch to things
Less excellent, as thou thyself perceiv'st.

With respect to the blessings the world enjoys,
even good men may ascribe overmuch to themselves.
Greve.

OVERMUCHNESS. n. s. [from overmuch.]
Exuberance; superabundance. A word not used, nor elegant.

There are words that do as much raise a style, as others can depress it; superlatives and over- muchness amplifies. It may be also said, that never above a mean. W. Anson, Discourses.

To OVERMULTITUDE.* v. a. [over and multitude.] To exceed in number.

Nature would be surcharg'd with her own weight,
And strangled in her waste fertility;
The earth cumber'd, and the wing'd air dark'd with plumes, Milton, Comus.
The birds would overmultitude their lords.

OVERNIGHT. n. s. [Over and night.] This seems to be used by Shakespeare as a noun, but by Addison more properly, as I have before placed it, as a noun with a preposition. Night before bedtime.

If I had given you this at overnight,
She might have been o'er'n. Shakespeare.
Will confesses, that for half his life his head ached every morning with reading men overnight.
Addison.

To OVERNAME. v. a. [over and name.]
To name in a series.

Overname them; and as thou names them I will describe them. Shakespeare, Merch. of Ven.

To OVERNOISE.* v. a. [over and noise.]
To overpower by noise.

No tide of wine would drown your cares;
No mirth or music overnoise your fears. Cowley.
To OVEROFFICE. v. a. [over and office.]
To lord by virtue of an office.
This might be the pate of a politician which this man overoffices. Shakespeare, Hamlet.

OVEROFFICIOUS. adj. [over and official.]
Too busy; too importunate.

This is an overofficious truth, and is always at a man's heels; so that if he looks about him, he must take notice of it. Ciller on Reason.

To OVERPAINT.* v. a. [over and paint.]
To colour or describe too strongly.
Him whom no verse overpaints. A. Hill.

To OVERPASS. v. a. [over and pass.]
1. To cross.

I stood on a wide river's bank,
Which I must needs overpass,
When on a sudden Terribond appear'd,
Gave me his hand, and led me lightly o'er. Dryden.

What have my Scyllas and my Syrens done,
I stood on their overpass, and those they shun? Dryden.

2. To overlook; to pass with disregard.
The complaint about palms and hymns might as well be overpast without any answer, as if it were without any cause brought forth. Hosker.

I read the satire thou entitlest first,
And laid aside the rest, and overpast,
And swore, I thought the writer was accurate,
That his first satire had not been his last. Herrington.

Remember that Pellean conquerour,
A youth, how all the beauties of the east
He slightly view'd, and slightly overpast'd. Milton, P. R.

3. To omit in a reckoning.
Arithmetical progression demonstrates how fast mankind would increase, overpassing as miraculous, though indeed natural, that example of the Israelites, who were multiplied in two hundred and fifty years, from seventy to sixty thousand six men. Raleigh.

4. To omit; not to receive; not to comprise.
If the grace of him which saveth overpass some,
so that the prayer of the church for them be not received, this we may leave to the hidden judgements of righteousness. Hosker.

OVERPAST.* part. adj. [from overpast.]
Gone; past.

What canst thou swear by now? —
—By time to come. —
That thou hast wronged in the time overpast. Shakespeare.

To OVERPAY. v. a. [over and pay.] To reward beyond the price.

Take this purse of gold,
And let me buy your friendly help thus far,
Which I will overpay, and pay again,
When I have found it. Shakespeare.

You have yourself your kindness overpaid.
He ceases to oblige you can uphold. Dryden.

With thou with pleasure rest thy lover's strains,
And with one heavenly smile o'erpay his pains? Prior.

To OVERPEER. v. a. [over and peer.]
To overlook; to hover above. It is now out of use.

The ocean overpeering of his list,
Eats not the flats with more impetuous haste,
Than young Lactes, in a riotous head, O'beers your officers. Shakespeare, Hamlet.

Your arguings with poorly sail,
Do overpeer the petty traffickers,
That cut'n'y to them, do them reverence. Shaksp.

Moutatious error would be too highly heap'd,
For truth to overpeer. Shakespeare, Cincin.

Thus yields the cedar to the axe's edge.
Whose top branches overpeer'd Jove's spreading tree,
And break long shrubs from winter's powerful wind. Shakespeare.

They are invincible by reason of the overpeering mountains that back the one, and slender fortifications of the other to landward. Sandys, Journey.
To OVERPERCH. v. a. [over and perch.]
To fly over.

With love's light wings did I overperch these walls.

For story limits cannot hold true love. Shakespeare.
To OVERPICTURE.* v. a. [over and picture.] To exceed the representation or picture.

She did lie
In her pavilion, (cloth of gold, of tissue,) Shakespeare.
Overpicturing that Venus, where we see
The fancy's work nature.

O'VERPLUS. n. s. [over and plus.] Surplus;
what remains more than sufficient.

Some other sinners there are, from which that overplus of strength in persuasion doth arise. Hooker, Eccl. Pol. Pref.

A great deal too much of it was overplus, and the overplus remained still in the mortar. L'Estrange.

It would look like a fable to report, that this gentleman gives away all which is the overplus of a great fortune. Addison.

To OVERPLY.* v. a. [over and ply.] To employ too laboriously.

What supports me, dost thou ask?
The conscience, friend, to have lost them overply'd,
In liberty's defence. Milton, Sonnet.

To OVERPOISE. v. a. [over and poise.]
To outweigh.

Whether cripples who have lost their thighs will float; their lungs being able to waft up their bodies, which are in others overpoised by the hinder legs; we have not made experiment. Brown, Vulg. Err.

The scale
Overpois'd by darkness, lets the night prevail;
And day, that lengthen'd in the summer's height,
Shortens till winter, and is lost in night. Crook.

OVERPOISE. n. s. [from the verb.] Pre-ponderant weight.

Hercules, in his first and second book of odes, was still rising, but came not to his meridian till the third. After which his judgement was an overpoise to his imagination. He grew too cautious to be bold enough, for he descended in his fourth by slow degrees. Dryden.

Some overpoise of sway, by turns they share,
In peace the people, and the price in war. Dryd.

To OVERPOLISH.* v. a. [over and polish.]
To finish too nicely.

A judicious ear would be offended with a style
overpolished. Blackwell, Soc. Class. I. 85.

OVERPONDEROUS.* adj. [over and pon- derous.] Too weighty; too depressing.

Neither can I think that, so reputed and so valued as you are, you would, to the forfeit of your own discerning ability, impose upon me an unfit and overponderous argument. Milton on Education.

To OVERPOST.* v. a. [over and post.] To get quickly over.

You may thank the unquiet time for your quiet
overposting that action. Shaksp. Hen. IV. P. II.

To OVERPOWER. v. a. [over and power.]
To be predominant over; to oppress by superiority.

Now in danger try'd, now known in arms
Not to be overpower'd. Milton, P. L.
As much light overpowers the eye, so they who have weak eyes, when the ground is covered with snow, are wont to complain of too much light. Boyle.

Reason allows none to be confident, but him only who governs the world, who knows all things, and can do all things; and can neither be surprised nor overpowered. South.

After the death of Crassus, Pompey found himself outwitted by Cæsar; he broke with him, overpowered him in the senate, and caused many unjust decrees to pass against him. Dryden, Del. in Æn. The historians make these mountains the standards of the rise of the water; which they could never have been, had they not been standing, when it did so rise and overpowered the earth. Woodward, Nat. Hist.

Inspiration is, when such an overruling impression of any proposition is made upon the mind by God himself, that gives a convincing and indubitable evidence of the truth and divinity of it. Watts, Logic.

To OVERPRESS, v. a. [over and press.]

1. To bear upon with irresistible force; to overwhelm; to crush.

Having an excellent horse under him, when he was overpressed by some, he avoided them. Sidney. Michael's arm vain promiserous flung, And overpress'd whole legions weak with sin. Reasoner.

When a prince enters on a war, he ought maturely to consider whether his coffers be full, his people rich by a long peace and free trade, not overpressed with many burthenous taxes. Swift.

2. To overcome by entreaty; to press or persuade too much.

To OVERPRIZE, v. a. [over and prize.]

To value at too high price.

Parents overprize their children, while they behold them through the vapours of affection. Watson.

OVERPROMPTNESS, n. s. [over and promptness.] Hastiness; precipitation.

[There is] an overpromptness in many young men, who desire to be counted men of valour and resolution, upon every slight occasion to raise a quarrel, and admit of no other terms of composing and ending it but by sword and single combat. Hales, Ser. on Duels, Rom. p. 71.

OVERQUIETNESS, n. s. [over and quietness.] A state of too much quiet.

To strenuous minds there is an iniquity in overquietness, and no laboriousness in labour. Brown, Chr. Mor. i. 33.

OVERRANK, adj. [over and rank.] Too rank.

It produces overrank minds. Mindeser, Flash.

To OVERRATE, v. a. [over and rate.] To rate at too much.

While vain shows and scenes you overrate, 'Tis to be fear'd, — That as a fire the former house o'erthrew, Machines and tempests will destroy this new. Dryden.

To avoid the temptations of poverty, it concerns us not to overrate the conveniences of our station, and in estimating the proportion fit for us, to fix it rather low than high; for our desires will be proportioned to our wants, real or imaginary, and our temptations to our desires. Rogers.

To OVERREACH, v. a. [over and reach.]

1. To rise above.

The mountains of Olympus, Athos, and Atlas, overreach and surmount all winds and clouds. Raleigh. It was overreached in a deluge of water in such excess, that the floods overreached the tops of the highest mountains. Burnet.

2. To deceive; to go beyond; to circumvent. A sagacious man is said to have a long reach.

What more cruel than man, if he see himself able by fraud to overreach, by force to overbear the laws whereunto he should be subject? Hobbes.

I have laid my brain in the sun and dried it, that it wants matter to prevent so gross overreaching. Shakespeare.

Shame to be overcome, or overreach'd. Milton, P. L.

Would utmost vigour raise, and rais'd unite. Milton, P. L.

A man who had been matchless nil'd In cunning, overreach'd where least he thought, To save his credit, and for every spite Still will be tempting him who foils him still. Milton, P. R.

There is no pleasanter encounter than a trial of skill betwixt sharpeners to overreach one another. L'Estrange.

Forbidding oppression, defrauding and overreaching one another, perfidiously and treachery. Tillotson.

We may no more sue for them than we can tell a lie, or swear an unlawful oath, or overreach in their cause, or be guilty of any other transgression. Kettoworth.

Such a principle is ambition, or a desire of fame, by which many vicious men are overreached, and engaged contrary to their natural inclinations in a glorious and laudable course of action. Addison, Spect.

John had got an impression that Lewis was so deadly cunning a man, that he was afraid to venture himself alone with him; at last he took heart of grace; let him come up, quoth he, it is but sticking to my point, and he can never overreach me. Hist. of John Bull.

To OVERREACH, v. n. A horse is said to overreach, when he brings his hinder feet too far forwards, and strikes his toes against his fore shoes.

Farrier's Dict.

OVERREACHER, n. s. [from overreach.] A cheat; a deceiver.

To OVERREAD, v. a. [over and read.] To peruse.

The contents of this is the return of the duke; you shall anon overread it at your pleasure. Shakespeare.

To OVERRED, v. a. [over and read.] To smear with red.

Pick thy face and overred thy fear, Thou lily-liver'd boy. Shakespeare, Macbeth.

To OVERRIPE, v. a. [over and ripe.]

1. To rise over.

The carter overripes by his cart, Under the wheel he lay full low alive. Chaucer, Kn. Tale.

2. To ride too much; as, the horse was overriden.

To OVERRIPE, v. a. [over and ripen.] To make too ripe.

Why droops my lord, like overriped corn, Hanging the head with Ceres' plentiful loss? Shakespeare.

To OVERROAST, v. a. [over and roast.] To roast too much.

'Twas burnt and dried away, And better 'twere, that both of us did fast, Since of ourselves, ourselves are choleric, Than feed it with such overroasted flesh. Shakespeare.

To OVERRULE, v. a. [over and rule.]

1. To influence with predominant power; to be superior in authority.

Which humour perceiving to overrule me, I strive against it. Sidney.

That which the church by her ecclesiastical authority shall probably think and desire to be true or good, must in congruity of reason overrule all other inferior arguments whatsoever. Hooker.

Except our own private, and but probable resolutions, be by the law of publick determinations, we take away all possibility of scilable life in the world. Hooker.

What if they be such as will be overruled with some one, whom they dare not displease? Whitgift.

His passion and animosity overruled his conscience. Clarendon.

A wise man shall overrule his stars, and have a greater influence upon his own content, than all the constellations and planets of the firmament. Taylor.

He is acted by a passion which absolutely overrules him; and so can no more recover himself, than a bowl rolling down an hill stop itself in the midst of its career. South.

'Tis temerity for man to venture their lives upon unequal encounters; unless where they are obliged by an overruling impulse of conscience and duty. L'Estrange.

A man may, by the influence of an overruling planet, be inclined to lust, and yet by the force of reason overcome that bad influence. Swift.

2. To govern with high authority; to superintend.

Wherefore does he not now come forth and openly overrule, as in other matters he is accustomed? Hayward.

3. To supersede: as in law to overrule a plea, is to reject it as incompetent.

Thirty acres make a farthing land, nine farthings a Cornish acre, and four Cornish acres a knight's fee. But this is not the greater or lesser quantity, according to the fruitfulness or barrenness of the soil. Cure.

OVERRULER, n. s. [over and ruler.] Director; governor.

Then did proof, the overruler of opinions, make manifest that all those are but serving sciences. Sidney, Def. of Poetry.

To OVERRUN, v. a. [over and run.]

1. To harass by incursions; to ravage; to rove over in a hostile manner.

Those barbarous nations that overrun the world, possessed those dominions, whereof they are now so called. Spenser.

Till the tears she shed, Like envious clouds o'er-run her lovely face, She was the fairest creature in the world. Shakespeare.

They err, who count it glorious to subdue By conquest far and wide, to overrun Large countries, and is field great battles win, Great cities by assault. Milton, P. H.

The Nine Their fainting foes so shameful flight compell'd, And with restless force o'er-run the field. Dryden.

Gustavus Adolphus could not enter this part of the empire after having overrun most of the rest. Addison.

A commonwealth may be overrun by a powerful neighbour, which may produce bad consequences upon your trade and liberty. Swift, Miscell.

2. To outrun; to pass behind.

Pyrocles being come to sixteen, overruns his age in growth, strength, and all things following it, that no Mortalious could perform any action on horse or foot more strongly, or deliver that strength more nimbly, or become the delivery more gracefully, or employ all more virtuously. Sidney.

We may outrun By violent swiftness, that which we run at, And lose by overrunning. Shakespeare, Hen. VIII.

Abimael ran by the way of the plain, and overran Cush. 2 Sam. xviii. 23.

Gallienus notwithstanding that if an open trough, wherein water is, be driven faster than the water can follow, the water gathereth upon an heap towards the hinder end, where the motion began; which he supposed, holding the motion of the earth to be the cause of the ebbing and flowing of the ocean; because the earth overraneth the water. Bacon.

3. To overspread; to cover all over.

With an overspreading flood he will make an utter end of the place. Nak i. 8.

This disposition of the parts of the earth, shews us the footsteps of some kind of ruin which happened in such a way, that at the same time a general flood of waters would necessarily overspread the whole earth.

His tears defind the surface of the well,
And now the lovely face but half appears,
O'erspread with wrinkles and deform'd with tears. Adrian.

4. To mischief by great numbers; to pester.

To flatter foolish men into a hope of life where there is none, is much the same with betraying people into an opinion, that they are in a virtuous and happy state, when they are overspread with passion and drowned in their lusts. L'Estrange.

Were it not for the incessant labours of this industrious animal, Egypt would be overspread with crocodiles. Adrian.

Such provision made, that a country should not want springs as were convenient for it; nor be overspread with them, and afford little or nothing else; but a supply every where suitable to the necessities of each climate and region of the globe. Woodward, Nat. Hist.

5. To injure by treading down.

6. Among printers, to be obliged to change the disposition of the lines and words in correcting, by reason of the insertions.

To OVERRUN. v. n. To overflow; to be more than full.

Though you have left me,
Yet still my soul o'erruns with fondness towards you. Smith.

Cattle in inclosures shall always have fresh pasture, that now is all trampled and overrun. Spenser.

OVERRUNNER. n. s. [over and runner.] One who roves over in a hostile manner.

Vandal o'errunners, Goths in literature,
Ploughmen that would Parissus save manure. London, Luc. Poet. (1659), p. 83.

O'VERSEA. n. s. [over and sea.] Foreign; from beyond sea.

Some far journey gentlemen, at their return home, like as they love to go in farrin apparel, so they will powder their talk with oversea language. Wilson, Arte of Rhet. (1553), B. 3.

To OVERSEE. v. a. [over and see.]

1. To superintend; to overlook.

He had charge my discipline to frame,
And tutors courtesy to oversee. Spenser.

She without noise will oversee
His children and his family. Dryden.

2. To overlook; to pass by unheeded; to omit.

I who resolve to oversee
No lucky opportunity,
Will go to council to advise
Which way to encounter, or surprise. Hudibras.

OVERSEEN. part. [from oversee.] Mistaken; deceived.

A common received error is never utterly overlooked, till such times as we go from signs unto causes, and shew some manifest root or fountain thereof common unto all, whereby it may clearly appear how it lastly comes to pass that so many have been overseen. Hooker.

Such overseers, as the overseers of this building, would be so overseen as to make that which is narrow, contain that which is larger. Hobbes.

They rather observed what he had done and suffered for the king and for his country, without farther enquiring what he had omitted to do, or been overseen in doing. Clarendon.

OVERSEER. n. s. [from oversee.]

1. One who overlooks; a superintendent.

There are in the world certain voluntary overseers of all books, whose censure would fall sharp on us. Hooker.

Jehiel and Asariah were overseers unto Co-nahiah. 2 Chron. xxxi. 13.

To entertain a guest, with what a care,
Would he his household ornaments prepare;
His servants, and as a seer stand,
To keep them working with a threatening wand.
Clean all my plate, he cries. Dryden.

2. An officer who has the care of the parochial provision for the poor.

The churchwardens and overseers of the poor might find it possible to discharge their duty, whereas now in the greater outparishes many of the poorer parishioners, through neglect, do perish for want of some heedful eye to overlook them. Grant, Bills of Mortality.

To OVERSET. v. a. [over and set.]

1. To turn bottom upwards; to throw off the basis; to subvert.

The tempest met,
The sailors master'd, and the ship o'erset. Dryden.

It is forced through the hiatuses at the bottom of the sea with such reluctance, that it puts the sea into horrible perturbation, even when there is not the least breath of wind; oversetting ships in the harbours, and sinking them. Woodward.

Would the confederacy exert itself, as much to annoy the enemy, as they do for their defence, we might bear them down with the weight of our armies, and overset the whole power of the War. Adrian on the War.

2. To throw out of regularity.

His action against Cæsar ruined the consul, when it saved the city; for it so swelled his soul, that ever afterwards it was apt to be overset with vanity. Dryden.

To OVERSET. v. n. To fall off the basis; to turn upside down.

Part of the weight will be under the axle-tree, which will so far counterpoise what is above it, that it will very much prevent the oversetting. Motier.

To OVERSHADE. v. a. [over and shade.] To cover with a shadow.

Dark cloudy death o'ershadeth his beams of life,
And he nor sees, nor hears us. Shakespeare.

No great and mighty subject might eclipse or overshadow the imperial power. Huom.

If a wood of leaves o'ershadeth the tree,
In vain the hind shall vet the threshing-floor,
For empty chaff and straw will be thy store. Dryden.

Should we mix our friendly talk,
O'ershadeth in that favourite walk;
Both pleas'd with all we thought we wanted. Prior.

To OVERSHADOW. v. a. [over and shadow.]

1. To throw a shadow over any thing.

Weeds chafe and overshadow the corn, and bear it down, or starve and deprive it of nourishment. Becon.

Death,
Let the damps of thy dull breath
Overshadow even the shade,
And make darkness self afraid. Cromwell.

Darkness must overshadow all his bounds,
Palpable darkness, and blot out three days. Milton, P. L.

2. To shelter; to protect; to cover with superior influence.

My overshadowing spirit and might, with thee
I send along; ride forth, and bid the deep Within appointed bounds. Milton, P. L.

On her should come
The Holy Ghost, and the Power of the Highest

OVERSHADOW. n. s. [from overshadow.] One who throws a shade over any thing.

Your nobility in a right distance between crown and people; no oppressors of the people, no overshadowers of the crown.

Bacon, Lett. to the King, 2 Jan. 1618, Ch. p. 9.

To OVSERHOOT. v. n. [over and shoot.] To fly beyond the mark.

Often it drops, or overshoots by the disproportion of distance or application. Cotlier on Reason.

To OVERSHOOT. v. a.

1. To shoot beyond the mark.

Every inordinate appetite defeats its own satisfaction, by overshooting the mark it aims at. Tillotson.

2. To pass swiftly over.

High-raised on fortune's hill, new Alpes he spies,
O'ershoots the valley which beneath him lies,
Forgets the depths between, and travels with his eyes. Harris.

3. [With the reciprocal pronoun.] To venture too far; to assert too much.

Leave it to themselves to consider, whether they have in this or not overshot themselves; which is quickly done, even when our meaning is most sincere. Hooker.

In finding fault with the laws, I doubt me, you shall much overshoot yourself, and make me the more dislike your other dilations of that government. Spenser on Ireland.

For any thing that I can learn of them, you have overshot yourself in reckoning. Watts.

O'VERSIGHT. n. s. [from over and sight.]

1. Superintendence.

They gave the money, being told, unto them that had the oversight of the house. 2 Kings, xii. 11.

Feed the flock of God, taking the oversight thereof, not by constraint, but willingly. 1 Pet. v. 2.

2. Mistake; error.

Amongst so many huge volumes, as the infinite pains of St. Augustine have brought forth, what one hath gotten greater love, commendation, and honour, than the book wherein he carefully sets his oversights, and sincerely condemneth them? Hooker, Pref.

They watch their opportunity to take advantage of their adversaries' oversights. Estceuil.

Not so my son, he saith 't is oversight,
And then misook reward of wrong for right. Pope.

Spenser, F. Q. i. vii. 24.

OVERWROUGHT. part. [over and wrought.]

1. Labour'd too much.
Apelles said of Proteogenes, that he knew not when to give over. A work may be overwrought, as well as underwrought; too much labour often takes away the spirit, by adding to the polishing; so that there remains nothing but a dull correctness, a piece without any considerable faults, but with few beauties. Dryden, Diffinition.

2. Worked all over.

Of Gothic structure was the northern side,
Overwrought with ornaments of barbarous pride.
Pope.

3. It has in Shakespeare a sense which I know not well how to reconcile to the original meaning of the word, and therefore conclude it misprinted for overreached; that is, overreached or cheated.
By some device or other,
The villain is overreached of all my money;
They say this town is full of cozenage. Shapty.

OVERYEA<sup>R</sup>. RED. adj. [over and year.] Too old.

Among them dwelt
A maid, whose fruit was ripe, not overgrown.
Fairfax.

OVERZE<sup>R</sup>. ALEN. adj. [over and zeal.] Ruled by too much zeal. Not in use.

Thus was this good king's judgement overruled.
Fuller, Holy War, p. 214.

OVERZE<sup>R</sup>. LOUS. adj. [over and zealous.] Too zealous.

It is not of such vigour necessity to determine one way or the other, as some, overzealous for or against the immortality of the soul, have been forward to make the world believe.
Locke.

OUCH<sup>T</sup>. † n. s. [aphit, that is, a whit, Sax.] This word is therefore more properly written ought. See Aught. The difference has arisen, as Mr. Tyrwhitt has observed, merely from the different usages of writing a or o for an: Saxon, opht, oht. See also NOUGHT. Any thing; not nothing.

For ought that I can understand, there is no part but the bare English pale, in which the Irish have not the greatest footing. Spenser on Ireland.

He asked him if he saw ought. St. Mark, viii. 23.
To do ought good never will be our task;
But ever to do ill our sole delight. Milton, P. L.

Universal Love! be our business still
To give us only good; and if the night
Have gather'd ought of evil, or conceal'd
Disperse it, as now light dispels the dark.
Milton, P. L.

OUCH<sup>T</sup>. verb imperfect; in the second person oughtest. [This word the etymologists make the preterite of owe, but it has often a present signification.]

1. [Preterite of owe.] Owed; was bound to pay; have been indebted.
Apprehending the occasion, I will add a continuance to that happy moment, and besides give you some tribute of the love and duty I long have ought you.
Spelman.

This blood which men by treason sought,
That followed, sir, which to myself I ought.
Dryden.

2. [Preterite of owe, in the sense of own.] Had a right to.
Where is the booty, —
And where is eke your friend which halves it ought?
Spenser, F. Q. vi. vii. 16.

The knight, the which that castle ought.
Spenser, F. Q. vi. iii. 9.

3. To be obliged by duty.
Know how thou oughtest to behave.
1 Tim. iii. 15.

Speak boldly as I ought to speak. Ephes. vi. 20.
She acts just as she ought,
But never, never reach'd one gen'r touch'd
Pope.

Judges ought to remember, that their office is to interpret law, and not to make or give law.
Bacon.

We ought to profess our dependence upon him, and our obligations to him for the good things we enjoy. We ought to publish to the world our sense of his goodness with the voice of praise, and tell of all his wondrous works. We ought to comfort his servants and children in their afflictions, and relieve his poor distressed members in their manifold necessities, for that he giveth alms, sacrificeth praise.
Nelson.

4. To be fit; to be necessary.
These things ought not to be so late. Jerem. xli. 10.
If grammar ought to be taught, it must be to one that can speak the language already. Locke.

5. Applied to persons it has a sense not easily explained. To be fit, or necessary that he should.

Ought not Christ to have suffered? Luke.

6. Ought is both of the present and past tenses, and of all persons except the second singular.

O<sup>U</sup>DUCT<sup>R</sup>. n. s. [ovum and ductus, Lat.] A passage for the egg from the ovary to the womb.

In [the torpedo's] ovary is near the liver and double ductus and womb, wherein the young ones swim free, and save no communication with the womb. Hist. R. Soc. iii. 498.

O<sup>U</sup>VIFORM. adj. [ovum and forma, Lat.] Having the shape of an egg.

This notion of the mundane egg, or that the world was oviform, hath been the screw and language of all antiquity. Barnet.

O<sup>U</sup>VIFEROUS. adj. [ovum and pario, Lat.] Bringing forth eggs; not viviparous.

The fishes and birds should be oviparus, is a plain sign of providence.
More, Ant. against Atheism.

Birds and oviparus creatures have eggs enough at first coovivert in them to serve them for many years' laying. Boy.

O<sup>U</sup>MBER. n. s. [ombre, Fr. umbra, Lat.] The shade. A northern word. See Groze and Craven Dialect.

OUNCE. n. s. [once, Fr. uncia, Latin.] A name of weight of different value in different denominations of weight. In troy weight, an ounce is twenty pennyweights; a penny-weight, twenty-four grains.

The blood be hath lost,
Which I dare vouch is more than that be hath
By many an ounce, be dropt it for his country.
Shakespeare.

A sponge dry weigheth one ounce twenty-six grains; the same sponge being wet, weigheth fourteen ounces six drams and three quarters. Bacon.

OUNCE. n. s. [once, French; onza, Span.] A lynx.

The ounce,
The libbard, and the tiger, as the mole
Riseth, the crumbled earth above them threw In hillocks. Milton, P. L.

Her undated hair, that sunnash was of brow,
She rent. Chaucer, Tr. and Crest. iv. 736.
Endenting, or barring, undating, paling, winding.
Chaucer, Pers. Tale.

OUPHE. n. s. [als, Teutonic.] A fairy; a goblin.

He has been known to commit outrages,
And cherish factions. Shakespeare, Titus.

Unclearly with me have you dealt,
And shamefully my hopes by you are butcher'd;
My charity is outrage. Shakespeare, Rich. III.

2. This word seems to be used by Phillips for mere commotion, without any ill import, contrary to the universal use of writers.

See with what outrage from the frosty north,
The early valiant Deuce draws forth his wings
In battalious array. Philips.

To OUTRAGE. v. a. [outrager, French.] To injure violently or contumaciously; to insult roughly and tumultuously.

Al! heavens! that do this heinous act behold,
And heavenly virgin thus outraged see;
How can the vengeance just to long withhold!

Spenser.

The news put divers young bloods into fury, as the English ambassadors were not without peril to be outraged.

Bacon, Hen. VII.

Base and insolent minds outrage men, when they have hope of doing it without a return.

Atterbury.

This interview outrages all decency: she forgets her modesty, and betrays her virtue, by giving too long so audience. Brome.

To OUTRAGE. v. n. To commit exorbitances. Not in use.

Three or four great ones in court will outrage in apparel, huge hoes, monstrous hats, and garish colours.

Johnson.

OUTRAGIOUS. adj. [outrageous, French.] It should, I think, be written outrageous; but the custom seems otherwise.

Dr. Johnson.—So far from custom being otherwise, I find the ancient form of the word to be outrous, and not outrous. Milton writes it both ways; in the passage cited, outrageous. See also OUTRAGIOUSLY, and OUTRAGIOUSNESS, where the termination of ous is abundantly shewn. Our old lexicography has also this form.

1. Violent; furious; raging; exorbitant; tumultuous; turbulent.

Tyranny is seigniorie violent and outrageous.
Caston, Bate of Good Manners, (1486), f. li. b.
 Under him they committed diverse the most outrageous villanies, that a base multitude can imagine.
Sidney.

As she went her tongue did walk,
 To foul reproach and terms of vile despite,
 Provoking him by her outrageous talk,
 To heap more vengeance on that wretched witch.
Spenser.

They view'd the vast immeasurable abyss,
 Outragious as a sea, dark, wasteful, wild.

When he knew his rival freed and gone,
 He swells with wrath; he makes outrageous moan;
 He frets, he fumes, he stares, he stamps the
 ground;
 The hollow tow'r with clamorous rings around.
Dryden.

2. Excessive; passing reason or decency.
 The outrageous decking of temples and churches with gold and silver.

Homilies, Sermon against Idolatry, P. l.
 My characters of Antony and Cleopatra, though they are favourable to them, have nothing of outragious panegyric. Dryden, Discrepancy.

3. Enormous; atrocious.
 Think not, although in writing I prefer'd
 The manner of thy vile outrageous crimes,
 That therefore I have forg'd it. Shakespeare, Ham. V. l.

OUTR'AGIOUSLY, adv. [from outrageous.]
 1. Violently; tumultuously; furiously.
 That people will have colour of employment given them, by which they will pull and spoil so outrageously, as the very enemy cannot do worse.
Spenser on Ireland.

In labour of her grief outrageously distract.

Let lust burn never so outrageously for the present,
 yet age will in time chill those heats. South.
 I am not one of those who think that the people are never in the wrong; they have been so, frequently and outrageously, both in other countries and in this. Burke on the Cause of Discontent.

2. Excessively.
 Depend not too outrageously, nor be not too scarce, so that thou be not bound to thy treasure.
 Have therein abstemiousness, and measure, which in all thy things is profitable.
Ld. Rivers, Dietet and Sayings, sign. B. vii.

OUTR'AGIOUSNESS, n. s. [from outrageous.]
 Fury; violence.

Outragiousness is not enduring.

Ld. Rivers, Dietet, sign. F. viii.
 It would bridle the outrageousness of the flesh.

Virgil, more discreet than Homer, has contented himself with the parity of his dridies, without bringing them to the outrageousness of blows. Dryden.

- TO OUTR'AZE, v. a. [out and race.] To rout out entirely.

Yet shall the axe of justice hew him down,
 And level with the root his lofty crown:
 No eye shall his outrage'd impress view,
 Nor mortal know where such a glory grew.
Sandys, Paraphr. of Job.

OUT'RE, adj. [French.] Extravagant; overstrained. A most affected and needless introduction of modern times.

As Dr. South was a severe satirist, we must make some allowance for this description, which he has made somewhat outré in answer his purpose. Granger, Biog. Hist. 3d ed. (1775), p. 217.

Although this panegyric be somewhat outré, I am willing to subscribe to it.

Dr. Gold, Letter to the Bp. of London, (1787).

- TO OUTREASON, v. a. [out and reason.]
 To excel in reasoning; to reason beyond.

They step forth men of another spirit, great linguists, powerful disputants, able to cope with the Jewish Sanhedrim, to baffle their profoundest Rabbins, and to outreason the very Athenians.
South, Sermon, vii. 35.

TO OUTREACH, v. a. [out and reach.] To go beyond.

This usage is derived from so many descents of ages, that the cause and author outranch remembrance. Cromer.

Our forefathers could never dream so high a crime as parricide, whereas this outraches that fact, and exceeds the regular distinctions of murder.
Dromer.

TO OUTRECKON, v. a. [out and reckon.]
 To exceed in assumed computation.

The Egyptian priests provided an exact chronology for some myriads of years; and the Chaldeans and Assyrians far outrackon them.
Pearson on the Creed, Art. 1.

TO OUTREIGN, v. a. [out and reign.]
 To reign through the whole of.

In wretched prison long he did remain,
 Till they outraign'd him their utmost date.
Spenser, F. Q. ii. s. 45.

TO OUTRIDE, v. a. [out and ride.] To pass by riding.

It boots not to persuade your majesty to betake yourself to your chariot, to outide the shewers.

My. Hall, Way of Power, Ded. to the King.
 If you will send me to the furthest sea
 To fetch you pearls, the sun shall not outide
 My restless course; nor any jewels be Treasur'd so deep in the profoundest main,
 But I will dig them thence, and come again.
Ben Jonson, Psyche, (1631), p. 11.

This advantage age from youth hath won,
 As not to be outridden, though out-run. Dryden.

TO OUTRIDE, v. n. To travel about on horseback, or in a vehicle.

By distance of place being rendered incapable of paying our respects to him, I am become auditor to you to constitute an outriding lien, or (if you please) a jackall or two, to receive and remit our homage in a more particular manner than is hitherto provided. Addison, Guard, No. 118.

OUTRIDER, n. s. [from out and rider.]
 1. A summoner whose office is to cite men before the sheriff. Dict.

2. One who travels about on horseback or in a vehicle.

There is needful to be an outrider, or riding master, whose business should be to visit the ports and fleets.

Maydman, Naval Speculat. (1691), p. 119.

OUTRIGGER, n. s. A naval word, signifying both a strong beam of timber fixed on the side of a ship to secure the mast in the act of careening, and a small boom occasionally used on the tops.

OUTRIGHT, adv. [out and right.]

1. Immediately; without delay.

When these wretches had the ropes about their necks, the first was to be pardoned, the last hang'd outright. Arbuthnot.

2. Completely.

By degrees accomplish'd in the best,
 He neig'd outright, and all the steed express.

Addison.

TO OUTRIVAL, v. a. [out and rival.] To surpass in excellence.

There have been finer things spoken of Augustus than of any other man, all the wits of his age having tried to out rival one another upon that subject. Addison, Guard, No. 198.

OUTROAD, n. s. [out and road.] EX-cursioid.

He set horsemen and footmen, to the end that issuing out, they might make outroups upon the way of Judea. 1 Mac. xv. 41.

TO OUTROAR, v. a. [out and roar.] To exceed in roaring.

O that I were
 Upon the hill of Basan, to outroar
 The horned herd! Shakespeare, Ant. and Cleop.

TO OUTROUPE, v. a. [out and rout.] To extirpate; to eradicate.

Pericious discord seems Outrooted from our more than iron age; Slave none, not ev'n our kings, approach their temples.

With any mark of war's destructive rage,
 But sacrifice unarm'd. Rome, Arm. Strepcher.

TO OUTRUN, v. n. [out and run.]

1. To leave behind in running.

By giving the house of Lancaster leave to breathe,

It will outrun you, father, in the end. Shakespeare.
 The expedition of my violent ire
 Outruns the pauser reason. Shakespeare, Macbeth.

We may outrun,
 By violent witnesses, that which we run at.

When things are come to the execution, there is no secrecy comparably to celerity, like the motion of a bullet in the air, which flieth so swift as it outruns the eye. Bacon.

This advantage age from youth hath won,
 As not to be out-riden, though outrun. Dryden.

2. To exceed.

We outrun the present income, as not doubting to reimburse ourselves out of the profits of some future project. Addison.

TO OUTSAIL, v. a. [out and sail.] To leave behind in sailing.

She may out sail me; I am a carvel to her.

Brown, and P. W. without Money.
 The word signifies a ship that out sails other ships. Brown.

OUTSCAPE, n. s. [out and scape.] Power of escaping.

It pass
 Our powers to life aside a log so vast,
 As bar'd all out scape. Chapman.

TO OUTSCORN, v. a. [out and scorn.] To bear down or confront by contempt; to despise; not to mind.

He strives in his little world of man t' outscorn
 The too and fro conflicting wind and rain.

Shakespeare.

TO OUTSELL, v. a. [out and sell.]

1. To exceed in the price for which a thing is sold; to sell at a higher rate than another.

It would soon improve to such a height as to outsell our neighbours, and thereby advance the proportion of our exported commodities. Temple.

2. To gain a higher price.

Her pretty action did outsell her gift,
 And yet enrich'd it too. Shakespeare, Cymb.

OUTSET, n. s. [out and set.] Opening;
 beginning.

These matters, at least in the outset of their strains, were careful to preserve air.

Mason on Ch. Music, p. 140.

TO OUTSHINE, v. a. [out and shine.]

1. To emit lustre.

Witness my son, now in the shade of death;
 Whose bright outshining beams thy cloudy wrath
 Hath in eternal darkness fold'd up.

Shakespeare, Rich. III.

2. To excel in lustre.

By Shakespeare's, Jonson's, Fletcher's lines,
 Out stage's lustre Rouse's outshine. Dickens.

Beauty and greatness are so eminently joined in your royal highness, that it were not easy for any but a poet to determine which of them outshines the other.

Homer does not only outshine all other poets in the variety, but also in the novelty of his characters.

We should see such as would outshine the rebellious part of their fellow-subjects, as much in their gallantry as in their cause.

Such accounts are a tribute due to the memory of those only, who have outshone the rest of the world by their rank as well as their virtues.

Happy you!
Whose charms as far all other nymphs outshine.
As other's gardens are excell'd by thine.

To OUTSHOOT. v. a. [out and shoot.]

1. To exceed in shooting.
The forward youth
Will learn to outshoot you in your proper bow.

2. To shoot beyond.
Men are resolved never to outshoot their forefathers' mark; but write one after another, and so the dance goes round in a circle.

To OUTSHUT. v. a. [out and shut.] To exclude.
He outshuts my prayer.

OUTSIDE. n. s. [out and side.]
1. Superficies; surface; external part.

What play that so exults in an outside of a head should not have one grain of sense in it.

The leathern outside, bolsterous as it was,
Gave way and bent.

2. Extreme part; part remote from the middle.
Hold an arrow in a flame for the space of ten pulses, and when it cometh forth, those parts which were on the outside of the flame are blacked and turned into a coal.

3. Superficial appearance.
You shall find his vanities foreseen
Were but the outside of the Roman Brutus, Covering discretion with a coat of folly.

The ornaments of conversation, and the outside of fashionable manners, will come to their due time.

Created beings are nothing but our outside, and can therefore only be a judgment of us from our exterior actions.

4. The utmost. A barbarous use.
Two hundred load upon an acre, they reckon the outside of what is to be laid.

5. Person; external man.
Fortune forbid, my outside have not charm'd her.

Your outside promises as much as can be expected from a gentleman.

What admir'st thou, what transports thee so?
An outside of fair, on doubt, and worthy well
Thy cherishing and thy love.

6. Outer side; part not inclosed.
I threw open the door of my chamber, and found the family standing on the outside.

To OUTSIN. v. a. [out and sin.] To sin beyond.

Upon that presumption we go on, we may outsin that season of grace and repentance, and become hardened therein.

He that prolongs his meals, and sacrifices his time, as well as his other conveniences, to his luxury, how quickly does he outsin his pleasure!

To OUTSKIP. v. a. [out and skip.] To avoid by flight.

Thou loost thyself, ch. Drusus, when thou thought'st
Thou could'st outskip my vengeance, or withstand
The power I had to crush thee into air.

OUTSKIRT. v. n. s. [out and skirt.] Suburb; outpart.

If (the plague) appeared to be only in the outsides of the town, and in the most obscure alleys.

To OUTSLEEP. v. a. [out and sleep.] To sleep beyond.
Lovers, to bed; 'tis almost fairy time:
I fear we shall outsleep the coming morn.

To OUTSOAR. v. a. [out and soar.] To soar beyond.

Let them clog their wings with the remembrance of those who have outsoured them, not to vain opinion, but true worth.

Outstares the lids of large-look'd tyranny.

OUTSTREET. n. s. [out and street.] Street in the extremities of a town.

To OUTSTRETCH. v. a. [out and stretch.] To extend; to spread out.

Make him stand upon the mole-hill,
That caught at mountains with out-stretched arms.

Out-stretched he lay on the cold ground and cry'd Cursed his creation.

A spacious plain, out-stretch'd in circuit wide,
Lay pleasant.

Does Thersites burn,
And must not she with out-stretch'd arms receive him?
And with an equal ardour meet his vows?

To OUTSTRIDE. v. a. [out and stride.] To surpass in striding.

Outstriking the columns of the sun.

To OUTSTRIP. v. a. [out and strip.] To surpass in running.

Skinner derives from out and strip, to spend, German. I know not whether it might not have been originally out-strip, the e being afterward inserted.

Dr. Johnson. — It can hardly have been out-strip; and I should think the derivation of Skinner, plausible as it is, might give place to out and the Saxon þrīpan, to shoot out, to spend, and thence to spring forward, or beyond, might easily be adopted.

To outgo; to leave behind in a race.

If thou wilt out-strip death, go cross the seas,
And live with Richmond from the reach of hell.

Do not smile at me, that I boast her off;
For thou shalt find she will out-strip all praise,
And make it halt behind her.

Thou both their graces in thyself hast more
Out-strip than they did, all that went before.

My soul, more earnestly released,
Will out-strip her; as bullfinch flows before
A later bullet may o'ertake, the powder being more.

A fox may be outwitted, and a hare outstrip.

He got the start of them in point of obedience, and thereby out-strip them at length in point of knowledge.

With such army Halpalee bestowed
Her Thracian courier, and out-strip'd the rapid flood.

To OUTSWEAR. v. a. [out and swear.] To overpower by swearing.

We shall leave old swearing,
But we'll outface them, and outswear them too.

To OUTSWEETEN. v. a. [out and sweeten.] To excel in sweetness.

The sweet of eglsamine, which not to slander,
Our sweetest's not thy breath.

To OUTSWELL. v. a. [out and swell.] To overflow.

A sad text in a sadder time; in which the rivers of Babylon swelled not so high with inundation of water in the tower, as the waters in the metaphor, outsweeling and breaking down their banks, have overflowed both our church and state.

Outtake. v. a. [out and take.] Except. Obsolete.

Of every white somewhat he can,
Outtake that golden lock'd rule
His own estate to give.

All was bold men might we,
Outtake the fathers and the tre.

This gentleman will outtalk us all.

To OUTTONGUE. v. a. [out and tongue.] To bear down by noise.

Let him do his taste,
My services which I have done the signory
Shall outtongue his complaints.

To OUTTOP. v. a. [out and top.] To overtop; to make of less importance; to obscure.

The treasurer began then to outtop me; and appeared to my thoughts likely enough, by his daring and boldness, in time to do as much to your grace.

Ed. Keeper Williams, Lett. (1624), Cab. p. 94.

To OUTVA'LE. v. a. [out and value.] To transcend in price.

He gives us in this life an earnest of expected joy, that outvalues and transcends all those momentary pleasures it requires us to forsake. Blyde.

To OUTVE'NOM. v. a. [out and venom.] To exceed in poison.

'Tis slander;
Whose edge is sharper than the sword, whose tongue
Outvenoms all the worms of Nile.
Shakespeare, Cymb.

To OUTVIE† v. a. [out and vie. Dr. Johnson.—Bp. Hurd has made the following sound observation upon Addison's use of this word. "To vie is to contend with; to out-vie, to out-do any one, in vying with him. But the word seems to be of an ill composition, and should not, I think, be used thus absolutely. If employed at all it should be in some such way as this: 'in the affection of pomp and pageantry he outvied others, i. e. in this respect, he strove or contended beyond them.' I know not if Addison had any authority for the use of it: he had, perhaps, done better to use the common word outstrip." Note on Addison's Remarks on Italy."] To exceed; to surpass; to outstrip.

For folded flocks on fruitful plains,
Fair Britain all the world outvies. Dryden.

One of these petty sovereigns will be still endeavouring to equal the pomp of greater princes, as well as to outvie those of his own rank. Addison.

To OUTVILLAIN. v. a. [out and villain.] To exceed in villany.

He built outvillain'd villanous so far, that the rarity redeems him. Shakespeare, All's Well.

To OUTVOIC'E† v. a. [out and voice.] To out-roar; to exceed in clamour.

The English beach
Pales in the flood with men, with wives and boys,
Where shouts and claps out-voice the deep-mouth'd sea.
Shakespeare.

Nothing but thunder could out-voice him.
Alfred, Sermon. (1684.) p. 217.

To OUTVOTE v. a. [out and vote.] To conquer by plurality of suffrages.

They were out-voted by other sects of philosophers, neither for fame, nor number less than themselves. South.

To OUTWALK† v. a. [out and walk.] 1. To leave one in walking.

2. To exceed the walking of a spectre. See the 5th sense of To WALK.
Have I not outwalk'd,
Yes, and outwalk'd any ghost alive
In solitary circle, worn my boots, Knees, arms, and elbows out?
B. Jonson, Fort. Miles.

3. To surpass in watchfulness.

Have I not outwatch'd,
Yes, and outwatch'd any ghost alive!
B. Jonson, Fort. Miles.

4. To surpass in watchfulness.

Have I not outwatch'd,
Yes, and outwatch'd any ghost alive!
B. Jonson, Fort. Miles.

5. To surpass in watchfulness.

Have I not outwatch'd,
Yes, and outwatch'd any ghost alive!
B. Jonson, Fort. Miles.

6. To surpass in watchfulness.

Have I not outwatch'd,
Yes, and outwatch'd any ghost alive!
B. Jonson, Fort. Miles.

His calls and invitations of us to that repentance, not only outward, in the ministry of the word, but also inward, by the motions of the spirit.

He took a long leave: but who can tell
What outward hate might inward love conceal?
Dryden.

3. Extrinsick; adventitious.

Princes have their titles for their glories,
An outward honour, for an inward toil.
Sleep in power, and having mourn'd your sin
For outward Eden lost, find paradise within.
Dryden.

4. Foreign, not intestine.

It was intended to raise an outward war to hate with some sedition within doors. Hayward.

5. Tending to the out-parts.

The fire will force its outward way,
Or, in the prison pent, consume the prey. Dryden.

6. [In theology.] Carnal; corporeal; not spiritual.

When the soul being inwardly moved to lift itself up by prayer, the outward man is surprised in some other posture; God will rather look to the inward motions of the mind, than to the outward form of the body. Dugge.

We may also pray against temporal punishments, that is, any outward affliction, but this with submission to God's will, according to the example of Christ. W. Inst. of Man.

OUTWARD. n. s. 1. External form.

I do not think
So fair an outward, and such stuff within,
Endows a man but him. Shakespeare, Cymbeline.

2. Outward adv.

1. To foreign parts: as, a ship outward bound.

2. To the outer parts.

OUTWARDLY. adv. [from outward.]

1. Externally; opposed to inwardly.

That which inwardly each man should be,
The church outwardly ought to testify. Hooker.

Grief'd with disgrace, remaining in their fears:
However seeming outwardly content,
Yet th' inward touch their wounded honour hurts.
Daniel.

2. In appearance not sincerely.

Many wicked men are often touched with some inward reverence for that goodness which they cannot be persuaded to practice; nay, which they outwardly seem to despise. Spenser.

OUTWARDS. adv. Towards the outparts.

Do not black bodies receive heat more easily from light than those of other colours do, by reason that the light falling on them is not reflected outwards, but enters the bodies, and is often reflected and refracted within them until it is used and lost? Newton, Opt.

To OUTWATCH. v. a. [out and watch.] To surpass in watchfulness.

Have I not outwatch'd,
Yes, and outwatch'd any ghost alive!
B. Jonson, Fort. Miles.

3. To surpass in watchfulness.

Have I not outwatch'd,
Yes, and outwatch'd any ghost alive!
B. Jonson, Fort. Miles.

4. To surpass in watchfulness.

Have I not outwatch'd,
Yes, and outwatch'd any ghost alive!
B. Jonson, Fort. Miles.

Yes, and outwatch'd any ghost alive!
B. Jonson, Fort. Miles.

6. To surpass in watchfulness.

Have I not outwatch'd,
Yes, and outwatch'd any ghost alive!
B. Jonson, Fort. Miles.

7. To surpass in watchfulness.

Have I not outwatch'd,
Yes, and outwatch'd any ghost alive!
B. Jonson, Fort. Miles.

Wrath is a fire, and jealousy a weed:
The sparks soon quench, the springing weed spreads. Spenser.

To OUTWEEP. v. a. [out and weep.] To exceed in weeping.

Meanwhile he sadly suffers in his grief,
Outweeps a burnit, and outcries a saint.

His cries outweep his wildest wound.
Davenant, Gondibert, B. II. C. 2.

To OUTWEIGH. v. a. [out and weigh.] 1. To exceed in gravity.

These instruments require so much strength for the supporting of the weight to be moved, as may be equal unto it, besides that super-added power whereby it is out-weighed and moved.
Wallis, Math. Magic.

2. To preponderate; to excel in value or influence.

If any think brave death out-weighs bad life,
Let him express his disposition.

Your care is for your prince I see,
All truth to him out-weighs your love to me.
Dryden.

Whoever he finds the hardship of his slavery out-weighs the value of his life, it is in his power, by resisting the will of his master, to draw on himself the death he desires. Locke.

The marriage of the clergy is attended with the poverty of some of them, which is balanced and out-weighed by many single advantages. Atterbury.

To OUTWELL. v. a. [out and well.] To pour out. Not in use.

With when old father Nilus gins to swell,
As timely aide about the Egyptian vale,
His fattle waves do fertile soil outwell,
And overflow each plain and lowly dale. Spenser.

OUTWENT. v. To Outgo.

To OUTWIN. v. a. [out and win.] To get out of.

It is a darkness delve far under ground,
With thorns and barren brakes environ'd round,
That none the maze may truly outwin;
Yet many waxes to enter may be found,
But none to issue forth when one is in.
Spenser, F. Q. Iv. l. 50.

To OUTWIND. v. a. [out and wind.] To extricate; to unloose.

When shalt thou once outwind
Thyself from this sad yoke?
Mare, Life of the Saint, li. 71.

To OUTWING. v. a. [out and wing.] To outstrip; to outgo.

His courser springs
O'er hills and lawns, and even a wish outwings.
South, Or. Met. 14.

My song the midnight raven has outwing'd,
Young Night has won.
Young, Night Th. 9.

To OUTWIT. v. a. [out and wit.] To cheat; to overcome by stratagem.

The truth bearded any man is, the more liable he is to be imposed on; and then the world calls it out-witting a man, when he is only out-knaved.
Farmer.

Justice forbids defrauding, or going beyond our brother in any manner, when we can overreach and out-wit him in the same. Kettwell.

After the death of Crassus, Pompey found himself out-witted by Caesar and broke with him.
Dryden.

Nothing is more equal in Justice, and indeed more natural in the direct consequence of efforts and causes, than for men wickedly wise to outwit themselves; and for such as wrestle with Providence, to trip up their own heels. South.

To OUTWORK. v. a. [out and work.] Parts of a fortification next the enemy; any work raised outwardly to fortify or defend.

Take care of our out-work, the navy royal, which are the walls of the kingdom; and every great ship is an impregnable fort; and our many safe and commodious ports as the redoubts to secure them. Bacon.

When the soul is beaten from its first station, and the sounds and outward of virtue are once broken down, it becomes quite another thing from what it was before. South, Sermon, ii. 369.

Death hath taken in the out-works, And now assails the fort; I feel, I feel him, Gnawing my heart-strings. Drummond.

OUTWORN. part. [from outwear.] Consumed or destroyed by use.

Better at home lie bed-ridden, idle, Ingorious, unemployed, with age outworn. Milton, S. A.

To OUTWORTH. v. a. [out and worth.] To excel in value.

A beggar's book Outworts a noble's blood. Shakespeare, Hen. VIII.

To OUTWREST. v. a. [out and wrest.] To exert by violence.

The growing anguish Rankled so more and fester'd inwardly, Till that the truth thereof I did outwrest. Spenser.

OUTWROUGHT. part. [out and wrought.] Outdone; exceeded in efficacy.

In your violent acts, The fall of torrents and the noise of tempests, The boiling of Cerydis, the sea's wildness, The eating force of flames, and wings of winds, Be all outwrought by your transcendent furies. B. Jonson.

To OUTZANY. v. a. [out and zany.] To exceed in buffoonery.

O, run not proud of this yet, take thy due; Thou dost outzany Cokely. B. Jonson, Epigr. 130.

To OWE. v. a. [eg aa, I owe, or I ought, Icelandic.]

1. To be obliged to pay; to be indebted. I owe you much, and, like a wilesome youth, That which I owe is lost. Shakespeare, Merch. of Ven.

Let none seek needless causes to approve The faith they owe. Milton, P. L.

A son owes help and honour to his father; and is a subject less indebted to the king. Holday.

All your parts of pious duty done, You owe your Ormond nothing but a son. Dryden.

Thou hast deserv'd more love than I can show, But 'tis thy fate to give, and mine to owe. Dryden.

If, upon the general balance of trade, English merchants owe to foreigners one hundred thousand pounds, if commodities do not, our money must go out to pay it. Locke.

2. To be obliged to ascribe; to be obliged for.

By me upheld, that he may know frail His fall'n condition is, and to me owe All his deliverance, and to none but me. Milton, P. L.

3. To have from any thing as the consequence of a cause.

O deem thy fall not owe'd to man's decree, Jove hath given, and punish'd Greece in thee. Pope.

4. To possess; to be the right owner of. For owe, which is, in this sense, obsolete, we now use own.

Thou dost here usurp The name thou owe'st not, and hast put thyself Upon this island as a spy. Shakespeare, Tempest.

VOL. II.

Fate, show thy force; ourselves we do not owe; What is decreed must be; and be this so. Shakespeare.

Not poppy nor mandragora, Nor all the drowsy sirups of the world, Shall ever med'cine thee to that sweet sleep Which thou owest it yesterday. Shakespeare, Othello.

If any happy eye Let this roving wanton shall decry, The finder surely know Mine is the wag; 'tis I that owe The winged wand'rer. Crusoe.

To OWE. v. n. To be bound or obliged. The rich man owes of duty to do his mercy upon the poor creature. Bp. Fisher, Pt. p. 14.

O'WING. part. [from owe.] A practice has long prevailed among writers, to use owing, the active participle of owe, in a passive sense, for owed or due. Of this impropriety some writers were aware, and having no quick sense of the force of English words, have used due, in the sense of consequence or imputation, which by other writers is only used of debt. We say that money is due to me; they say likewise, the effect is due to the cause.

1. Consequential.

This was owing to an indifference to the pleasures of life, and an aversion to the pomps of it. Atterbury.

2. Due as a debt. Here due is undoubtedly the proper word.

You are both too bold; I'll teach you all what's owing to your queen. Dryden.

The debt, owing from one country to the other, cannot be paid without real effects sent thither to that value. Locke.

3. Imputable to, as an agent.

If we estimate things, what in them is owing to nature, and what to labour, we shall find in most of them due to be on the account of labour. Locke. The custom of particular imputations was not limited any more than that of struggles between nobles and commons, the ruin of Greece was owing to the former, as that of Rome was to the latter. Sayl.

OWL.† n. s. [ule, Saxon; hulster, Fr. O'WLET. and Scottish. Dr. Johnson.—Icel. yla, or yglia, an owl, from yla, to cry out. See To HOWL.] A bird that flies about in the night and catches mice.

Adder's fork, and blind worm's sting, Lizard's leg, and owl's wing For a charm. Shakespeare, Macbeth.

Return to her! No! rather I abjure all roofs, and choose To be a comrade with the wolf and owl. Shaksp. 'Twas when the dog-star's voracious ray Smote e'er'y brain, and wither'd every day; Sick was the sun, the owl farook his bowler. Pope, Dunciad.

Then lady Cynthia, mistress of the shade, Goes, with the fashionable owl, to bed. Young.

OWL-LIGHT. n. s. [owl and light.] Glimmering light; twilight.

Church history making an important part of our theologic studies, the antiquarian, who delights to solace himself in the benighted days of monkish owl-light, sometimes pauses for the divine. Warton, Charge to the Clergy, (1761.)

OWL-LIKE. adj. Resembling an owl in look or quality.

Now like an owl-like watchman he must walk. Dennis, Sat. 2.

At this deep Sidrophel look'd wise; And, staring round with owl-like eyes, He put his face into a posture Of aspersion, and began to bluster. Hudibras, ii. iii.

O'WLER. n. s. One who carries contraband goods; in the legal sense, one that carries out wool illicitly. Perhaps from the necessity of carrying on an illicit trade by night; but rather, I believe, a corruption of wooler, by a colloquial neglect of the w, such as is often observed in woman, and by which goodwife is changed to goody. Wooler, cooller, owler.

By running goods, these graceless owlers gain. Swift.

We understand, by some owlers, old people who live in France. Taitler.

O'WING. n. s. An offence against public trade.

Offences against public trade are felonious, or not felonious. Of the first sort is owling, so called from its being usually carried on in the night, which is the offence of transporting wool or sheep out of the kingdom. Blackstone.

O'WLISH. adj. [from owl.] Resembling an owl.

Every one, while it lasted, was very gay and busy in the morning, and very owlish and very tipsy at night. Gray to Dr. Wharton, (1749.)

OWN.† n. s. [agen, Saxon; eygen, Dutch. Dr. Johnson.—M. Goth. aignin, ainn; Icel. aignan, from aigna, possider. Serenius. Thus own from the obsolete owne, to possess.]

1. This is a word of no other use than as it is added to the possessive pronouns, my, thy, his, our, your, their. It seems to be a substantive; as, my own, my peculiar; but is, in reality, the participle passive of the verb own, in the participle own or own; my own; the thing owned by, or belonging to me.

Inachus in his cave alone, Wept not another's losses, his own. Dryden.

2. It is added generally by way of emphasis or corroboration.

I yet never was forsworn, Scarcely have coveted what was my own. Shakespeare.

Every nation made gods of their own, and put them in high places. 2 Kings, xvii. 29. For my own share one beauty I design, Engage your honours that she shall be mine. Dryden.

It is conceit rather than understanding, if it must be under the restraint of receiving and holding opinions by the authority of any thing but their own perspicacious evidence. Locke.

Will she thy linen wash, or beard darn, And knit three gloves made of her own spun yarn. Gay.

Possion and pride were to her soul unknown, Fervent that virtue only was her own. Pope.

3. Sometimes it is added to note opposition or contradistinction; domestic; not foreign; mine, his, or yours; not another's.

These coils abroad, these tumbrels with his own, Fell in the revolution of one year. Dennis. There's nothing siller than a crafty knave out-witted, and beaten at his own play. L'Esrange.

To OWN. v. a. [from the noun.]

1. To acknowledge; to avow for one's own.

When you come, find me out,
And own me for your son. Dryden, Cleon.

2. To possess; to claim; to hold by right.

Tell me, ye Trojans, for that name you own;
Now is your course upon our coasts unknown. Dryden.

Others on earth o'er human race preside,
Of these the chief, the care of nations own,
And guard with arms divine the British throne. Page.

3. To avow.

Nor hath it been thus only amongst the most civilized nations; but the barbarous Indians likewise have owned that tradition. Wilkins.

I'll venture out alone,
Since you, fair princess, my protection own. Dryden.

4. To confess; not to deny.

Make this truth so evident, that those who are unwilling to own it may yet be ashamed to deny it. Tillotson.

Others will own their weakness of understanding. Locke.

It must be owned, that, generally speaking,
good parents are never more fond of their daughters,
than when they see them too fond of themselves. Laan.

- OWNERSHIP. n. s. [from owner.] Property; rightful possession.

In a real action, the proximate cause is the property or ownership of the thing in controversy. Argle, Paragon.

- OWNER. n. s. [from own.] One to whom any thing belongs; master; rightful possessor.

A bark
Stays till her owner comes aboard. Shakespeare.

It is not enough to break into my garden,
Climbing my walls in spite of me the owner,
But thou wilt brave me. Shakespeare.

Here show favour, because it happens that the owner hath incurred the forfeiture of eight years' profit of his lands, before he cometh to the knowledge of the process against him. Bacon.

They intend advantage of my labours
With no small profit daily to my owners. Milton, S. A.

These walt the owners last despair,
And what's permitted to the flames invade. Dryden.

A freehold, though but in ice and snow, will make the owner pleased in the possession, and stout in the defence of it. Adams, Freholder.

That small muscle draws the nose upwards, when it expresses the contempt which the owner of
it has upon seeing any thing he does not like. Dryden.

Victory hath not made us lascivious, nor have we taken advantage to gain any thing beyond the honour of restoring every one's right to their just owners. Atterbury.

What is this wit, which must our cares employ?
The owner's wife, that other men enjoy. Page.

- OWRE. n. s. [urus jubatus, Lat.] A beast.

- OX. † n. s. plur. oxen. [Oxa, Saxon; oxe, Danish. Dr. Johnson. — "M. Goth. auks; Icel. oxe, ure, taurus; Cambr. ych, bos;
as Icel. aka, Sueth. aka, currum agere.
Sic Sueth. oek, jumentum; Icel. oke, juga- les; as aukan; Sueth. oeka, augere, ut sit quasi multiplicator gregis. Wacht." Serenius. — "Videri possunt affinia Graeco
ὄξω vel ὄξιδω, augere; quod proavi nostri, quorum opes in gregibus potissimum atque armentis consistebant, rem suam familiarem ex frequentiore bubuli pecoris facturū ingens incrementum capere judicant. Ex auks (Goth.) interitum factum est ox; nam hs (Goth.)

plerumque mutatur in x." Junii Goth.
Gloss.]

1. The general name for black cattle.

The black or hath not trod on his foot. Camden.
Sheep run not half so tim'rous from the wolf
Or horse or oxen from the leopard,
As you fly from your oft-subdued slaves. Shakespeare.

I saw the river Clitumnus, celebrated by the poets for making cattle white that drink of it. The inhabitants of that country have still the same opinion, and have a great many oxen of a whitish colour to confirm them in it. Adrian.

2. A castrated bull.

The horns of oxen and cows are larger than the bull's; which is caused by abundance of moisture. Bacon.

Although there be naturally more males than females, yet artificially, that is, by making geldings, oxen, and wethers, there are fewer. Graunt.

The field is spacious I design to sow,
With oxen far united to draw the plough. Dryden.

The frothing bull. Thomson, Summer.

- OX-LIKE. † adj. Resembling an ox in look or quality.

I made the night elephant.
Who, art-like, feeds on every herb and plant. Sandy, Paraphr. of Job.

With art-like eyes. Page, Dunciado.

- OXBA'NE. n. s. [oxphanos.] A plant.

OX'XEY. † n. s. [luphthalmus.] A plant. Miller.

Bring corn-flag, tulips, and Adonis' flower, Fair oxys, golden-locks, and columbine. B. Jonson, Masque.

- OX'EYED. † adj. [ox and eyc.] Having large or full eyes, like those of an ox.

Homer useth that epithet of ox-eyed, in describing Juno, because a round black eye is the best. Barton, Anal. of Met. p. 472.

- OX'FLY. n. s. [from ox and fly; tabanus, Latin.] A fly of a particular kind.

OX'GANG of land. † n. s. Ordinarily taken for fifteen acres. It is sometimes called oxgate; and in the north, corruptly oxen.

A curcote of land contain 100 acres; eight oxgangs make a curcote; and every oxgang contains fifteen acres. Kilham, Domesday Book Illustr. p. 169.

- OX'HEAL. n. s. [heliebori nigri radix.] A plant. Ainsworth.

OX'LIPT. † n. s. [Sax. oxan-flippa, primula veris. This word should therefore be written oxlip; though Dr. Johnson, overpassing the Saxon word, has given it oxlip; as the editors of Shakespeare also have.] The same with cowslip, a vernal flower.

A bank whereon the wild thyme blows,
Where catp and the nodding violet grows. Shakespeare.

The cowslip then they couch, and the oxlip, far her meet. Dryden, Fables p. 15.

- OX'STALL. n. s. [ox and stall.] A stand for oxen.

ἰξίς and κράτος.] A mixture of water and vinegar.

Apply a mixture of the same powder, with a compress prest out of oxycrate, and a suitable bandage. Wicman.

- OX'YGEN. n. s. [ἰξίς and γενεσις, Gr.;
oxygene, Fr.] A principle existing in the air, of which it forms the respirable part, and which is also necessary to combustion. Oxygen, by combining with bodies, makes them acid; whence its name, signifying generator of acids.

- OX'YGON. n. s. [ἰξίς and γόνια, Gr.; oxy- gone, Fr.] A triangle having three acute angles.

- OX'YMELE. † n. s. [oxumelle, Saxon; oximel, crates, were pitans and decoctions of some vegetables, with oxymel or the mixture of honey and vinegar. Arbuthnot.

- OX'YMONON. † n. s. [ἰξίς, Gr.] A rhetorical figure, in which an epithet of a quite contrary signification is added to any word.

Some elegant figures, and tropes of rhetoric, biting sarcasms, oxy ironies, strong metaphors, lofty hyperboles, paradoxes, oxymorons, lie very near upon the confines of jocularity. Barrow, vol. i. S. 14.

- OX'YRHODINE. n. s. [ἰξίς, Gr. ἰξίς and ῥόδον.] A mixture of two parts of oil of roses with one of vinegar of roses.

compose oxy-rhodine. Flager on the Humours.

- OYER. n. s. [oyer, old French, to hear.]
A court of oyer and terminer, is a judicature where causes are heard and determined.

- OYE's [eyes, hear ye, Fr.] Is the introduction to any proclamation or advertisement given by the publick criers both in England and Scotland. It is thrice repeated.

Fairies, black, grey, green, and white,
Attend your office and your quality.
Crier bobolink make the fairy Oyes. Shakespeare.

Oyes! if any happy eye
This rav'ning wanton shall descry;
Let the finder surely know
Mine is the wag. Croak.

- OY'LETHOLE. n. s. See EYELET. [It may be written oylet, from ocillet, French;
but eylet seems better.]

Distinguish'd shades deck the great,
As each excels in birth or state;
His opetholes are more and simpler,
The king's own body was a sampler. Prior.

- OY'STER. † n. s. [orpra, orpe, Saxon;
oystre, old French.] A bivalve testace-ous fish.

I will not lend thee a penny —
— Why then the world's mine oyster, which I with sword will open. Shaks. M. Measure of Windsor.

O Y S

Rich honesty dwells like your miser, sir, in a poor house; as your pearl in your foul oyster.

Shakespeare.

Another man held a kind of oyster shell, and other bivalves.

Woodward on Fossils.

There may be many ranks of beings in the invisible world as superior to us, as we are superior to all the ranks of beings in this visible world; though we descend below the oyster to the least animated atoms discovered by microscopes.

Watts, Improv. of the Mind.

O Y S

Where oyster tubs in rows
Are rang'd beside the posts, there stay thy haste.
Gay.

O'YSTERWENCH.† } n. s. [oyster and wench,
O'YSTERWIFE. } or woman.] A wo-O'YSTERWOMAN. } man whose business is to sell oysters. Proverbially, a low woman.

Off goes his bonnet to an oysterwench. Shaks.

O Z Æ

Who can despair to see another thrive
By loan of twelve-pence to an oysterwife?
Ep. Heli. Sat. iv. 2.

The oysterwomen lock'd their fish up.
And trudg'd away to cry, No bishop. Hudibras.

OZÆ'NA. n. s. [ἑλκῆμα, from ἑλκῶ, Greek;
azene, French.] An ulcer in the inside of the nostrils that gives an ill stench.
